AT THE COUNCIL CHAMBER, WHITEHALL.

This sixth day of April, 1906.

PRESENT :

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE, M.P.

The Board of Trade are pleased to appoint the following gentlemen, viz. :—

Mr. MONTAGUE J. MUIR MACKENZIE (Chairman),
Mr. JOSEPH ADDISON,
Mr. JOHN BARKER, M.P.,
Mr. GEORGE MOORE CHAMBERLIN,
Mr. SAMUEL THOMAS EVANS, M.P.,
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN,
Mr. WILLIAM BARCLAY PEAT,
Mr. WILLIAM M. RICHARDSON, and to be a Committee to enquire into and report upon the effect of the provisions of the laws at present in force in the United Kingdom in relation to bankruptcy, deeds of arrangement and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors, and the prevention and punishment of frauds by debtors on their creditors, and the points and matters in which those laws and the procedure and administration under them require amendment with special reference to the following questions :—

1. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor, and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities, should be amended or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

2. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused or suspended, should be made more stringent so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

3. Whether power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

4. Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a Receiving Order has been made.

5. Whether the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in any and what way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

6. Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all or some and what classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husbands or not) subject to the Bankruptcy Laws.

7. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under any such disposition as above described.

8. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition more under control and provide for official audits of the trustees' accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

9. Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended so as to include and apply to general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

The Board of Trade are also pleased to appoint Mr. WALTER T. KAYE to be Secretary to the Committee.

(Signed) D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT COMMITTEE.

REPORT.

To the Right Honourable DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE, M.P., President of the Board of Trade.

SIR,—

1. By Minute of the Board of Trade dated the 6th day of April, 1906, we were appointed as a Committee "to enquire into and report upon the effect of the provisions of the laws at present in force in the United Kingdom in relation to bankruptcy, deeds of arrangement, and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors, and the prevention and punishment of frauds by debtors on their creditors, and the points and matters in which those laws and the procedure and administration under them require amendment," with special reference to certain questions specified in that Minute; and we have accordingly enquired into the matters so referred to us. Terms of reference. ante p. iii.

2. Although the terms of reference to us were wide enough to embrace an enquiry into the provisions of the bankruptcy laws in force in Scotland and Ireland, and we were invited by the representatives of certain bodies and institutions in those countries to include in our enquiry and report upon the provisions and administration of the laws in force in those countries, we considered that it would not be desirable to do this in view of the fact that our members were not sufficiently familiar with the administration and procedure under those laws, and in view also of the nature of the principal questions to which by the terms of reference our attention was specially directed, which questions related to matters concerning the bankruptcy law and administration prevailing in England. Accordingly with the approval of the Board of Trade we decided not to undertake an enquiry into the administration of the bankruptcy law and procedure in force in Scotland or Ireland, and only to take evidence with regard to the law and procedure of those countries in so far as it might have a bearing upon the questions of English bankruptcy law and procedure referred to us.

3. We have held fifty-five sittings, and have taken the evidence of sixty-four witnesses. The witnesses examined include representatives of the Incorporated Law Society, the Institute of Chartered Accountants, five Chambers of Commerce, the Association of Trade Protection Societies, the Association of County Court Registrars, the National Chamber of Trade, the Notts and Midlands Merchants' and Traders' Association, the Liverpool and Manchester Timber Traders' Associations, the Birmingham Jewellers' and Silversmiths' Association, the Wholesale Grocers and Provision Merchants of the Birmingham District, the Birmingham and District Millers' Association, the National Federation of Building Trades Employers, the Manchester and Liverpool Building Trades Associations, the Hire Traders' Protection Association, the Railway Carriage and Wagon Builders' and Financiers' Association, the London Stock Exchange, the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, the Board of Trade, and some of the official receivers in bankruptcy in London and in the provinces. All the various bodies named above either tendered witnesses at their own instance, or in response to invitations on the part of the Committee. In addition to the evidence of these witnesses we considered it desirable, for the further elucidation of the questions referred to us, to obtain the evidence of experts on certain aspects of bankruptcy law and administration, and with this view requested the attendance of the following gentlemen, who were good enough to attend as witnesses, and give the Committee the benefit of their knowledge and experience, from which the Committee has derived great assistance. These witnesses include Mr. Hope, one of the Bankruptcy Registrars of the High Court; Mr. Hansell, standing Bankruptcy Counsel to the Board of Trade; His Honor Judge Smyly, K.C., one of the Judges of County Courts; Mr. Muir, one of the Prosecuting Counsel to the Treasury; Mr. Sims, from the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions; Mr. Spencer Phillips, as representing the Institute of Bankers; Mr. Ernest Schuster, of the English bar, who was able to inform the Committee as to the Bankruptcy Law and Procedure of Germany; M. Astoul, Counsel to the French Embassy, who gave evidence as to Bankruptcy Law and Procedure in France;

Mr. Wise, K.C. (late Attorney-General of New South Wales), who gave evidence as to the Bankruptcy Law and Procedure in that Colonial State; Mr. Peter Morison, a solicitor practising before the Court of Session in Scotland, who spoke as to the Scottish Law of Bankruptcy; and Mr. Houston, the Registrar of the Belfast Bankruptcy Court, who spoke as to the Irish Bankruptcy Law. Many of the public bodies and institutions who tendered witnesses for examination also submitted to us memoranda, which in many instances contained valuable suggestions; and a very large number of suggestions, some of them of considerable value, were made to us in memoranda and letters both from bodies representing various branches of trade or industry, and from individuals, including a memorandum from His Honor Judge Tindal Atkinson, and memoranda and documents from several Registrars of County Courts. As the greater part of the matters dealt with in these documents, and the suggestions made in them formed the subjects of the oral evidence taken at our sittings, and discussion of them will be found on the notes of the proceedings, it has been considered unnecessary to include the memoranda mentioned above in the Appendix to this Report. Exceptions have, however, been made in a few instances, among which the memoranda furnished by the Chambers of Commerce and Trade Protection Societies may be specially referred to. In order to give each Chamber and each Trade Protection Society an opportunity of expressing their views upon the matters referred to us, copies of the terms of reference were circulated to them with a request for an expression of their opinion upon the matters therein set out; the answers thus obtained are set out in the Appendix.

Appendix, pp. 354, 377.

4. It may be mentioned as an indication of the interest taken by the public in the administration of the bankruptcy law and of the extent and number of the suggestions brought to the notice of the Committee, that upwards of 600 letters were addressed to the Committee, many of which either contained suggestions for the amendment of bankruptcy law and practice, or referred to memoranda containing such suggestions.

Observations on the Present System of Insolvency Administration.

5. In order that the matters upon which we are reporting may be generally understood, it will be useful to refer very briefly to the system of insolvency administration which at present exists in England in relation to the subject matters of our enquiry. That system may be thus described:—

6. There are practically two methods in which the property of an insolvent debtor is applied, as far as it will go, in satisfaction of his debts and liabilities, and by which he secures permanent or temporary protection from ordinary legal process by the creditors to whom he owes money or is under pecuniary liability. These are proceedings under the bankruptcy laws, and proceedings under voluntary deeds or instruments of arrangement with creditors.

7. The present system of administration of an insolvent person's property under bankruptcy law differs in many essential incidents from the administration under systems of bankruptcy law which formerly prevailed. Under the present system, as soon as it has been decided by the Court which possesses bankruptcy jurisdiction over an insolvent debtor that he is subject to the process of the Court, a Receiving Order is made, by which an officer of the Court, styled the Official Receiver, assumes control over the property of the insolvent debtor, whose conduct then becomes the subject of public and judicial investigation, and who becomes, in certain events, liable to punishment or the imposition of civil disabilities.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Secs. 5–14.

8. The making of a Receiving Order against a debtor does not make him technically a bankrupt or divest his property from him. After a Receiving Order has been made against a man his creditors are convened together, and he may submit to them proposals for a composition with them, or for an arrangement of his affairs, which proposals, if accepted by the creditors and approved by the Bankruptcy Court, in compliance with statutory conditions, become effective, without the debtor having been adjudicated bankrupt. A composition or a scheme of arrangement cannot be approved by the Court until the debtor's affairs and conduct have been publicly investigated by the Bankruptcy Court itself. If a composition or arrangement with his creditors is not proposed by the insolvent debtor, or, if proposed, is not accepted and approved by the Court, the insolvent debtor is adjudged a bankrupt by the Bankruptcy Court, and this is the proceeding which is adopted in the large majority of cases. In that event the property of the bankrupt debtor comes under the control of a trustee in whom it becomes vested; and the duty of the trustee is to realise the property and distribute the proceeds amongst the creditors of the bankrupt in dividends. The trustee may be, and—particularly in cases where the debtor's estate is of considerable value—generally is, a person who is chosen by the creditors at a meeting convened for the purpose, and certified by the Board of Trade. If the creditors do not choose a trustee, the official receiver is the trustee, and in cases in which the assets are small, the trusteeship usually remains with the official receiver. Thus so far as property is concerned, the present bankruptcy system provides that the whole of the bankrupt's property, which may include some property which is not his, but which becomes divisible amongst his creditors by virtue of special provisions of the bankruptcy laws, is administered for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent debtor. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Secs. 43–49.

9. As regards the insolvent debtor personally, after a Receiving Order is made against him his conduct, including the causes which have brought about or contributed to his insolvency, is investigated both publicly and privately before the Court or its appointed officers. The Court of Bankruptcy can also grant to a bankrupt a discharge from his debts, but before granting to a bankrupt such a discharge the Court has to consider what his conduct has been in relation to the matters which have brought about his insolvency, and the Court has power, if certain specified facts are reported against a bankrupt, to suspend his discharge for a period which must not be less than two years, or to grant an immediate discharge subject to conditions to be performed by the bankrupt. There are also certain delinquencies of an insolvent debtor which are made punishable as criminal offences, and the Court of Bankruptcy has power to order delinquent bankrupts and debtors, who are reported to have committed such offences, to be prosecuted. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Secs. 16, 17, 24. Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Sec. 8. Debtors Act, 1869, Part II.

10. In addition to the jurisdiction and control which each Court possessing bankruptcy jurisdiction has over the administration and distribution of the property of an insolvent debtor who is subject to the Court's jurisdiction, the Board of Trade as a Department of the State is vested with statutory duties which to some extent were formerly exercised by the Bankruptcy Courts, for supervising the administration of bankrupts' estates, and the officers and persons who have to conduct that administration. The Board of Trade certifies the appointments of trustees elected by creditors, supervises and controls official receivers, and enforces upon official receivers and trustees the performance of their duties in investigating the conduct of insolvent debtors and bankrupts, and it audits the accounts of official receivers and trustees in bankruptcy, and has power to disallow to trustees any excessive remuneration which has been voted to them and items wrongly or improperly charged in their accounts. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Parts IV. and V.

11. The other method of administration of the property of an insolvent debtor amongst his creditors namely—by a Deed or Instrument of Arrangement with them—depends entirely on negotiation and arrangement between a debtor and his creditors privately; it forms no part of the existing system of bankruptcy law. The insolvent debtor is not subject under it to the penal or disciplinary jurisdiction of any Court; his conduct does not become subject to judicial or official investigation and there is no official audit of the accounts of, or control over, the trustees or other persons who conduct the administration of insolvent estates under such arrangements.

12. In dealing with the matters referred to us for enquiry and report we have assumed that the existing systems of insolvency administration as regards the principles on which they are based as above described, will not be changed. In fact the evidence and documents placed before us do not disclose any dissatisfaction on the part of the commercial community with the main features of the existing law and procedure; while evidence and statistics from official sources show that there has been a large reduction in the amount of insolvency throughout the country since the present system came into force. The matters of complaint and suggestions for reform of the law with which we have had to deal have principally related to special incidents of the law and branches of its administration. We propose accordingly in the following paragraphs of this Report to classify the different branches of our enquiry under separate heads, following as nearly as possible the clauses of the Terms of Reference to us, and at the end of our Report to state in a summary form our answers to the special questions propounded to us and our general recommendations.

I.

Procedure for the Investigation of the Conduct and Affairs of a Bankrupt.

13. Existing procedure.—The present system of investigation of the conduct and affairs of a debtor against whom a Receiving Order in Bankruptcy has been made by a Bankruptcy Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Secs. 16–17.

Court is as follows: First there is a preliminary examination of a searching character by the official receiver of the Court, or his officers, the result of which is reduced to writing, and is filed as a record of the proceedings. Following upon this preliminary examination, which has taken place in private, there is a public examination of the debtor before the Bankruptcy Court, in which examination the official receiver takes the principal part, and in which the debtor is questioned by him as to his previous trading and his affairs generally and the circumstances which have brought about, or contributed to, his insolvency. The debtor can also be questioned by the trustee appointed by the creditors (if there is one) and by any of the creditors who choose to take part in the examination, personally, or by their solicitors or counsel. Usually the registrar of the Court presides at the examination, but it has occasionally happened that the Judge himself has presided. The presiding judicial officer can, and often does, put questions to the debtor; he also controls the examination and the questions which are asked. As soon as the examination is complete an Order is made closing it. The notes of the examination are taken in shorthand, and when transcribed are read over by and signed by the debtor, and then are placed on the record of the proceedings, which is open to the inspection of creditors. In addition to these examinations of the debtor, the official receiver and the creditors' trustee (if there is one) are able to have the debtor himself and other persons examined on oath at sittings before the registrar or Judge of the Court held in private, and to obtain orders compelling the production of books and documents relating to the debtor's conduct and affairs. The debtor himself is also under a statutory obligation, disobedience to which is punishable as contempt of Court, to attend upon the official receiver, or the trustee, or at meetings of creditors, at which he can be required to give information and make every necessary disclosure as to his affairs. From the material thus obtained the official receiver submits to the Bankruptcy Court reports on the bankrupt's conduct and affairs.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 24.

14. Evidence of Witnesses before the Committee.—In the course of the evidence taken and suggestions received by us, hardly any complaints have been made that the existing machinery for investigating a debtor's conduct and affairs and bringing it before the Court is deficient in its constitution or ineffective in practice. It has been suggested to us that questions by creditors at the public examination are rather discouraged, and that creditors now take very little part in the public examinations. It has also been suggested that a shortened form of examination would be a useful reform, and that the examinations should be kept open longer than they are now. As regards the suggestion as to questions by creditors, the circumstance that they do not take much part in public examinations appears to be due partly to the efficiency of the examinations by the official receivers, and also to the circumstance that creditors not unnaturally do not care to lose their time in attending, or to incur the expense of being represented at, public examinations. In important cases the creditors' trustee often takes a considerable part in the public examination, and occasionally creditors who have matters for serious complaint, in regard to particular transactions affecting them, also take part.

Evidence of Biddle 3115–6. Gibson 6716, Winder 6913–7, Law 6353–6, Hough 7269–70.

15. The few suggestions above mentioned that have been made appear to us to relate to matters of detail which depend on the discretion of the registrar, or other judicial person who controls the public examination or the other examinations of debtors, and not to be matters in which any alteration of the existing system or practice as prescribed by the existing statutes and rules is required.

16. We therefore report upon this branch of our Enquiry, that the provisions of the law and practice relating to the investigation by the courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a debtor against whom a Receiving Order has been made, or a bankrupt do not require amendment.

II.

Consideration of a Debtor's Conduct and Imposition of Punishment upon him for Misconduct.

17. This subject of our Enquiry divides itself into two branches, viz.:—First, the consideration of the existing procedure for the prosecution and punishment of deliquencies which are, by the bankruptcy laws now in force, punishable as criminal offences: and secondly, the consideration of the question how far the present law is ineffective to deal with and punish delinquent debtors, and, if so, in what manner it should be made more stringent and effective. These two branches of the subject we propose to deal with separately.

Prosecution and Punishment of Offences against the Bankruptcy Laws and against Creditors.

18. Present Law and Practice.—There are at present under the Debtors Acts and Bankruptcy Acts several offences for which a debtor can be prosecuted in and punished by the courts having criminal jurisdiction. Amongst such offences are contracting debts by means of fraud; fraudulent concealment of property which ought to be disclosed to creditors; mutilation of books of account; absconding with property so as to defeat creditors; and the obtaining of credit to an amount exceeding £20 by an undischarged bankrupt without disclosing the fact of his bankruptcy. Debtors Act, 1869, Part II. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 31.

19. The procedure for the prosecution and punishment of offences against the Debtors Acts and the Bankruptcy Acts requires that the delinquent debtor shall be sent for trial at assizes or sessions before a jury; and, where the prosecution is ordered and directed by a Bankruptcy Court, the proceedings must be conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions. Thus the following steps usually take place :— Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 166.

(1) An application to the Bankruptcy Court for an Order directing a prosecution of the debtor.

(2) An Order of the Bankruptcy Court directing a prosecution.

(3) Transmission of the papers and proceedings to the Director of Public Prosecutions and consideration of them by him.

(4) Prosecution of the debtor before a magistrate or justices.

(5) If the magistrate, or justices, think the case is one in which a jury would be likely to convict, a committal for trial to the Assizes or Quarter Sessions, or (in London) the Central Criminal Court.

(6) Indictment at the Assizes or Sessions or Central Criminal Court before a Grand Jury.

(7) Trial of the debtor before a judge and jury.

20. Complaints before the Committee.—Some complaints have come before us to the effect that the procedure for the prosecution of debtors who have committed the offences in question is dilatory, cumbersome and expensive; that the cases in which prosecutions have been followed by conviction and punishment are few in number; and that the punishments which are usually inflicted are inadequate, with the consequence that the criminal law as administered is not really operative to prevent and punish serious malpractices by debtors who become insolvent. Attention has also been called to a difficulty which often exists in establishing by proof the offences with which a debtor is charged, owing to the criminal courts in general requiring the prosecution to prove affirmatively the criminal or fraudulent motive of the accused debtor, which in many cases is not a matter which can be established by positive proof, but is a matter of inference. See Evidence cited below.* Evidence of Muir 4586–90, Parsons 240, Dickinson 938, Scott 2977–80, Heaton 3775–8.

21. On the other side the Director of Public Prosecutions has, both in a memorandum transmitted by him to us, and also by evidence from his department, complained that under the present law he has no discretion to refuse to institute and conduct a prosecution of a debtor whom a Bankruptcy Court has directed to be prosecuted, and that he is often required to institute and conduct to its termination a prosecution in cases which, after examining the facts and papers and evidence, he does not consider should be the subject of criminal proceedings at all, and in other cases which he does not consider call for proceedings to be instituted by him. Evidence of Sims 4076–155.

22. Suggestions made to the Committee.—Some witnesses suggested that certain offences by insolvent debtors might be tried and punished by the bankruptcy judges themselves. See Evidence cited below †.

Evidence of Sims 4081–3, 4100–10, 4123.

Other witnesses proposed that delinquent debtors should be prosecuted summarily before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, instead of in all cases being tried by a judge and jury, so that they might be dealt with by a summary sentence following speedily upon detection. The Director of Public Prosecutions has placed a suggestion before us that it would be expedient to amend the law so that he should be invested with a complete discretion to decline to proceed with a prosecution which has been ordered by a Bankruptcy Court, if on investigation of the facts and evidence, the case does not appear to him to be one in which a prosecution ought to be instituted or in which it is likely to result in a conviction. We have also had on this branch of the subject information as to the systems in force in Scotland, France, and Germany, for the prosecution and punishment of offences against the bankruptcy laws, or against the rights of creditors. This information shows that in those countries the system prevails of a speedy prosecution before a criminal tribunal able to deal effectively and quickly with delinquents, and that it operates successfully.

23. Observations.—The objects to be attained in our opinion are, firstly, that where facts are disclosed which show prima facie that a debtor has committed an offence for which he can and ought to be prosecuted, the prosecution and conviction with adequate punishment, or the acquittal, of the debtor should follow speedily and decisively; and secondly, that prosecutions should not be instituted or proceeded with where the facts on full investigation indicate that a conviction is not likely to follow upon a prosecution.

24. The first, at any rate, of these objects is not attained under the present law and procedure, and some amendment of the law and practice appears to us to be necessary.

25. The following amendments of the law seem to us to be practicable and likely to be operative to secure the required reform, viz. :—

(1) Whilst leaving available the existing mode of procedure, to make all offences under the Debtors Acts and Bankruptcy Acts also punishable on summary conviction before magistrates and justices, and to apply to them the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. The practical result of this change in the law would in our opinion be that as a rule, upon the bankruptcy judge or registrar ordering a prosecution of a debtor, one proceeding only would take place, viz., a summary hearing before a magistrate or justices; that on proof of the offence at that hearing, immediate and summary punishment would follow, and that in practice probably nearly every case would be determined in this way.

(2) To provide that in a case in which an order to prosecute is made on an application by the official receiver of the Bankruptcy Court, and based on his report, the Court should have power, with the official receiver's consent, to order the official receiver to conduct the prosecution before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction. In that event the prosecution before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction would be conducted in practice by the Solicitor's Department of the Board of Trade, or in the provinces, by the official receivers personally or by agents appointed to represent them by the Board of Trade. The papers in the case in that event would not go in the first instance to the Director of Public Prosecutions; and it would only be in cases of committal for trial by a jury that the Director of Public Prosecutions would be required to conduct the proceedings.

(3) To alter the language in which the enactments relating to offences by bankrupts and debtors are framed in the Debtors Acts and the Bankruptcy Acts, so as to make it clearer than it is now that on proof of the facts constituting an offence (such for instance as destruction of books or papers) the whole burthen of proving absence of dishonesty and intention to defraud or excusable circumstances shall lie upon the accused debtor.

26. The foregoing proposals if adopted will in our opinion meet the complaints of the Director of Public Prosecutions so far as in our judgment it is safe and proper to meet them. So far as the Director of Public Prosecutions desires that in a case in which the Court has ordered that a bankrupt be prosecuted, and the papers are sent to him for the conduct of the prosecution, he should have a discretion and power to disregard the Order of the Court on the ground that the case is not one in which a prosecution ought to be instituted, we cannot recommend that his proposals should be adopted. We have been favoured with evidence and information from the registrars of the High Court and some of the County Court judges, and they are strongly opposed to that part of the proposals of the Director of Public Prosecutions to which we have just referred, which, as they have pointed out to us, would if adopted, in effect constitute the Director of Public Prosecutions a sort of Court of Appeal from their Orders.

Evidence of Hope 4236–42. Memorandum of Judge Tindal Atkinson, Appendix, p. 241.

27. Recommendations.—To summarise our recommendations on this branch of the Enquiry we recommend :—

(a) That it is expedient that the law should be altered so as to provide that all the acts or defaults of a debtor, which are now, or hereafter may be, made offences under the Debtors Acts and the Bankruptcy Acts, be made punishable on summary conviction before magistrates and justices, and that the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts be made applicable to these offences.

(b) That it is expedient that the law should be altered so as to provide that in every case in which an order of a Bankruptcy Court for a prosecution is made on the application and report of the official receiver and based on his report, the Court should have power to order or authorise the official receiver to conduct the prosecution before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

(c) That it is expedient that the existing statutory enactments by which offences against the Bankruptcy Acts and Debtors' Acts are created be amended in their language so as to make it clear beyond possibility of doubt that on proof of the facts by which the offence is constituted the whole burden of proving absence of dishonesty, or intention to defraud, or other circumstances of defence, should be cast upon the debtor.

Question of how far the Existing Law is Defective and Inoperative to check Malpractices by Insolvent Debtors, and whether and in what Manner it should be made more Stringent.

28. Existing Law and Procedure.—(1) Under the existing law numerous delinquencies by insolvent debtors in the conduct of their affairs, or which have contributed to the losses sustained by their creditors, are not punishable, and are not even cognisable by the Courts which have bankruptcy jurisdiction, unless or until a debtor who has had a receiving order made against him, or becomes a bankrupt, applies for an order sanctioning a composition or scheme of arrangement with his creditors, or for an order discharging him from his debts. The delinquencies to which we refer are enumerated in the 8th Section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890. The most prominent of them which have come before us in the course of our Enquiry are :—

(a) Failure by a debtor to keep any books or any proper or adequate books of account in his business.

(b) Trading with knowledge of insolvency.

(c) Gambling and speculation leading to, or contributing to, the debtor's insolvency or bankruptcy.

29. Under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws which were in force before the year 1861, imprisonment for debt not being then abolished, these malpractices could be visited by a refusal of the Bankruptcy Courts to order the release of a debtor from prison. Under the law in force from 1861 to 1869 these malpractices could be visited with punishment by imprisonment which the Bankruptcy Judges had power to inflict; but according to the information to which we have had access, cases of imprisonment under the powers which the Bankruptcy Judges then had were very rare.

Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Sec. 3.

30. Under the law which has existed since the commencement of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if a bankrupt has done any of these things, his discharge from his debts, which the Court has power to grant, can be suspended for a period of not less than two years, or be granted subject to compliance by the Bankrupt with monetary conditions, or even be refused altogether; or if a debtor against whom a receiving order has been made applies to the Court to sanction a statutory composition or arrangement with his creditors, and acts such as those above mentioned are established against him, the sanction may be refused or granted subject to special conditions. But the Bankruptcy Court has this power only in the event of the bankrupt or debtor applying to be discharged from his debts or for the sanction of an arrangement with creditors; and there is no punishment at all provided by the law for these delinquencies or malpractices by a bankrupt debtor, if he makes no application for a discharge and is content to remain undischarged.

31. (2) The enactments by which many of the statutory crimes against the Bankruptcy Laws and Debtors Acts are created provide that the acts or defaults are only to be criminal if done within a limited period: for instance, fraudulent pawning of goods is a criminal offence if done within four months before a bankruptcy petition is presented by or against the man who has pawned the goods, but not if done earlier.

32. (3) The only enactment by which an undischarged bankrupt who carries on a trade or business in an assumed name, or in the name of his wife, or of a firm, or by means of an irresponsible company, is punishable, is the 31st Section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by which it is made a criminal offence for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit for more than £20 from any one person without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt.

Evidence of Newman 1246–64, Marshall 1729–51, Kerr 2351, Mellors 2702–11, Biddle 3117–29, Attlee 3304–5, Miles 3589–604. See also Memoranda by Chambers of Commerce, Appendix, p. 354 et seq. Trade Protection Societies, p. 377.

33. Evidence before the Committee.—(1) In much of the evidence before us complaints have been made as regards insolvent debtors who have failed to keep any books of account, or any proper books of account, and against whom the other delinquencies above referred to are reported, such as trading with knowledge of insolvency. The complaints are twofold, viz.:—

(a) That the offences are of a serious character by which grave injury to creditors is caused yet nothing can be done to the delinquent debtor if he simply abstains from asking the Bankruptcy Court to discharge him from his debts and liabilities.

(b) The fact that it is only upon an application for a discharge from his debts that a bankrupt debtor who has passed his public examination has again to come before the Court and be subject to searching questions and an adverse report on his conduct operates to deter bankrupts from applying to be discharged from their debts, and causes, and helps to increase, the number of undischarged bankrupts in the country, a number which is already much larger than is desirable in the interest of the community.

See Evidence cited below. *

34. (2) It is complained that a debtor can commit acts and defaults which are made offences by the Debtors Acts, and if he can contrive to stave off bankruptcy proceedings for four months he can escape the punishment which he deserves.

35. (3) It is pointed out that Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has not been operative to prevent or diminish the mischief and injury to creditors and other persons which are caused by undischarged bankrupts carrying on trades and businesses in names or styles other than their own; and it is urged that this is a serious evil which requires something more drastic than at present exists in order to put a stop to it.

36. A considerable body of evidence of a weighty character has been tendered to us in favour of making a bankrupt trader who has inexcusably failed to keep any books of account, or any proper books of account, liable to prosecution and imprisonment. In some of the evidence before us a change in the law has been advocated by which the offence should be dealt with and imprisonment imposed by the Judges of the Bankruptcy Courts. In other parts of the evidence before us the change in the law which is advocated is that the failure to keep books of account, or proper books of account, should be made an offence punishable by the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction as a misdemeanour or offence to which the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should apply. The witnesses who have given testimony in favour of this delinquency on the part of a trader who becomes bankrupt being made punishable by imprisonment, include not only representatives of many influential commercial bodies, associations and chambers, but also such witnesses as Mr. F. W. Biddle, a solicitor of the Supreme Court of long and varied experience in commercial insolvencies, Mr. Leadam Hough, the Senior Official Receiver in Bankruptcy of the High Court, and Mr. William Evans, late Inspector General in Bankruptcy, whose evidence on this branch of our enquiry is worthy of very careful attention. The evidence before us opposed to both the above proposals is of witnesses to whose opinion great weight must also be attached; they include Mr. Registrar Hope, as representing the High Court Registrars, Mr. Hansell, one of the most experienced members of the Bar who practise in Bankruptcy cases, Mr. Henry Attlee, the then President of the Law Society, and an influential and representative Committee of commercial men over which Mr. Samuel Hope Morley presided, whose views on this subject were given to the Committee in the evidence of Mr. Thomas Philips, who attended as representing them.

37. Amongst the grounds on which the objections placed before us to the proposal to punish by imprisonment the failure to keep books of account, or proper books of account, are founded are :—

(a) That it makes a thing which was neither criminal, nor due to any bad intention when done, into a crime because of something which has happened afterwards, viz. the insolvency of the person who has done it. Evidence of Morison 7137.

(b) That criminal prosecution and punishment by imprisonment ought to be reserved for acts which, at the time when they were done, were morally wicked, or a contravention of positive law. Hope 4371–6, 4383–7.

(c) That experience of the working of the law by which failure to keep proper books is punishable by imprisonment, where such law has prevailed or now prevails in the United Kingdom, does not lead to the conclusion that such a law will be effective to produce the reform which is desired. In this country when the offence was punishable by imprisonment it appears that the punishment was very seldom inflicted; and in Scotland, where the law prevails, it appears that prosecutions for failure to keep proper books of account are few, and that juries are reluctant to convict for the offence. Hope 4242–6, Wise 6455. Morison 7137–42.

38. On this subject it is useful to refer to the law which prevails in some foreign countries, of which evidence has been given before us.

39. By the law in force in France (Code de Commerce Arts, 8–17) traders are compelled by law to keep books of account. Three books are made obligatory, namely, the journal, or Day Book, Press-copy Letter Book, and Stock Book. A trader who does not keep these books, or who keeps them irregularly, renders himself liable to the penalties attaching to fraudulent bankruptcy. The French Law recognises two degrees of fraudulent bankruptcy, and these are known as " Banqueroute Simple " and " Banqueroute Frauduleuse," an insolvency attended by no fraudulent circumstances being termed " Faillite." offence of not keeping books or of keeping books irregularly is placed in the first of these categories, that is to say, "Banqueroute Simple." No prosecution for "Banqueroute Simple" can take place unless authorised by a resolution of a majority of the creditors present at the meeting at which the proposition was discussed. The prosecution for "Banqueroute Simple" is barred after three years, and the mere attempt to commit it involves no penalty.

40. In certain cases, of which the fact of a trader not having kept books is an example, the Courts have a right to acquit the bankrupt, even though the accusations are well founded; they have all possible latitude in this respect, and may take into consideration the antecedents of the bankrupt, the circumstances which have brought about the bankruptcy, and the extent of the loss which his creditors sustain.

41. "Banqueroute Simple" is punishable by imprisonment for from one month to two years.

42. The delinquent is tried by the Tribunal Correctionel, and not by the bankruptcy tribunal.

43. The three books mentioned above which it is obligatory upon a trader to keep, must be kept in order of date, without blanks, or additions; and in order to render it impossible to substitute one page for another, all the pages of the book must be numbered consecutively and initialled.

44. Finally the journal and stock book are inspected once a year, and initialled either by the Maire or his deputy, or by a Judge of the Tribunal de Commerce.

45. Traders are obliged to preserve their books for ten years.

46. The enactments contained in the German Commercial Code (Arts. 38–47) are very similar to the provisions of the French Code upon this subject.

47. After very full and careful consideration of this branch of the Enquiry in all its aspects, our recommendations are as follows:

48. Recommendations. (1.) The failure or omission by a debtor who becomes bankrupt to have kept any books of account, or proper books of account, within two years next preceding his bankruptcy, in a trade or business carried on by him, if without excuse, should be made by law an offence punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment, subject to the following conditions and limitations:

(a) The law should define what books of account must be kept by a person carrying on a trade or business, which should include a book or books containing entries in sufficient detail of all cash received and cash paid, of all goods sold and goods purchased, and statements of annual stocktakings.

Evidence of Hough 7277–83, 7305–16, Morison on Scottish law 7137–40.

(b) The law should provide that a failure or omission by a debtor to have kept these books is only to be punishable in the event of his becoming bankrupt and of the liquidated debts proved in the bankruptcy exceeding £200 in amount; and that no prosecution of a debtor for such a failure or omission is to take place before the lapse of two years from the passing of the law.

Evidence of Hough 7305–16, Evans 7419–23.

(c) The law should provide that the debtor who has in fact failed or omitted to keep the books of account which he ought to have kept and in the manner in which they should have been kept, is not to be held to have committed a punishable offence, if he can show that in the circumstances in which he traded or carried on business his failure or omission to keep the proper books was honest and excusable, and that the failure and omission to keep the proper books did not contribute to his insolvency.

(d) The law should provide that no prosecution shall be instituted for the offence except by order of the Court exercising jurisdiction in the bankruptcy; and the prosecution should be instituted in, and the punishment be inflicted by the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction.

49. As regards other facts affecting a bankrupt's discharge mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, we recommend that where it is established that a debtor who has carried on a trade or business, has brought about or contributed to his bankruptcy by gambling or by unjustifiable speculations unconnected with his trade or business, or has failed to supply a reasonable explanation of the loss of any substantial part of his estate within a period of a year next preceding his bankruptcy, he should by law be guilty of an offence punishable on prosecution before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction by imprisonment, but subject to the qualification and limitation that no prosecution for the offence is to take place before the lapse of two years from the passing of the law, and that no prosecution for the offence shall be instituted except by an Order of the Court exercising jurisdiction in the bankruptcy.

50. We do not recommend that any of the other facts mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, be made punishable as offences, or that they be dealt with otherwise than by refusing suspending or qualifying the delinquent bankrupt's discharge from his debts.

51. If the change in the law which we recommend on this branch of the Enquiry is made the law which will then prevail in England, as regards the delinquencies under consideration, will in effect resemble the laws as to these delinquencies which now prevail in Germany, France and Scotland so far as we think expedient that the English law should resemble those laws; and we believe that the passing of the law which we thus recommend for adoption may operate, as it appears to have done in Germany and France, to deter persons carrying on trades and business from the practice now very prevalent of not keeping books of account, and also from gambling and speculation; and that with the precautions and limitations which we suggest the proposed change in the law will not, if carried into effect, press with any harshness or severity on individuals.

52. (2.) As regards the acts and defaults of a debtor done and committed before a Receiving Order is made against him which are offences under the Debtors Acts and Bankruptcy Acts if they take place within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor (such as pawning goods obtained on credit), it has been urged by some witnesses that this limit of time within which such acts or defaults are made criminal ought to be extended to six months or twelve months. The influential body of commercial opinion represented by the Associated Chambers of Commerce support a recommendation for an alteration of the law in this direction, with which to a limited extent we agree.

Debtors Act, Sec. 11. Evidence of Simpson 798–801, Porter 3073–5, Clarkson 6238, and Resolution of Chambers of Commerce 5999.

53. We recommend that the provisions of the Debtors Acts and Bankruptcy Acts should be amended so as to provide that the acts and defaults of a debtor which by those Acts are made criminal offences if done or committed within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him on which a Receiving Order is made, shall be made criminal offences if done or committed within six months before the presentation of such a petition.

54. (3.) As regards the mischief caused by undischarged bankrupts trading in assumed names, or in the names of firms or companies, it has been suggested to us that the enactment in Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by which it is made an offence for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit to the amount of £20 without disclosing the fact that he is undischarged, is not sufficiently effective to prevent or check this practice, which is very prevalent; and that it ought to be supplemented by further penal legislation having for its object to reduce the above-mentioned limit of £20 to £10, and to make it punishable for an undischarged bankrupt to carry on a trade or business under an assumed name or style, or in the name of any other person, or under the name of a firm. This suggested reform of the law we recommend for adoption. If adopted it will, in our opinion, to a great extent remedy the mischief, now felt very keenly, which is caused by numbers of undischarged bankrupts carrying on trades or businesses in the manner above described, and it will moreover operate as an inducement to bankrupts to apply for their discharges.

55. Registration of Firms. In connection with this branch of our Enquiry is a proposal supported by important witnesses, that a law should be passed requiring all persons trading under firm names or in names other than their own to enter in an official register to be kept for the purpose, particulars of their trade names or styles and of their true names, so that the public may be able to ascertain by reference to the registers the true names of any persons who trade as a firm, or under special styles or descriptions.

56. Although this matter only directly affects the questions which have been referred to us for consideration in so far as it bears upon the abuses arising from the carrying on of business by undischarged bankrupts, we are of opinion that the general question of registration of firms and of single persons carrying on business in firm names, or in names other than their own, is one of great importance to the trading community, which should not be overlooked in considering the causes of insolvency; and we are satisfied that the compulsory registration of the names of all persons carrying on business in other than their own names, whether as firms or otherwise, would not only assist in preventing the evil and mischief which now arise from undischarged bankrupts using names and persons for the purpose of carrying on business, or taking part in trading on credit without disclosing their identity, but would also tend to prevent the giving of credit to other persons who are not entitled to it, and would to that extent tend to diminish the causes of insolvency.

57. Evidence submitted to us upon this question, both by official witnesses and by those who represent the mercantile community was strongly in favour of such a system of registration, to be enforced by penalties on failure to comply with the provisions of the law, and although it has been suggested to us that difficulties might arise in establishing such a register and keeping it correct, and that an obligation of universal application might impose inconvenience and hardship on many firms of repute, these objections do not appear to us to be supported by the evidence tendered to us, or to be in themselves well founded.

58. Recommendation.—On this branch of the Enquiry we accordingly recommend that the law be amended by providing that it shall be a criminal offence for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit for more than £10 from any one person without disclosing that fact, and that it shall be a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment for a bankrupt, while undischarged, to trade under an assumed name, or in the name of any other person or firm, unless his true name and position be fully disclosed to those with whom he deals.

59. On the subject of establishing a register of all firms and persons and making it compulsory on every firm and person trading in a firm name to enter in the register the firm or style in which he is trading and his true name and description, our views on the general question are above expressed, but we have not had before us sufficient details or facts to enable us to make a specific recommendation for adoption.

III.

Law Relating to the Discharge of a Bankrupt from his Debts.

60. Present Position of the Law as to a Bankrupt's Discharge from his Debts.—The position under the existing law and practice is, in untechnical language, this:—

61. The power to give to a bankrupt debtor or withhold from him, a discharge from his debts and thus terminate his bankruptcy, belongs solely to the Court of Bankruptcy. The grant of a discharge to a debtor from his debts is a judicial act of the Court, performed in public. In determining whether a discharge shall be granted or withheld, the Court proceeds judicially on evidence submitted to it in accordance with judicial procedure, and decides upon rules and principles prescribed in the Bankruptcy Acts. The interests of the debtor's creditors and his conduct towards them are relevant facts for the consideration of the Court; and when an application by a debtor for a discharge is considered, the Court hears any creditors, either collectively or individually, who desire to be heard; but the creditors have not as a body any control over the discharge of the debtor, nor is a resolution expressing their wish or opinion a matter to which the Court is bound to have regard.

62. Again under the present system there is strictly speaking no closure of a bankruptcy. If, and when a bankrupt has obtained a discharge and the trustee in the bankruptcy has been released from his office, the bankruptcy is in effect closed; but as long as a bankrupt remains undischarged his bankruptcy continues to be open, and the bankrupt remains subject to certain disabilities and deprivations of the ordinary rights of a citizen, the chief of which are:—

(1) His after acquired property and the surplus of his earnings or income (and in some cases salary or pension), after an adequate allowance for his maintenance, belongs to his creditors, and can be taken or claimed by the bankruptcy trustee. Bankruptcy Act 1883, Sec. 44 Re Roberts (1900) 1 Q.B. 122.

(2) He continues to be subject to civic and political disabilities, e.g., he cannot be appointed or elected to be or act as a Justice of the Peace, Alderman, Councillor, or Member of Parliament. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Part II.

(3) He is guilty of a crime if he obtains credit for over £20 without disclosing that he is an undischarged bankrupt. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 31.

63. The question whether a discharge from his debts shall be granted to a bankrupt, conditionally or unconditionally, is only considered and determined by the Bankruptcy Court, if and when the bankrupt applies to the Court for an Order of Discharge. If a bankrupt applies for a discharge the Court appoints a day on which the application is to be heard, and notice of the application and the time fixed for hearing it is given to the creditors. The bankrupt on lodging his application has to pay a fee of £1 10s. to cover the expenses connected with the application, and a fee of 1s. for each notice to the creditors. On the hearing of the application a report by the official receiver upon the proceedings and the conduct of the bankrupt before and during the bankruptcy, is read to the Court: all parties before the Court are heard, and if necessary the Court hears evidence on any matters which are in controversy. Board of Trade Memorandum, Appendix, p. 383 Ex. p. Cook, 6 Morrell's reports, 224.

64. If on the hearing of the application any of the facts mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (e.g., that the assets are not equal to 10s. in the £ on the liabilities, or that the bankrupt, if a trader, has failed to keep proper books of account) are reported against the bankrupt and not successfully controverted by him, the Court is obliged to suspend the discharge for a period of not less than two years, or until he does pay 10s. in the £, or (if it grants a discharge) to grant the discharge conditionally on the bankrupt paying or accounting for to the Court a part of any subsequently acquired property income or earnings. In a very bad case (e.g., where there has been fraud) the application may be refused, or the discharge suspended for a long period. Re Swabey (1897) 76 Law Times Reports, N.S. Evidence of Biddle 3130–1.

65. If a bankrupt does not apply for a discharge from his debts, then in ordinary course he does not, after the close of his public examination, again appear before the Court in public for the purpose of having his conduct considered. If the facts ascertained in the course of the proceedings disclose criminal offences by a bankrupt, an application for an Order directing a criminal prosecution can be made by the official receiver, the trustee or any creditor; and for the purpose of an application by the official receiver the Court is furnished with a report by him, but such an application is heard in private. Debtors Act, Sec. 16. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 69.

66. Complaints.—The complaints of the working of the present system are, shortly:— See Evidence cited below *.

(a) A large majority of persons who become bankrupt do not apply for a discharge at all and, being undischarged, carry on business in assumed names to the detriment of traders who deal with them.

(b) Suspension of discharge is not regarded as a punishment by an unscrupulous debtor; and an order to pay money periodically and account for earnings is easily evaded. Both kinds of orders are treated with indifference by bankrupts against whom commercial misconduct has been reported and established.

(c) The present law is not sufficiently effective to check improper and reckless trading, failure by traders to keep proper books of account, and improper disposal of assets obtained on credit.

See Evidence cited below †.

67. Several suggestions for an alteration of the law and procedure have been made to the Committee, the effect of which may be shortly stated as follows :—

(1) It is proposed that the law should be altered so as to provide that, on a fixed day after the close of a bankrupt's public examination, the bankrupt should be compelled to come before the Court and have his conduct considered, and the question how he should be dealt with finally determined, whether he applies for a discharge or not.

Appendix, pp. 355–9.

68. The exact form and effect of this proposal will appear from the following views submitted to the Committee by important bodies whose statements will be found in the Appendix :—

Resolution of the Associated Chambers of Commerce.

"That it is desirable to supplement the present system of applications for discharge in bankruptcy by providing that the Official Receiver shall, within six months or within such extended time as the Court shall allow after the public examination, present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs; and that if after such report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient."

69. The practical effect of this proposed alteration of the law, if carried into effect, is thus correctly explained by one of the Chambers of Commerce :—

"The proposal is that in every bankruptcy, at the expiration of six months or some extended time from the date of the conclusion of the public examination, the Official Receiver should present a report to the Court on practically the same lines as he now makes where an application for discharge is made, and that upon the filing of the report the matter should be set down by the Registrar of the Court for hearing. Notice of the hearing having been served upon the bankrupt (and it should be compulsory on every undischarged bankrupt to report every change of address to the Official Receiver) the matter comes before the Judge, when all parties can be heard.

"The powers of the Judge in Bankruptcy should be extended, so that the Court may be able to inflict such punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient, having regard to the facts and offences found in the bankruptcy."

Resolution of Blackburn Chamber of Commerce citing the President of the Incorporated Law Society. Appendix, p. 373.

70. Another form of the same proposal made and supported by high authority is in the following terms :—

"There should be an examination at an early stage into the bankrupt's conduct, and a report brought before the Court and punishment in proper cases awarded; but the punishment should not take the form of withholding a discharge, but on the contrary the bankrupt should be as soon as possible encouraged to resume the duty of earning his own living; and the punishment, in cases requiring it, should be calculated to mark with disgrace bankruptcy due to extravagant living or dishonesty, in such a manner as would be really felt and distinguish it from the bankruptcy resulting from the ordinary incidents, accidents, and misfortunes of business."

71. It will be observed that one of the main features of each of the proposals above cited is that the Judge of the Bankruptcy Court, and not the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction or Criminal Courts, should have the power and duty to inflict punishment by imprisonment on delinquent debtors who have committed what may be called bankruptcy offences. Many witnesses do not go so far as this and object to the Bankruptcy Judges being empowered or required to impose punishment by imprisonment, but support the proposal that every bankrupt should be compelled to come before the Court and have his conduct considered and the question determined whether his discharge is to be granted or withheld, and when it is to take effect and the bankruptcy to be at an end, whether the bankrupt applies for a discharge or not.

72. Other alternative suggestions for an alteration of the law and procedure have been made to the Committee of a less important character than the suggestion above mentioned. They may be briefly summarised as follows :—

(2) That the creditors of a bankrupt as a body should have power to pass a resolution that the bankrupt's discharge should be granted absolutely or conditionally; and that in dealing with the question whether a bankrupt's discharge should be granted or not the Court should have regard to the views of the creditors as expressed by resolution. See Memorandum of Chartered Accountants, Appendix, p. 394.

(3) That the two years statutory minimum period of suspension of a discharge should be done away with, and the Bankruptcy Court be given complete discretion to deal on its merits with every case in which a bankrupt's discharge is considered. Evidence of Biddle 3130–3, 3284, Hope 4251–2. Hansell 4408, 4558–61.

(4) That every bankrupt as long as he is undischarged should be compelled not less than (say) once every year to transmit to the Official Receiver (or the Court) an account of his receipts from all sources, and his disbursements during the last preceding year, and to pay over any surplus to the Official Receiver for division amongst his creditors; and that any failure to comply with this provision of the law should be a default within Section 24 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, rendering the defaulting bankrupt liable to imprisonment. See Evidence cited below *.

(5) That every bankrupt while undischarged should be compelled to report himself and his address to the Court, and undergo periodic examinations, and that all his civil rights should be taken away. See Evidence cited below †.

73. Objections to Suggestions.—(1) Strong objection to the proposal for providing by law that every bankrupt shall be compelled to attend the Court to have his conduct considered and the question of his discharge dealt with has been urged before the Committee by witnesses of weight and importance. The objections are based on principle, and on practical and economical considerations. On principle the objection is that a discharge from debts is a benefit to the debtor, and ought only to be granted if and when asked for, and ought not to be forced on a debtor. Evidence of Newman 1418 et seq., Marshall 1729–33, 1791 et seq., 1842–8, Ward 5876–80, Hough 7271–7317, 7338, Evans 7409, 7501–12, 7530–8.

74. A graver objection is the practical and economical one of the expense which the suggested alteration of the present system would entail, and the additional work which it would impose on the Court and its staff, without, it is suggested, corresponding advantage to the public. In support of this latter objection it has been pointed out to the Committee, firstly, that when a bankrupt applies for his discharge the expenses incident to the application (e.g., Court fees, notices to creditors, etc.) and of the bankrupt's attendance are borne wholly or to a great extent by the bankrupt; whereas if the bankrupt were compelled to attend the Court on an appointed day the expense of sending notices to creditors, Court fees, and in most cases the expenses of bringing up the bankrupt would have to be paid out of the public funds. There would also be in many cases a difficulty in finding a bankrupt and compelling his attendance; a bankrupt who does not apply for a discharge often leaves the district where he became bankrupt, goes far away, and sometimes changes his name. Evidence of Hough 7271, Evans 7530–8. See Board of Trade Memorandum, Appendix, p. 383.

75. It will be observed that if the principal proposed change of the law above mentioned were adopted in its entirety, the bankruptcy judges would be invested with the power, and they would have imposed on them the duty, of inflicting on bankrupts against whom, on the consideration of their conduct by the Court offences punishable by imprisonment were reported, sentences of imprisonment: in other words the bankruptcy judges would have to exercise a punitive jurisdiction. So far as we have been able to ascertain the opinions and views of learned Judges and Registrars who exercise bankruptcy jurisdiction, they consider that this proposed change is open to grave objection in principle and could not be carried out successfully in practice. 76. (2) Against the proposal that in considering a bankrupt's conduct in relation to a discharge from his debts, regard should be had to the views of the creditors as expressed by resolution, is the objection that under previous legislation this system prevailed—that is to say the debtor's discharge was more or less a matter of bargain between the debtor and his creditors—and it was found that it produced such evils that a total reform of the system was called for by the trading community; and one of the objects of the present Bankruptcy Acts was to enforce a due regard to the principles of commercial morality in the interests of that community.

77. (3) An objection urged before the Committee to the abolition of the Statutory minimum period of suspension of a discharge for two years is that the principal reason for establishing it was that when the bankruptcy judges had a jurisdiction to suspend a discharge for any period which was thought proper, orders suspending discharges for too short periods were made.

Evidence of Hansell 4411–5, Price 2264–9, Hough 7276, 7318, 7326, Evans 7410–4.

78. (4) The chief objection urged to the proposal that every undischarged bankrupt should file accounts and report himself is one of expense, and difficulty of compelling bankrupts to comply with the law if they keep out of the way.

79. Recommendations.—(1) So far as the principal proposal suggested to the Committee on this branch of the enquiry involves a change in the law which if adopted would provide that the bankruptcy judges are to have the power and duty themselves of inflicting sentences of imprisonment on bankrupts for offences which now are or hereafter are to be made punishable by imprisonment, we do not see our way to recommend this part of the proposal for adoption. In our opinion where a bankrupt is found to have committed bankruptcy offences, he should be dealt with by the Courts which exercise criminal jurisdiction, and in the manner recommended in an earlier part of this Report.

80. So also so far as the proposal if adopted would involve the consideration and discussion in open Court of the question, whether an order for prosecution of the bankrupt ought to be made, we cannot recommend it for adoption. In our opinion the present procedure, by which the official receiver reports on a debtor's conduct to the Court, and in a proper case applies for an order directing a prosecution, ought with the modifications which we have already recommended to be continued.

81. But as regards the remainder of the proposal, that is to say that every bankrupt should be compelled on an appointed day to attend the Court and have his conduct considered, and the question of his discharge dealt with, we report in favour of its adoption subject to any modifications which may be necessary to make it work well in practice. In our opinion the principle on which a change in the law should be based is :—First, that it is desirable, and indeed necessary, that after a bankrupt's conduct and affairs have been investigated by public or private examination he should be compelled to attend the Court on a definite day and have his conduct brought before the Court by a report of the official receiver and considered, and that he should be then dealt with definitely and punished once and for all, so far as the Bankruptcy Court can deal with him and punish him. Secondly, that it is desirable in every bankruptcy proceeding that the Court should be able by an order to fix a date after which the Bankruptcy should be considered closed, and the trustee's right to property acquired by the bankrupt in trade or as earnings would be at an end.

82. (2) As regards the proposal that in considering whether a bankrupt's discharge should be granted or withheld, regard should be had to the wishes of the creditors as expressed in resolutions, we cannot recommend an alteration of the law in this direction, The proposal if adopted would tend to bring back a state of matters which under previous bankruptcy legislation was found to be mischievous and to produce abuses.

83. (3) We do not report in favour of doing away with the two years minimum period of suspension of a discharge where bankruptcy offences are reported and proved against a bankrupt except that we consider that the Court should have a discretion to suspend the bankrupt's discharge for less than two years when the only fact reported against him is that his assets are not of a value equal to ten shillings in the pound on the amount of his unsecured liabilities.

84. (4) As regards the proposals that every undischarged bankrupt shall be required periodically to file accounts and pay over the surplus of his after acquired property or earnings to the official receiver and also periodically to report himself and his place of address to the Court, in some cases such a system might be useful in its operation, but in a large number of cases it would not, and if the proposals which we recommend are adopted there will be the less necessity for any such change in the law.

85. To summarise our recommendations on this branch of our Enquiry they are :—

(a) That in every bankruptcy proceeding after the bankrupt has been publicly examined (whether the examination has been closed or not) an order shall be made on the application of the official receiver appointing a day on which the conduct and affairs of the bankrupt are to be considered by the Court in open Court, and that notice of the appointed day shall be sent to the creditors in the bankruptcy and an order made on the bankrupt to attend the Court at the appointed time.

(b) That for the purpose of securing as far as possible the appearance of the bankrupt, it shall be his duty to notify his address and any changes of it to the official receiver, and also to attend the Court when served with the order for his attendance ; and that any failure by the bankrupt to perform these duties shall be a contempt of Court and punishable as such by imprisonment.

(c) That on the consideration of the bankrupt's conduct a report by the official receiver on the bankrupt's conduct and affairs, and a report by the trustee on the realisation and position of the bankrupt's estate, shall be read, and all parties present shall be heard, and the Court shall then determine when and subject to what conditions the bankrupt's discharge shall be granted, and exercise the same powers and jurisdiction over him as the Court can now exercise when an application for a discharge is heard ; and that the Court shall have power to make an order fixing a date on which the bankruptcy shall be closed, after which date the trustee's right to property acquired by the bankrupt in trade, or as earnings, shall be at an end.

86. Compositions.—Arising out of this branch of the Enquiry is a suggestion which has not been the subject of much specific evidence, but is worthy of consideration, namely this :—Under the Bankruptcy Acts a debtor against whom a Receiving Order has been made can submit an offer of a composition or scheme of arrangement for the acceptance of his creditors and the sanction of the Court ; but if any of the facts mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (assets not equal to 10s. in the £, etc.), are proved against the debtor the Court cannot approve the composition or arrangement, and it falls through, unless it provides reasonable security (interpreted to mean commercial probability) for a payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the £ to the creditors. It is suggested that this limit is almost prohibitive, and often prevents creditors from obtaining advantageous compositions and arrangements. We are of opinion that it might be advantageously reduced to 5s. in the £.

Law and Practice as to Realisation of Estate on Bankruptcy.

87. Present Position.—The effect of the existing law in regard to the realisation of an estate in bankruptcy is that, on the making of a Receiving Order, the property of the insolvent debtor is taken into the custody of the Court (through its officers), and remains in medio until the creditors have been convened to a meeting, and have decided whether there shall be a realisation of the property in bankruptcy by a trustee in whom the property vests, or whether some arrangement proposed by the debtor shall be accepted. Of course in some (a large number of) cases an Order of Adjudication is made at the same time as the Receiving Order, in which case the trustee (who is the official receiver until and unless the creditors elect a trustee) can sell the debtor's estate, but except for some urgent reason the power of immediate sale is not usually exercised, the practice being to await the determination of the creditors.

88. Complaints of the Existing System.—The evidence disclosed very few complaints of the working of the present system as not being sufficiently speedy. Many witnesses are opposed to any change.

Evidence of Longstaffe 390–5, 456–62, 508–11, Simpson, 879–80, 913–4, Biddle 3135–8, 3181–93, Miles 3632–4, Evans 7430–3.

89. Suggestions for Reform.—Suggestions have been made to the Committee, but not of a very precise character, that an amendment of the present law should be introduced by which, if a majority of creditors desire a debtor's business to be discontinued and sold at once, the Court should have power immediately to direct a sale of the business by the official receiver. A somewhat similar power is, by the Rules of the Supreme Court, exercisable by the High Court in proceedings by debenture holders of a company for enforcement of their security, that is to say, the Court can in an urgent case direct an immediate sale of the insolvent company's property, without waiting until the proceedings by the debenture holders have been brought to a hearing.

90. The practical difficulty in the way of working out the suggested amendment of the present law is that, on the one hand, it does not seem desirable that a debtor's business should be sold without first ascertaining the wishes of the creditors after explanation to them of the circumstances, and that, on the other hand, it is difficult to see how the views of the creditors can be ascertained more speedily and effectively than they are under the existing procedure, by which they are convened together as early as is practicable, and are furnished with a full report on the position of the debtor's estate.

91. Recommendation.—On the whole, the conclusion at which we have arrived and have to report is that, while for the purpose of meeting exceptional cases of urgency which may arise from time to time, it would be useful and not open to objection that power should by law be conferred on the Bankruptcy Court, if satisfied by evidence, including that of creditors, that an immediate sale of the property of a debtor against whom a Receiving Order has been made is desirable, to order an immediate sale, the matter is not one on which there is any urgent demand for such a change in the present system.

92. Arising out of the subject of the administration of a bankrupt's property is a question which was brought before the Committee by a Memorandum from the Committee of the London Stock Exchange, supported by a deputation consisting of members of that body, and some of its officers, some of whom gave evidence before the Committee. One of the principles of bankruptcy law, called usually the law of the relation back of the trustee's title to the earliest act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt within three months before the date of the petition on which he is made bankrupt, is that a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy ceases to be qualified to receive or deal with his property, or capable of giving a receipt for a debt, or for his property in the possession of other persons; and therefore if a person who owes money to a debtor, or has property of the debtor in his hands, pays the debt, or delivers the property, in fulfilment of his legal obligation, with knowledge of an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor, and within three months of the date of the act of bankruptcy a bankruptcy petition is presented by or against the debtor on which he is adjudged bankrupt, the person who has thus paid his debt or properly handed over the property in his hands, will have to pay the debt over again to the bankruptcy trustee, or account to the bankruptcy trustee for the value of the property. In practice an almost intolerable situation may be created ; for if payment of a debt is refused or property is withheld on the ground that the person to whom the money is payable, or who owns the property, has apparently committed an act of bankruptcy, and a bankruptcy petition is not presented against him, or he turns out not to have committed an act of bankruptcy, the person who owed the money or withheld the property might become liable to damages and law costs, although he was always willing to discharge his legal obligation, and the situation was not created by him in any way. The aspects of the matter as affecting Stock Exchange business are set out in the Stock Exchange Memorandum, and in the evidence on behalf of the Stock Exchange Committee, which will be found in the Appendix. It is a special incident of the hardship which the law inflicts on honest innocent persons that under the present law it is not a plain or easy matter to determine what is an act of bankruptcy. In a late case the Judge of first instance held that what the debtor did was an act of bankruptcy ; the Court of Appeal held that it was not, and the members of the House of Lords differed in opinion. In a reported case of re Lawford & Lawrence a pledgee after redemption of the pledge by an assignee of the bankrupt pledgor, was sought to be charged by the trustee under the bankruptcy with the value of the pledge because before the redemption he had been present at a sale of the pledgor's goods under an execution which was in fact (although the pledgee did not know it) an act of bankruptcy.

Re Reis (1904) 2 K.B. 769 ; (1905) A.C. 442.

93. Suggestions for Reform.—The suggestions made to the Committee on this subject for an alteration of the law are :—

Evidence of Braithwaite and Richardson 7786–870. Memorandum of Stock Exchange Committee, Appendix, p. 399.

(1) That a payment of money or delivery of stock or goods made to a debtor or his assignee, bona fide, and in the ordinary course of business, should be protected, although the person making the payment or delivering the stock or goods had at the time knowledge that the debtor had committed an available act of bankruptcy.

(2) That in the case of an assignment by a debtor of his property for the benefit of his creditors, payment to the assignee, properly made, should discharge the person who pays from liability to have to pay over again to the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor's property, in a subsequent bankruptcy, whose title by relation back makes void the title of the trustee under the deed.

(3) That an assignee of a debtor for the benefit of his creditors, who distributes amongst the creditors the monies which he collects under the assignment, should be protected from having to account for such monies to the trustee in bankruptcy of the assignor's property, in a subsequent bankruptcy, whose title makes void the title of the assignee in trust for creditors.

94. In support of the first of these suggestions it may be pointed out that the present state of the law often produces an intolerable situation, and that in practice it is frequently necessary for people to disregard it and risk the consequences.

95. As regards the second suggestion, if, as proposed later on, some means are recommended for preventing impecunious unscrupulous persons from becoming assignees under deeds of assignment, it will probably be safe to amend the law by acceding to the suggestion.

96. The third suggestion would involve a very serious change in the law, because in many cases the method of distribution prescribed by a deed of assignment is not in accordance with the equitable principles of distribution in bankruptcy. It would enable the debtor himself, in the assignment by him, to prescribe to some extent the method in which his property was to be distributed amongst his creditors. Moreover, if all the creditors assent to the assignment the distributing assignee or trustee is in effect protected, because none of the assenting creditors would be able to present a bankruptcy petition against the assignor. In the particular instance of a Stock Exchange distribution it might be reasonable to protect the Stock Exchange assignee, but we cannot recommend the suggestion as one which should be adopted so as to be of general application.

97. On this branch of the Enquiry we submit the following recommendations :—

(a) That it is desirable that the present law be altered by providing that nothing in the Bankruptcy Acts shall invalidate a payment or delivery to the bankrupt, or to a person claiming by assignment from him, if the payment is made before the Receiving Order and before notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, and is made pursuant to the ordinary course of business or is otherwise bona fide.

(b) That it is desirable that the present law be altered by providing that payment of a debt, or delivery of property, honestly and properly made to an assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the person entitled to the money or property, shall be a good discharge to the person who makes the payment or delivers the property, if made before the Receiving Order and without notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against the assignor, notwithstanding that the person making the payment or delivering the property had notice of the act of bankruptcy committed by the assignor in executing the deed.

Proofs and Proxies.

98. In connection with the realisation and administration of a bankrupt's property, the subject of proofs of debt by creditors, and proxies given by them for the purposes of meetings of creditors, has been brought to our attention.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Schedules I. and II. Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Sec. 22.

99. (Present Position). Under the present law a proof by a creditor of his debt or claim has to be made in a prescribed form, and sworn before a prescribed authority, and lodged the day before the meeting of creditors at which it is intended to use it. A creditor can give a general proxy to represent him at creditors' meetings only to a person in his permanent employment, or to the Official Receiver. A special proxy, that is to say a proxy for a special purpose, which can be given to anyone, has to set out the resolutions or proposals for or against which the holder is to vote, and the proxy must be filled in by the creditor himself, or by a person in his regular employment.

100. At a meeting ofcreditors all proofs and proxies lodged by creditors are examined and dealt with before the business of the meeting is commenced ; and a creditor cannot vote at a meeting personally or by proxy unless the proof and (in the case of representation by proxy) the proxy are regular, and admitted by the chairman.

See re Ruthen 5, Mans. 227.

101. Complaints have been made to the Committee that the present law as to proofs for voting at meetings, and proxies, is unsatisfactory. As regards the proof of a debt or claim objection has been taken that the prescribed forms are too complicated, and the regulations as to having them sworn and lodging them are unnecessarily stringent ; and that a creditor with a perfect right to vote often is disfranchised because he has not complied with the technical requirements of the prescribed forms, or with the rules as to lodging his proof. As to proxies, complaint is made that the forms and regulations are unnecessarily complicated and stringent. It has also been pointed out to the Committee that at a creditors' meeting much of the time of the creditors in attendance is wasted by the time which is occupied in deciding on the validity of proofs and proxies.

Evidence cited below *. Memoranda of Law Society, Appendix, p. 392 ; Chambers of Commerce, Appendix, pp. 369, 374–5.

102. Suggestions.—As regards proofs, the principal suggestions for an improvement in the procedure which have been made to us are, firstly, that it should be sufficient for a creditor to make and forward a declaration in support of his claim, instead of as at present having to swear an affidavit before an officer or commissioner authorised to administer oaths ; secondly, that the form of proof should be simplified ; and thirdly, that the present regulations should be amended so as to prevent a creditor from being disfranchised for non-compliance with the technical rules, and prevent the time at a creditors' meeting being occupied by prolonged examinations of details and vouchers in support of proofs.

103. Recommendations.—On this matter we beg to report it as our opinion that the existing regulations with respect to the method by which creditors must prove their debts for the purpose of voting at creditors' meetings might be relaxed, leaving power to the Official Receiver or trustee to require the existing regulations to be strictly observed for the purpose of entitling a creditor to receive a dividend. We also recommend that in all cases a proof by one of several joint creditors or joint trustees should be in the first instance sufficient, with power to the Official Receiver or trustee in any exceptional case to require the concurrence of the other joint creditors or co-trustees. The adoption of such a change in the procedure would probably have the result not only of saving trouble to creditors, but of shortening the time occupied in examining proofs. With regard to substituting a declaration for an affidavit, and altering the time prescribed for lodging proofs, we cannot recommend the adoption of either of the proposals before us. We would add that these matters relating to proofs appear to us to be matters of detail, which if necessary can be dealt with by Rules of Procedure, and the adoption of which would not entail any fresh legislation.

104. With respect to proxies, it has been suggested to the Committee that the forms of proxy ought to be simplified, and that a creditor ought to be allowed to appoint any person whom he chooses to represent him as his proxy for all purposes, provided that the name of the appointed person is filled in by the creditor before the proxy is signed, and that the proxy contains a declaration by the creditor that the name of the proxy was filled in before he signed the proxy.

105. The present strict statutory enactments and Rules of Procedure which regulate the giving and use of proxies, were rendered necessary by reason of the way in which the system of proxies under earlier bankruptcy systems was abused, to the detriment of creditors' interests; and we cannot recommend any change in the present system in the direction of relaxing the strict rules at present in force, which should have the effect in any respect of bringing back any of the abuses which formerly prevailed.

Laws relating to the After-acquired Property of an Undischarged Bankrupt, and Mortgage Securities over, and Dealings with such Property.

106. Present Position.—According to the wording of the Bankruptcy Acts all property, real as well as personal, which devolves on or is acquired by an undischarged bankrupt vests in the trustee in bankruptcy, and the bankrupt cannot make a good title to it in favour of a purchaser or mortgagee.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Secs. 44 and 54.

107. The Courts have, however, established an exception to the generality of this law, and according to the decisions of the Courts, an honest sale or mortgage by a bankrupt of his after-acquired personal property, even to a purchaser or mortgagee who has knowledge of the bankruptcy, is protected from a subsequent claim by the bankruptcy trustee. The rule extends to sales and mortgages by an undischarged bankrupt of leaseholds and interests under wills and trusts, acquired by or devolving on the bankrupt after the commencement of the bankruptcy. But the exception does not prevail so as to protect transactions in real estate acquired by an undischarged bankrupt; and if a bankrupt acquires land, and sells it or mortgages it, the purchaser or mortgagee will lose his land or his security if and when the trustee in the bankruptcy claims the land.

Cohen v. Mitchell 25 Q.B.D. 262, Hunt v. Fripp 1898, 1 Ch. 675, and other cases. Re Clayton 1895, 2 Ch. 212. Bird v. Philpott (1900) 1 Ch. 822, London & County Contracts, Ltd. v. Tallack 51 W.R. 408; O/R v. Cooke (1906) 2 Ch. 661

108. There does not seem to be any reason for the distinction between the two classes of property, and the rule of law operates to create hardship on mortgagees and purchasers in respect of dealings with real estate acquired by an undischarged bankrupt who has acquired it in an assumed name, and without disclosing his position.

109. Again, hardship is experienced in cases in which an undischarged bankrupt has traded and incurred debts; for the property thus acquired goes to the creditors in the bankruptcy, without regard to the claims of the persons to whom the bankrupt has since the bankruptcy incurred liabilities.

Re Clark, Ex. p. Beardmore, 1894, 2 Q.B. 393.

110. Complaints and Suggestions.—The unfair and unequal operation of the present law has been recognised by several witnesses before the Committee; though few actual instances of hardship were referred to in the evidence. But instances of hardship will be found in reported cases which have come before the Courts, and are reported in the Law Reports.

See Evidence cited below * and Bird v. Philpott, ubi supra; Re Adie 84 L.T. 508 and other cases.

111. The principal practical suggestions made to the Committee for a reform of the law are in effect as follows :—

(1) That the law should be altered so as to protect a person acquiring a title through an undischarged bankrupt to after-acquired property, whether real or personal, in good faith, for valuable consideration, with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy.

112. This suggestion, if adopted, will get rid of the present anomaly by which a person can acquire from an undischarged bankrupt a good title to personal property (including leaseholds), even if he has knowledge of the bankruptcy and of the trustee's rights, while he cannot acquire from an undischarged bankrupt a title to real property, even if he has no such knowledge.

(2) That the claims of creditors whose debts have been incurred subsequently to a bankruptcy should be entitled to payment out of the after-acquired property of the bankrupt equally with, if not in priority to, the creditors in the bankruptcy.

113. Recommendations.—Having regard to the evidence brought before us, and having considered all the aspects of the question, we have to recommend that the present law as to property acquired by or devolving on an undischarged bankrupt during the period in which his after-acquired property vests in the trustee in the bankruptcy ought to be altered ; and that the law should be amended so as to provide as follows :—

(a) That a person who purchases or takes a mortgage from an undischarged bankrupt of property, whether real or personal, acquired by or devolving on the bankrupt during the continuance of the bankruptcy, shall be protected from any claim to such property by the trustee in the bankruptcy ;

(b) That where an undischarged bankrupt has during the continuance of the bankruptcy incurred debts, the persons to whom such debts have been incurred shall be entitled to prove for their claims against the after-acquired property of the bankrupt in priority to the creditors in the bankruptcy.

VI.

Married Women and their Liabilities under Bankruptcy Law.

114. Present Position.—The principal incidents in the law relating to married women to which the attention of the Committee has been called are :—

See note below ‡.

(1) A judgment against a married woman in an action to recover a debt or other pecuniary claim is not enforceable against her personally, but is enforceable only against her separate estate (if any) which is not restrained from anticipation ;

Evidence of Hansell 4427–8 ; Re Handford (1899) 1 K.B. 565.

(2) A bankruptcy notice cannot issue against a married woman on a judgment recovered in an action against her ; and therefore a married woman, even if she has separate estate, and with it is carrying on a separate trade or business, cannot be made bankrupt on the act of bankruptcy committed by non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice. The effect of this is that, even in a case in which, by reason of separate trading, a married woman is liable to the bankruptcy laws, it is extremely difficult for her creditors successfully to take bankruptcy proceedings against her ;

Ex parte Harvey, 2 Manson 182.

(3) A married woman cannot be made a bankrupt at all, unless it is proved that she has separate estate, and is carrying on business separately and apart from her husband. If made bankrupt the only property available to her creditors is such part of her separate estate as she is not restrained from anticipating.

‡ Married Women's Property Act, 1882, Secs. 1 (5) and 3 ; Bankruptcy Act 1883, Sec. 152.

115. The result is that if an insolvent married woman, who is trading on her own account, abstains from committing any of the acts of bankruptcy which depend on the voluntary act of the debtor such as absconding, suspending payment, etc., she can, in many cases, secure immunity from bankruptcy process, inasmuch as she is not liable to the principal act of bankruptcy which a creditor can force on a debtor (non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice). And, further, the protection to a married woman's income afforded by the effect which the Courts give to a clause restraining her from anticipating it enables an insolvent married woman to regard bankruptcy proceedings by her trade creditors with indifference. See Evidence cited below *.

116. Complaints to the Committee.—The principal complaints against the present state of the law are to the effect that the protected position of a married woman under the Married Woman's Property Acts and Bankruptcy Acts has been used both by married women who trade, and by those who do not trade, to defeat creditors.

117. Suggestions for Reform.—The principal suggestions for reform are :—

(1) That a judgment against a married woman ought to be made available for a bankruptcy notice, and bankruptcy proceedings founded on it; Evidence of Hansell 4427–8, Longstaffe 400–2.

(2) That a married woman who trades should be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as a man is subject to them ; See Evidence cited below †.

(3) That if a married woman is made bankrupt power should be given to the Bankruptcy Court to make the whole or some part of her separate estate which is restrained from anticipation available for her creditors. Evidence of Evans 7436–9, 7492–7.

118. Some witnesses have also proposed that every married woman, whether trading or not, should be subject to the bankruptcy laws. But the adoption of such a suggestion would involve a very serious innovation in the principles on which our bankruptcy law is founded. See Evidence cited below ‡.

119. It may be usefully observed here that, under the present law, if a married woman brings an action and loses it the Court has power to order the whole or part of her separate income which she is restrained from anticipating to be applied in payment of the successful defendant's costs, so that the principle of taking some part of such income to pay a married woman's just debts is not a new one. Married Women's Property Act, 1893.

120. Recommendations.—We have arrived at the conclusion that the complaints which have been made as to the present operation of the law are to some extent well-founded, and we recommend that the law should be amended so as to provide :—

(a) That a married woman who carries on a trade or business on her own account, whether apart from her husband or not, should be subject to the Bankruptcy Laws ;

(b) That if a married woman is made bankrupt the Bankruptcy Court should have power on the application of the trustee to order that during the continuance of the bankruptcy the whole or some part of her separate income which she is restrained from anticipating be paid to the trustee for distribution amongst the creditors, but shall on the hearing of the application take into consideration the source from which the property producing such income was derived and the nature and objects of the provisions of the will or settlement relating thereto ;

(c) That a judgment recovered against a married woman who carries on a trade or business shall be available for bankruptcy proceedings against her

VII.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 47.

121. Present Position.—Under the existing law a voluntary post nuptial settlement of property is void as against the creditors of the insolvent settlor if he becomes bankrupt before the expiration of two years from the date of the settlement, and if the settlor becomes bankrupt within ten years from the date of such settlement it is void as against the creditors of the settlor, unless it can be proved that at the date of the settlement the settlor was solvent ; and a covenant to settle future property is generally void as against the creditors of the settlor, unless the property has been actually transferred before the bankruptcy of the settlor ; but it has been held that this last mentioned provision does not apply where the covenant is to settle a sum of money without specifying the source from which it is to come.

Ex parte Bishop, 8 Ch. App. 718.

122. Complaints.—The evidence before the Committee does not disclose many complaints that the law is not sufficiently protective of creditors' interests, but it has been pointed out to the Committee that by means of a covenant by a settlor to settle property, the creditors of the settlor, if he becomes bankrupt, may be defeated if on the eve of bankruptcy he succeeds in transferring the property, and that a wholly unreasonable covenant in a settlement to pay a large sum of money may give to settlement trustees, or to the wife of the settlor, a large right of proof for voting and dividend, which may be used to the prejudice of trade creditors. In such a case the trustees of a bankrupt's marriage settlement, and his wife, may sometimes, by their voting power, contest the proceedings in the interest of the bankrupt, and swallow up a great part of the estate in dividend (substantially for his benefit).

123. Suggestions for Reform of the Law.—It has been suggested to the Committee that the law should be amended by inserting in Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a clause framed to meet the matters of complaint above mentioned. This suggestion we recommend for adoption.

124. Recommendation.—We have accordingly to recommend that the law be amended by inserting in Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, an enactment in the following terms :—

> " Any payment of money or transfer of property made by a person (hereinafter called the settlor) in pursuance of a covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage, either for the future payment of money, or for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or husband and children of property wherein the settlor had not at the date of the marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property in right of the settlor's wife or husband, shall be void as against the trustee in the settlor's bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the covenant or contract can prove, either that the payment or transfer was made more than five years before the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy, or that at the date of the payment or transfer the settlor was able to pay all his or her debts without the aid of the money so paid or the property so transferred, and any claim under or in respect of such covenant or contract to dividend in the settlor's bankruptcy shall be postponed until all claims of the other creditors of the settlor for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied."

"But nothing herein contained shall apply to or prejudicially affect such a covenant or contract where the money or property which is the subject of the covenant or contract is described in the covenant or contract as intended or expected to come from a special source therein described or mentioned, or to a covenant or contract to take out or maintain or pay premiums or other sums payable upon a policy of life insurance, or shall affect or prejudice the title or interest of any person who without notice of the settlor's bankruptcy has bona fide and for value purchased or acquired from the person or persons entitled to the benefit of the said covenant or contract the money or property the subject thereof."

VIII.

Deeds of Arrangement.

125. Present Position.—The following are among the special incidents of the law relating to voluntary arrangements between a debtor and his creditors, carried out by a deed of assignment and trust, to which our attention has been called.

Judgments in Johns v. James 8 Ch. D. 744, Siggers v. Evans 5 E. & B. 367.

127. The result, as far as the general law is concerned, is that a debtor, without consultation with his general creditors, can assign all his property to an incapable and untrustworthy person of his own selection, on trusts of his own creation ; and provided that the debtor can get some one or more of his creditors to assent to the deed, the assignment is effective, and the trusts will be enforced, and the trustee will be recognised by the Courts, without regard to his character, ability or capacity, or his fitness for the discharge of his duties.

128. (2) The only statutory provisions to which such a voluntary arrangement is subject are :—

(a) The deed or instrument by which it is made must be registered within seven days, otherwise it will be absolutely void. Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887.

(b) The trustee is required once a year to send to the Board of Trade accounts of his receipts and disbursements under the arrangement ; but the accounts are for statistical purposes only, and the Board of Trade has no power to audit the accounts, or to call the trustee to account for any neglects or defaults in his administration of the trust property. Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Sec. 25.

(c) The execution of such a deed by a debtor, if it deals with all the debtor's property, is an act of bankruptcy ; and if the debtor is made bankrupt on a petition presented by a non-assenting creditor within three months of the date of the deed, it will be void as against the bankruptcy trustee and the general body of the debtor's creditors. Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 4.

129. (3) There is, under such an arrangement, no statutory provision for any investigation of the insolvent debtor's conduct ; for testing the character or ability of the trustee to carry out the arrangement ; for giving the creditors any voice in his selection ; for requiring the trustee to give security (as he would have to do in a bankruptcy or a scheme of arrangement under the Bankruptcy Acts); or for the audit by any official department of the trustee's accounts.

130. (4) The only method by which a trustee under a deed of arrangement who fails to administer a debtor's estate properly can be brought to account, or by which creditors whose claims are not properly or fairly dealt with can obtain redress, is by proceedings in Chancery, which may be rendered dilatory and expensive, and which, at any rate in the first instance, have to be at the expense of the creditors or other persons who complain and have to set the law in motion. Supreme Court Rules 0.55r. 3. Compare Cooper v. Adams (1894), 2 Ch. 557.

131. Result of Present Position.—In a large class of cases frauds of a very serious kind are perpetrated on creditors by unscrupulous men who induce debtors to execute deeds in their favour, which enable them to possess themselves of the debtors' estates and defraud the debtors' creditors. Numerous instances of such frauds are given in a Memorandum by the Board of Trade which was furnished to the Committee, and were mentioned in the evidence before the Committee. The Board of Trade Memorandum is set out in the Appendix to this Report.

Memo. of Mr. Hope Morley's Committee, Appendix, p. 397. Evidence of Biddle 3146–53, T. J. Philips 4729–39, Harris 1982–3, 1999–2003, Berry 5026–30, 5188–210.

132. But in many trades which are well organised, where a debtor at, or after, a meeting of creditors executes a deed of assignment of his property to a trustee of repute approved by them, and on trusts which they approve, this method of arranging an insolvent debtor's affairs works out to the satisfaction of the members of the trade who adopt it, and there is no desire among them for a change in the system, except perhaps in the direction of protecting the creditors who agree to such an arrangement from having it afterwards upset by bankruptcy proceedings against the debtor taken at the instance of dissenting creditors. The trustee in such a case is usually a professional man of repute, in whom the trade creditors rightly have full confidence.

133. Complaints made to the Committee.—The principal complaints made to the Committee may be summarised under three heads :—

First, there are complaints of the frauds committed on creditors where unscrupulous persons induce insolvent debtors to execute deeds of assignment in their favour, under which they collect such assets as there are, and neither distribute proper dividends nor render proper accounts, and (in some cases) waste the assets in improper or needless charges and expenses.

Secondly, it is a matter of complaint that in a case where substantially all the creditors have agreed on an arrangement which they consider advantageous by an assignment of the debtor's property to a trustee in trust for all the creditors and under which, if the trusts are carried into effect, all the creditors will share equally and fairly in the distribution of the debtor's property, some small creditor or group of small creditors, desirous of getting some improper advantage for himself or themselves as the price of coming into line with the general body, can within three months of the execution of the deed present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, and thus have the whole arrangement upset, when perhaps it has been partially carried out.

Evidence of Longstaffe 422–505–7, Evans 7478–9, Braithwaite 7797–816.

Thirdly, it is a matter of complaint that during the period of three months from the date of the deed the trustee, under, perhaps, a perfectly proper arrangement, cannot safely or without incurring personal pecuniary risk either collect assets or distribute them.

134. Suggestions in the Evidence and Materials before the Committee.—The suggestions which have been made to the Committee with respect to deeds and instruments of arrangement have been numerous, and vary much in character. They range from suggestions that a very large amount of control over the administration of such arrangements should be exercised by the Bankruptcy Court and Board of Trade, and that these arrangements should be subject to stringent statutory requirements, to a suggestion that things should be left as they are, and that no change in the law should be made. This latter proposal has very extensive and influential support.

135. Observations.—In our opinion the objects to be attained by legislation and administration on this branch of our Enquiry are :—

Firstly, if and so far as is possible, to check and prevent the injury and losses to creditors and other persons occasioned by assignments by debtors without previous consultation with their creditors, to unscrupulous or incapable persons of no professional position.

Secondly, not to interfere with or prevent the speedy carrying out of properly considered voluntary arrangements except so far as is necessary adequately to safeguard the rights of creditors who do not assent to a deed, or have not been consulted in the negotiations for it.

Thirdly, to preserve the voluntary character of these arrangements, and the right of every creditor who honestly dissents from a proposed voluntary arrangement to apply to the Court to have his debtor's conduct inquired into, and his affairs administered under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Law.

Fourthly, to safeguard the rights of creditors who assent to such an arrangement by introducing a system of control over the administration of an arranging debtor's estate, so that excessive and improper charges shall not be incurred or funds be unnecessarily or improperly retained in a trustee's hands, and that creditors shall be kept fully informed of the progress of the administration of their debtor's estate.

136. Recommendations.—To carry out these objects we are of opinion that amendments of the law of which the following are, in a summary form, the heads, might safely be made, and we recommend them for consideration, and with any necessary amplification in matters of detail for adoption. The amendments of the law which we recommend should provide :—

137. (1) That an assignment by a debtor of his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, or other instrument of arrangement to which the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, applies, shall be absolutely void unless before the date on which it is registered or before the expiration of twenty-one days from the date of execution by the debtor, or such extended time as a Judge of the High Court may allow from that date, it has received the assent of a majority in number and value of the creditors of the debtor.

(a) That the list of creditors annexed to the affidavit of the debtor filed on the registration of the instrument shall be prima facie evidence of the names of the creditors and the amounts of their claims. Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, Sec. 6.

(b) That the assent of a creditor shall be sufficiently established by his executing the deed or instrument, or sending to the trustee his assent in writing attested by a witness.

(c) That the trustee of every such deed or instrument shall at the time of registering it, or in the case of an instrument assented to after registration, forthwith after the requisite assents of creditors have been received, file with the Registrar of Deeds of Arrangement a certificate attested by a Commissioner for Oaths that the requisite majority of the creditors of the debtor have assented to the arrangement, which certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the fact certified.

(d) That any question as to whether any person claiming to be a creditor has been omitted from the list of the debtor's creditors as made by him, or by the trustee in making his certificate, or otherwise as to whether the above requirements of the law have been fulfilled, shall be decided in a summary way on application to a Judge of the High Court.

139. (3) That, except in the cases hereunder mentioned, the trustee of a deed made by a debtor assigning his property to a trustee for creditors shall within seven days from the date of the registration of the deed, or the date on which the certificate of the assent of creditors is filed, give security by bond with two sureties or of a Guarantee Society approved by the Board of Trade to the Registrar of the Bankruptcy Court of the district in which the debtor resides, in a sum equal to the estimated assets available for distribution amongst the unsecured creditors as shewn by the affidavit filed on registration, to administer the deed properly, and fully account for the assets which come to his hands, and a certificate by the Registrar that such security has been given shall be conclusive evidence of the fact : but that if a majority in number and value of the assigning debtor's creditors, either by resolution passed at a meeting convened by notice to all the creditors, or by writing addressed to the trustee dispense with his giving security the trustee need not give security.

140. (4) That if a trustee who is required to give security fails to do so, the Court on the application of any creditor and on hearing such persons as it may think fit may declare the deed or instrument of arrangement to be void and inoperative to vest in the trustee any property or rights, or make an order appointing another trustee in his place.

141. (5) That if a trustee acts under a deed or instrument of arrangement after it has become void by reason of non-compliance with the statutory requirements, or after he has failed to give the required security at the time or in the manner prescribed, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and punishable by fine or imprisonment, unless he satisfies the Court before which he is accused that a contravention of the law in this respect by him was not intentional, and was due to inadvertence.

142. (6) That a creditor of a debtor who has executed a deed or instrument of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor founded on the execution of the deed or instrument as an act of bankruptcy after the expiration of one month from the date on which notice in writing of the execution of the deed or instrument, and of the filing of the certificate of creditors' assents with an intimation that unless proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against the debtor within one month from the date of the receipt of the notice the deed or instrument will become binding on all the debtor's creditors, is received by the creditor.

143. (7) That on an application in writing to the Board of Trade by creditors of the debtor representing one half in number and value of the creditors entitled to the benefit of a deed or instrument of arrangement for an official audit of the trustee's accounts, the Board of Trade shall have power to cause the trustee's accounts to be audited ; and all the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the institution and enforcement of an audit of the accounts of a trustee in bankruptcy shall, with necessary modifications, apply to the audit of the trustee's accounts, including a power on the audit to require production of an allocatur for the taxed costs of any solicitor whose costs have been paid or charged by the trustee, and to disallow any costs in respect of which no such allocatur is produced.

144. (8) That every trustee under a deed or instrument of arrangement with creditors shall be required at the expiration of six months from the date of the deed or instrument, and thereafter at the expiration of every six months until the estate under the arrangement has been finally wound up, to send to each creditor who is entitled to the benefit of the deed or instrument a statement of the trustee's accounts, and of the proceedings under the deed or instrument down to the date of the statement ; that the trustee shall be required, in his annual affidavit verifying his accounts transmitted to the Board of Trade to state that he has duly transmitted the statements to the creditors, and the dates on which he transmitted them ; and that failure to comply with this provision of the law shall render the defaulting trustee liable to proceedings by the Board of Trade of the same kind as those to which a trustee under a deed of assignment who fails to observe the provisions of the law now in force is subject.

145. (9) That at the end of two years from the date of a deed or instrument of arrangement with creditors, or such extended period as may be ordered by the Court which has bankruptcy jurisdiction in the district where the debtor resides, on the application of the trustee or a creditor the trustee shall pay all moneys representing unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds then in his hands or under his control into a special account at the Bank of England, which moneys shall then be subject to the orders and directions of the Court, and that any creditor may apply to the Court to enforce compliance by the trustee with this provision of the law.

146. (10) That applications by the trustee or the creditors under such a deed or instrument for the enforcement of the trusts, or the determination of questions under it, shall be made to the Bankruptcy Court of the district in which the debtor was residing at the date of the deed.

IX.

Compulsory Registration of Assignments of Book Debts, and of Agreements for the Hire and Purchase of Chattels.

1. Assignments of Book Debts by Traders.

147. Complaints.—The principal mischief complained of in regard to assignments by traders of their book debts, especially those given by way of security, is that under the present law a trader, without the knowledge of his creditors or those with whom he deals or is about to deal, can effectively assign by way of mortgage to an assignee the whole of his existing and future book debts; and, provided that the assignee can succeed in giving to the book debtors notice of the assignment before he has knowledge of an available act of bankruptcy committed by the assignor, the creditors, who have probably supplied to the trader on credit the goods which have created the book debts, find the whole of the book debts forming, possibly, an important part of their debtor's assets, swept away by the assignee. See Evidence cited below *.

148. Suggestions for Reform.—To remedy this mischief, some witnesses before the Committee have advocated the institution of a system by which all assignments of book debts by way of security, whether of general book debts or specific book debts, shall be void unless registered in the same way as bills of sale are now registered. See Evidence cited below *.

149. But strong objection has been taken before the Committee to a system by which assignments of specific debts actually existing, or about to grow due under existing contracts, must be registered, on the ground that such a system would hamper legitimate transactions, and is not really required for the protection of creditors; and the example of a banker advancing money to a contractor on the security of instalments coming due to him under a contract is cited. It may be pointed out that, having regard to the circumstances, firstly, that existing book debts are probably collected and soon disappear, and, secondly, that the law of order and disposition in bankruptcy defeats the title of the assignee unless he has taken possession of the debts assigned to him by giving notice of the assignment to the book debtors before he has knowledge of an available act of bankruptcy, unregistered assignments of specific book debts do not as a rule operate to the prejudice of trade creditors. See Evidence cited below †.

150. The assignments which do operate prejudicially are those which are general in their character and operate to transfer to the assignee all the debts which, at the time of the bankruptcy, are due to the debtor whensoever they may have been contracted. It is suggested that an amendment of the law making such assignments void as against creditors of an insolvent debtor unless they are registered like bills of sale, would not be open to objection as hampering legitimate transactions and would afford a legitimate protection to creditors. With this suggestion we agree in principle.

151. Recommendation.—On this branch of our Enquiry we recommend :—

(a) That it is not expedient to alter the law by providing that all assignments of specific book debts, or debts growing due under existing specific contracts, shall be void as against the assignor's creditors on his becoming insolvent, unless they are registered in the same way as bills of sale are now registered.

(b) That it is expedient that (subject to the foregoing paragraph) the law should be amended by providing that an assignment in general terms by a trader of his existing book debts, or of future book debts, shall on his becoming insolvent, bankrupt, or arranging with his creditors be void as against his creditors unless the assignment has been registered like a bill of sale of chattels.

Evidence of Sewell 6570–84, Allpass 6624–34, Cockburn 6641–53, Lodge 6654–80, Parker Rhodes 7871–956.

152. It appears from the evidence which has been placed before the Committee that it is very common for persons and companies to obtain goods, both for private purposes and for purposes of trade and commerce, on agreements for the simple hire of the goods, or for the hire of the goods with a power to the hirer to become the owner of them. This method of trade amounts generally in practice to one by which the person who obtains the goods ultimately acquires the ownership of them by a system of deferred payments. It prevails with regard to many things which are bought and sold, from simple articles of furniture and things for private and domestic use to plant and machinery of the most elaborate and expensive kind used in trade and commerce. It appears from the evidence submitted to the Committee by the Railway Carriage and Wagon Builders and Financiers' Parliamentary Association, which is an association of practically all the firms in Great Britain who manufacture, own, or let rolling stock for use on railways and tramways, that not less than two-thirds of the rolling stock built by those firms for private traders has been dealt with by means of hire-purchase or simple hiring agreements, and that during the last forty years stock to the value of over £25,000,000 has been acquired by hirers by this method of dealing, which during recent years has considerably increased. It appears also from the same evidence that railway companies and large firms in the coal, iron and steel manufacturing and selling trades use these agreements for the purposes of acquiring the rolling stock which they require, and find that the use of the system enables them to economise capital and has been extremely beneficial. The circumstances and conditions of hiring agreements of rolling stock and of plant vary considerably. The commercial importance and exceptional character of these agreements was recognised by Parliament in the Railway Rolling Stock Protection Act, 1872, by which hired railway rolling stock is protected from distraint provided that it bears a plate indicating the name of the actual owner. Since that date plates of this kind have been generally used, and are recognised as evidence of ownership by persons who deal with rolling stock. The terms of the agreements range from simple hirings for a short period to hire-purchase agreements extending over terms of years. With regard to other trades, evidence was given before the Committee on behalf of the Hire Traders' Association that goods are supplied under these agreements by not less than 40,000 traders in thirty different trades, comprising such trades as the furniture trade, and the trade in musical instruments and in printing and agricultural plant. The evidence establishes that in some of the trades about 80 per cent. of the whole trade is done on the hire-purchase system and that the amount of capital embarked in this form of trade is very large. The things supplied on this system vary from things which are small and cheap to things which are large, elaborate and expensive.

153. The essential characteristic and incident of the hire-purchase agreement system is that until by payment of all the instalments of hire the hirer becomes owner of the things which are the subject of the agreement, they remain the property of the person by whom they are let on hire, and the hirer has only the use of them, and on the insolvency of the hirer the owner has the right under the agreement to resume possession of them, and neither the hirer nor his creditors acquire any proprietary interest in the things, notwithstanding that nearly all the instalments of the hiring may have been paid. This right of the owners of the hired goods to resume the possession of them on the bankruptcy of the hirer is sometimes forfeited if the circumstances in which the hired goods are in the hirers' possession bring them within what is known as the order and disposition clause of the Bankruptcy Acts, that is to say—the enactment of bankruptcy law by which goods in the possession of a bankrupt in his trade or business, which do not belong to him, may be claimed by the trustee of the bankrupt's property as forming part of it ; but it is seldom that this happens.

154. Complaints.—The complaints which have been made to the Committee with regard to the operation of the hire and hire-purchase system are that persons who possess furniture and household effects, and plant and other things used in trade, which have been obtained under agreements for the hire or hire-purchase of such things, are able to obtain credit, given to them in the belief that they are actually the owners of the things of which they appear to be the owners; and that creditors of persons who to all appearances have an abundance of assets, when they come to levy execution for recovery of debts due to them, find themselves defeated by the claims of the persons from whom the things have been hired. This effect of the hire-purchase system of which complaint is made, is fully stated in the evidence that was furnished to the Committee on behalf of the Association of County Court Registrars, part of which was to the following effect:— See Evidence cited below *. Evidence of Jennings 1559.

"The prevalence of hiring agreements is a serious matter for shop people, who suffer very much from it. They complain that they are unable to realise anything on their executions because of the goods of the debtors being held under hire agreements. That is the result of these documents coming into force under which goods in the apparent possession of one man belong to another. The system does serious damage to creditors; for not only do hiring firms take advantage of these agreements but debtors take advantage of them. They take hiring agreements from their brothers and cousins so as to avoid giving bills of sale, and instead of resorting to bills of sale now they resort to hire-purchase agreements which require no registration, and which are equally effective for their purpose. The County Court Registrars practically all over the country were almost unanimous on this point."

155. On another occasion it was pointed out to the Committee that the hire-purchase trader gives no credit, runs no risk, retains the ownership of the goods, and seizes them on the failure to pay any instalment that may be due. He does not, like the ordinary trader, take the ordinary risks of trade. The payments to him are made in advance; and on the failure of any single payment he is entitled to go in and seize and the hirer has no remedy whatever. The case of a hirer who is a trader is cited as an example. What happens is that his plant, machinery or furniture, may be the subject of hiring agreements. In the event of the hirer being unable to pay an instalment he has to raise money by selling or pawning other goods in order to pay that instalment. He sells goods obtained on credit from other persons in order to provide the instalment to be paid to the hire trader. Thus the hire trader gains a preference over an ordinary trader.

156. Suggestion of Compulsory Registration.—The reform of the law suggested by those who complain that hire agreements and hire-purchase agreements operate to the injury of creditors is that such documents, with the exception of certain classes of them, should be subject to a law by which they must be registered in a manner similar to that in which bills of sale have to be registered, and by which, if not so registered, the goods comprised in them shall on the bankruptcy or insolvency of the hirer pass to his trustee in bankruptcy or the person in whom his estate in insolvency is vested for the benefit of his creditors. In part of the evidence already referred to it has been suggested to the Committee that there should be legislation for utilising the machinery of the Bills of Sale Acts or of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, both centrally and locally, for the purpose of establishing a system of compulsory registration of hire-purchase agreements. It has been suggested to the Committee that such a system of registration with, if necessary, the exclusion from it of agreements for the hire of goods of very small value, and the hire of certain classes of manufacturing plant, waggons, or machinery, would enable persons who deal on credit with persons who are hirers of the things of which they appear to be the owners, to know not only the fact that the goods of which these persons have the apparent ownership are merely hired, but to know the dates and terms of the hiring, and what the rights of seizure of the true owner of the goods are. The body of evidence in favour of establishing a system of compulsory registration of hire agreements as a principle, excluding from its operation certain classes of hire-purchase agreements, is very large. See Evidence cited below, note * and Memoranda of Chambers of Commerce. Appendix, p. 368; Chartered Accountants, p. 395.

157. Opposition to Compulsory Registration.—In opposition to the proposals for a system of compulsory registration of hire-purchase agreements a very large body of influential evidence has been brought before the Committee by associations and persons to whose evidence considerable weight must be given. See Evidence cited below †.

158. Amongst the objections which have been urged before the Committee to the proposals of those who advocate a system of registration of hire-purchase agreements are the following :—

(1) Registration of those instruments is not required for the protection of persons who deal with traders. The practice of hire purchase is so extensive and well known that creditors would really be informed by a register of hire and hire-purchase agreements only of what they may be taken substantially to know already.

See Evidence cited below †.

(2) The number of hire-purchase agreements which exist is so great, and they are of such varied characters, extending to every class of manufacture and trade, that it would be practically impossible to establish an effective system of registration except at an expense which would be out of all proportion to the benefit to be derived from the system when established.

See Evidence cited below ‡.

(3) The hire-purchase system is extensively and advantageously used in large businesses enabling those who hire such things as waggons and other plant to economise their capital, without any disadvantage to the persons who deal with them, and a system of registration such as is proposed would injuriously prejudice such persons and in effect cripple or destroy a useful and beneficial form of trade.

Evidence of Tudor 5375–7.

(4) It is not desirable to extend the operation of the law by which in some cases the goods of one man are taken to pay the debts of another.

(5) It would be practically impossible to establish a system by which some classes of goods which are usually hired under hire-purchase agreements should be excluded from the operation of the proposed system of registration and others remain subject to it.

(6) That the system has been often found of benefit to persons having income but not capital, and that the public exposure of their transactions is improper and unnecessary and would probably prevent their availing themselves of the system.

Evidence of Jennings 1559–62.

159. Sheriffs' Officers.—Amongst those who complain of hire-purchase agreements are a special class of persons who have brought their views before the Committee, namely, sheriffs' officers, and high bailiffs of County Courts, and other officers charged with the duty of levying execution on the goods of judgment debtors. They complain, and we think with good reason, that when they levy execution at a judgment debtor's premises on goods which are ostensibly his, they are met by a claim by the persons from whom the judgment debtor hired them, and become liable to an action for damages for having seized goods which did not belong to the judgment debtor. This state of matters was clearly pointed out to the Committee in the evidence of Mr. Registrar Jennings (Questions 1559 to 1562).

Evidence of Marshall 1786–90.

160. Recommendation for protection of Sheriffs.—The remedy for the injustice thus suffered by sheriffs and high bailiffs of County Courts is simple, namely, the passing of a statutory enactment to provide that a sheriff or high bailiff who in performance of his duty as such, and after making reasonable enquiries as to whether the goods at the premises of the judgment debtor at which the sheriff or high bailiff is directed to levy, are or are not held under a hire-purchase agreement, and after such inquiries having no reasonable ground to suppose that the goods are so held seizes and sells goods which turn out to be so held under such an agreement, shall not be liable to an action for damages by the person from whom the goods have been hired. A form of clause framed to carry out the suggested reform of the law, which would afford to sheriffs' officers all necessary protection, and which the Committee recommend for adoption is as follows :—

"A Sheriff, High Bailiff or other officer charged with the execution of a writ or other process, or any person acting on his authority, who under an execution seizes and sells goods which are held by the judgment debtor under a hire-purchase agreement and parts with the proceeds of sale pursuant to the directions in the writ or process, without knowledge of a claim to the goods or proceeds by the person from whom they are held, shall not, except as provided in the Bankruptcy Acts, be liable to an action for damages for the seizure of the goods or the sale thereof, or for parting with the proceeds of sale ; provided that nothing herein contained shall affect any liability of the creditor at whose instance the execution is issued to pay the proceeds of the sale of the goods, or the value of the goods, to any claimant who is entitled thereto."

161. Conclusion.—After a long and careful consideration of all the evidence placed before the Committee and the arguments on both sides we have to report as follows:—The present state of the law and practice in regard to hire agreements and hire-purchase agreements produces evils which ought to be remedied, if it were possible to remedy them without creating other and greater evils; but any system of compulsory registration of these instruments would undoubtedly cause a great dislocation in the business of the persons and firms engaged in the trade to which it was to apply, and a system of registration if it was of universal or extensive application would involve great practical difficulties in the keeping of the register, and would tend to defeat its own object by the multitude of cases to which it would apply. If the proposal that hire-purchase agreements relating to property of small value (say under £30) should be exempt from registration were adopted, the practical difficulty arising in carrying out a system of registration of universal application would be diminished; but in that case probably many of the evils which arise at present from non-registration would remain unremedied, and there would be a temptation to persons to evade the law by multiplying the number of hire agreements while diminishing the amount of the money consideration expressed in each of them.

162. We regret that we do not feel able to submit for consideration any definite proposals as a basis for legislation dealing with the subject, and can only discharge our duty by summarising as clearly as can be done without undue prolixity the effect of the evidence and arguments in favour of and against a system of compulsory registration.

Administration Orders in the Case of Debtors Whose Debts are under £50.

163. Position as disclosed by the Evidence.—A debtor whose debts do not exceed £50, and who has a County Court judgment against him, can file in the County Court a request for an Administration Order. After a hearing by the Judge, at which all creditors may attend and question the debtor, an Order can be made on the debtor to pay into the Court the whole of his debts or a composition on them, by instalments which, if kept up, will clear all that he has to pay under this Order within six years. Execution for the amount ordered to be paid can be issued on any goods of the debtor exceeding £10 in value with certain exceptions, but the levy of such an execution is very unusual, if not practically unknown.

164. The Order operates as a stay of proceedings against the debtor by all creditors existing at the date of the Order whose debts have been notified to the Court, and all persons who afterwards become creditors of the debtor.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sec. 122 (5), and Pearson v. Willcock (1906), 2 K.B. 440.

165. Default in paying instalments renders the debtor liable to imprisonment.

166. The moneys received from the debtor are applicable first in paying the costs of the plaintiff in the action, and next in paying the expenses of the administration fixed at 2s. in the £ on the total debts, and after that in paying the creditors' debts rateably.

167. The Order is carried out by a person appointed by the Judge, usually one of the Court officers.

168. In certain cases creditors who are prejudicially affected by an Administration Order can apply to have it rescinded.

169. The persons who obtain protection are, roughly speaking, the working classes who owe small debts to tradesmen and travelling pedlars. The fund out of which the creditors get paid arises from the instalments which the debtor pays into the County Court, usually out of his earnings, supplemented in some cases from the proceeds of an execution levied on his goods.

Evidence of Smyly 3979–4024, 4040–64. Memo. of Judge H. Tindal Atkinson. Appendix, p. 241.

170. Complaints and Suggestions.—Of the witnesses conversant with the present working of the system some are in its favour and in favour of extending it. Others describe the system as at present worked as mischievous and useless, but recommend that with necessary alterations in the law and practice it can be made useful and be extended with advantage.

171. Among the objections to the system are these :—

(1) The system depends entirely for its efficiency on the continuance of the power of imprisonment for failure to comply with an Order of the Court for payment of money. The only way in which payment of the instalments can be enforced is by the power of the Court to commit to prison the debtor who makes default.

Pearson v. Willcock (1906), 2 K.B. 440.

Judge H. Tindal Atkinson's Memorandum. Appendix, p. 241.

(2) A debtor obtains an Administration Order under which his then creditors are put in a list called the First Schedule and are paid first. Persons to whom he afterwards incurs debts are in effect prevented by the existence of the Order from enforcing process by judgment summons or execution against the debtor, and must come in under the Administration Order, on which they have not been heard, and come in after the First Schedule creditors have been paid. The result is that a debtor who has had an Order made against him in one County Court can, and often does, leave the district of that Court, and incur debts to persons in the district of another Court, who know nothing of the Order. Those persons on issuing process against the debtor find themselves met by the Order in the first Court, and are practically without remedy for recovery of the debts due to them.

(3) The first instalments received from the debtor under the Order are applied in paying in full first the costs of the plaintiff and then the Court fees, which latter altogether amount in general to 2s. in the £ on the whole of the debts scheduled. Thus out of money received in Court from the debtor 2s. in the £ on the amount of the debts at least is paid away before the creditors get anything, with the result that sometimes a long period elapses before the creditors get anything at all. Thus, if a debtor's debts amount to £20, the first £2 received from him goes to paying the Court fees ; and if, after paying that £2 the debtor pays nothing more, the creditors will get nothing.

172. The argument in favour of this system is that under it, if properly worked, an honest debtor who keeps up his instalments gets freed from liability to imprisonment and execution during the currency of the Order, and when it is worked out to its conclusion, is free from his debts ; and also that the hold which the Court has over the debtor enures beneficially to the creditors.

173. It is urged by some witnesses who consider that the system is beneficial in its operation that it should not be limited to debtors with debts not exceeding £50, but should be extended to debtors whose debts do not exceed £100.

174. The principal argument in favour of this recommendation is that under the present limit small debtors whose debts are over £50 and under £100 may be deprived of protection from the process of creditors. Such a debtor cannot present a bankruptcy petition unless he can find and pay down a sum of £10, and he cannot obtain an administration order. Against this it is observed that the creditors of such a person have a right to proceed in bankruptcy against him, and it would not be fair to them that on issuing bankruptcy process they should find themselves met by an administration order which would deprive them of the right to have the debtor publicly examined and to get the discovery of his assets which is given by bankruptcy proceedings ; and it is said that the hardship to the class of debtors in question could be met by a reduction of the initial fee and deposit payable on presenting a bankruptcy petition.

175. The weight of testimony by those best able to judge of the working of the system is in favour of extending the procedure to debtors whose debts do not exceed £100, provided that necessary amendments in the law are made. It has been pointed out to the Committee that creditors of such a debtor can be heard before an administration order is made, and can subject the debtor to examination, and if it is shown to be a proper case for bankruptcy the Court would refuse an Administration Order ; that the case of an insolvent debtor whose debts do not exceed £100 is seldom one to which bankruptcy administration is usefully applied ; and that the procedure by Administration Order is likely to be more beneficial in such a case to creditors by reason of the hold which the Court retains over the debtor.

176. On the other main points on which alterations of the law are pressed on the Committee, the evidence of the most competent witnesses is almost unanimous in favour of the following recommendations—

(1) That the operation of an order in preventing creditors from enforcing process against the judgment debtor should be restricted to creditors whose debts are in existence at the date of the order, and to any subsequent creditors who voluntarily come in under it and take advantage of it.

(2) That the priority given to the Court fees and the judgment creditors' costs should be altered, and that they should be paid pari passu with the debts out of the money from time to time received under the order.

(3) That it should be an offence for a debtor who has obtained an administration order to obtain credit for over £1 from a creditor without informing him of the existence of the order.

(4) That a system should be established by which lists of the debtors in each County Court against whom administration orders have been made should be furnished to and kept by the other County Courts.

(5) That an insolvent debtor should be entitled to apply for an administration order, notwithstanding that no judgment has been obtained against him.

177. It has also been suggested to the Committee that where a debtor makes default in payment of an instalment under the order, he should be liable to immediate arrest without first being heard ; but this suggestion we cannot support.

178. Recommendation.—Having considered the evidence submitted and suggestions made to us very fully, our recommendation which we submit is as follows :—

179. That the law and procedure relating to administration orders in County Courts be amended by providing :—

(a) That an insolvent debtor whose debts amount to no more than the prescribed limit shall be entitled to file a request for an administration order in the County Court of the district in which he resides, notwithstanding that no judgment has been recovered against him.

(b) That the operation of an administration order in preventing creditors of the debtor from enforcing process against him shall apply and be restricted, to all creditors whose debts are in existence at the date of the order, and to any of the creditors for debts subsequently accruing who voluntarily come in under the order and take advantage of it.

(c) That the Court fees and judgment creditor's costs shall not be entitled to payment in full in priority to the debts due to the creditors, but shall be paid in instalments pari passu with the debts due to the creditors out of the moneys from time to time received under the order.

(d) That a list of the debtors against whom administration orders have been made and are pending in each County Court shall periodically be furnished to each of the other County Courts ; and that in each County Court there shall be kept open to public inspection a complete list of the administration orders in that and the other County Courts.

180. If these recommendations with any necessary modifications are adopted in principle then we further recommend

(e) That the limit of £50 be raised to £100, and that the procedure by administration order be extended and apply to all debtors whose total debts do not exceed £100 in amount.

181. Summarising the whole of our recommendations in a concise form they are as follows:—

I. AND II.

I.—Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

II.—Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused, or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading, and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

182. (1) The provisions of the law and practice relating to the investigation by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a debtor against whom a Receiving Order has been made, or a bankrupt, do not require amendment.

183. (2) The law should be altered so as to provide that all the acts or defaults of a debtor which are now, or hereafter may be, made offences under the Debtors Acts and the Bankruptcy Acts, be made punishable on summary conviction before magistrates and justices, and the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should be made applicable to those offences.

184. (3) The law should be altered so as to provide that in every case in which an Order of a Bankruptcy Court for a prosecution is made, on the application and report of the Official Receiver, and based on his Report, the Court shall have power to order, or authorise the Official Receiver to conduct the prosecution before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

185. (4) The existing statutory enactments by which offences against the Bankruptcy Acts and Debtors Acts are created should be amended in their language so as to make it clear beyond possibility of doubt that on proof of the facts by which the offence is constituted the whole burthen of proving absence of dishonesty, or intention to defraud, or other circumstances of defence, shall be cast upon the delinquent debtor.

186. (5) The failure or omission by a debtor who becomes bankrupt to have kept proper books of account, or any books of account, within two years next preceding his bankruptcy in a trade or business carried on by him, if without excuse, should be made an offence punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment, subject to the following conditions and limitations:—

(a) The law should define what books of account must be kept by a person carrying on a trade, or business, which should include a book, or books, containing entries in sufficient detail of all cash received and cash paid, of all goods sold and goods purchased, and statements of annual stock-takings.

(b) A failure, or omission, by a debtor to have kept these books should be punishable only in the event of his becoming bankrupt, and of the liquidated debts proved in the bankruptcy exceeding £200 in amount; and no prosecution of a debtor for such failure or omission should take place before the lapse of two years from the passing of the law.

(c) A debtor who has in fact failed, or omitted to keep the books of account which he ought to have kept, and in the manner in which they should have been kept, should not be held to have committed a punishable offence if he can show that in the circumstances in which he traded, or carried on business, his failure, or omission to keep the proper books was honest and excusable and that the failure and omission to keep the proper books did not contribute to his insolvency.

(d) No prosecution should be instituted for the offence except by Order of the Court exercising jurisdiction in the bankruptcy ; and a prosecution should be instituted in, and the punishment be inflicted by, the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction.

187. (6) Where it is established that a debtor who has carried on a trade or business has brought about, or contributed to, his bankruptcy by gambling, or by unjustifiable speculations unconnected with his trade or business, or has failed to supply a reasonable explanation of the loss of any substantial part of his estate within a period of a year next preceding his bankruptcy, he should, by law, be guilty of an offence punishable, on prosecution before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, by imprisonment ; but subject to the qualification and limitation that no prosecution for such offence is to take place before the lapse of two years from the passing of the law, and that no prosecution for the offence shall be instituted except by an Order of the Court exercising jurisdiction in the bankruptcy.

188. (7) The provisions of the Debtors Acts and Bankruptcy Acts should be amended so as to provide that the acts and defaults of a debtor, which by those Acts are made criminal offences if done or committed within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him on which a Receiving Order is made, shall be made criminal offences if done or committed within six months before the presentation of such a petition.

189. (8) The law should be amended by providing that it shall be a criminal offence for any undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit for more than £10 from any one person without disclosing the fact of his bankruptcy, and that it shall be a misdemeanour, punishable by imprisonment, for a bankrupt, while undischarged, to trade under an assumed name, or in the name of any other person or firm, unless his true name and the fact of his bankruptcy be fully disclosed to those with whom he deals.

190. (9) The law should be amended so as to provide that :—

(a) In every bankruptcy proceeding after the bankrupt has been publicly examined, whether the examination has been closed or not, an Order shall be made, on the application of the Official Receiver, appointing a day on which the conduct and affairs of the bankrupt are to be considered by the Court in open Court, and notice of the appointed day shall be sent to the creditors in the bankruptcy and an Order made on the bankrupt to attend the Court at the appointed time.

(b) For the purpose of securing, as far as possible, the appearance of the bankrupt, it shall be his duty to notify his address and any changes of it to the Official Receiver, and also to attend the Court when served with the Order for his attendance ; and any failure by the bankrupt to perform these duties shall be a contempt of Court and punishable, as such, by imprisonment.

(c) On the consideration of the bankrupt's conduct a report by the Official Receiver on the bankrupt's conduct and affairs, and a report by the trustee on the realisation and position of the bankrupt's estate, shall be read, and all parties present who desire to be heard shall be heard, and the Court shall then determine when and subject to what conditions the bankrupt's discharge shall be granted, and exercise the same powers and jurisdiction over him as the Court can now exercise when an application for a discharge is heard ; and the Court shall have power to make an Order fixing a date on which the bankruptcy shall be closed, after which date the trustee's right to property acquired by the bankrupt in trade, or as earnings, shall be at an end.

(d) The Court should have a discretion to suspend a bankrupt's discharge for a period of less than two years when the only fact reported against him is that his assets are not of a value equal to 10s. in the £ on the amount of his unsecured liabilities.

(e) The limit of 7s. 6d. in the £ to be secured by a compounding debtor in the circumstances mentioned in Sub-section 9 of Section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890 should be reduced to 5s. in the £.

III.—Whether power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

191. On this matter no recommendation is necessary.

IV.

IV.—Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a Receiving Order has been made.

192. (1) While, for the purpose of meeting exceptional cases of urgency which may arise from time to time, it would be useful and not open to objection that power should be conferred on the Bankruptcy Court, if satisfied by evidence that an immediate sale of the property of a debtor against whom a Receiving Order has been made is desirable, to order an immediate sale, there is no urgent demand for such a change in the present law and procedure.

193. (2) The present law should be altered by providing that nothing in the Bankruptcy Acts shall invalidate a payment of money, or delivery of property, to the bankrupt, or to a person claiming by assignment from him, if the payment is made before the Receiving Order and before notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition and is made pursuant to the ordinary course of business, or is otherwise bona fide.

194. (3) The law should be altered by providing that payment of a debt, or delivery of property, honestly and properly made to an assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the person entitled to the money or property, shall be a good discharge to the person who makes the payment, or delivers the property, if made before the Receiving Order and without knowledge of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against the assignor, not withstanding that the person making the payment, or delivering the property, had notice of the act of bankruptcy committed by the assignor in executing the deed of assignment.

195. (4) The existing regulations with respect to the method by which creditors must prove their debts for the purpose of voting at creditors' meetings might be relaxed, leaving power to the Official Receiver, or trustee, to require the existing regulations to be strictly observed for the purpose of entitling a creditor to receive a dividend; and provision should be made that in all cases a proof, by one of several joint creditors, or joint trustees, should, in the first instance, be sufficient, reserving power to the Official Receiver, or trustee, in any exceptional case to require the concurrence of the other joint creditors, or co-trustees.

V.

V.—Whether the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupts' estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in any, and what, way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

196. The law should be altered so as to provide :—

(a) That a person who purchases or takes a mortgage from an undischarged bankrupt of property whether real or personal, acquired by, or devolving on, the bankrupt during the continuance of the bankruptcy, shall be protected from any claim to such property by the trustee in bankruptcy.

(b) That where an undischarged bankrupt has during the continuance of the bankruptcy incurred debts, the persons to whom the debts have been incurred shall be entitled to prove for their claims against the after-acquired property of the bankrupt in priority to the creditors in the bankruptcy.

VI.

VI.—Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all, or some, and what, classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husband or not) subject to the Bankruptcy Laws.

197. The law should be amended so as to provide :—

(a) That a married woman who carries on a trade or business on her own account, whether apart from her husband or not, shall be liable to the bankruptcy laws and be made a bankrupt in the same way as if she was a single woman.

(b) That if a married woman is made bankrupt, the Bankruptcy Court shall have power, on the application of the trustee, to order that during the continuance of the bankruptcy the whole, or some part of her separate income which she is restrained from anticipating shall be paid to the trustee for distribution among the creditors ; but that the Court shall, on the hearing of such an application, take into consideration the source from which the property producing the income was derived and the nature and objects of the provisions of the will or settlement relating to it.

(c) That a judgment recovered against a married woman who carries on a trade or business shall be available for bankruptcy proceedings against her by a bankruptcy notice, and that non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice issued on such a judgment shall amount to an act of bankruptcy on which a Receiving Order and Order of Adjudication may be made against such a married woman.

(d) That a claim by a husband on the estate of his wife in respect of money lent, or property transferred, should, in her bankruptcy, be postponed to the claims of creditors for money or money's worth.

VII.—Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt, should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants, and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under any such disposition as above described.

198. An enactment in the following terms should be inserted as an addition to Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, viz. :—" Any payment of money or transfer of property " made by a person (hereinafter called the settlor) in pursuance of a covenant or contract " made in consideration of marriage, either for the future payment of money, or for " the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or husband and children of property " wherein the settlor had not at the date of the marriage any estate or interest, whether " vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property in " right of the settlor's wife or husband, shall be void as against the trustee in the settlor's " bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the covenant or contract can prove, either " that the payment or transfer was made more than five years before the date of the com- " mencement of the bankruptcy, or that at the date of the payment or transfer the settlor

" was able to pay all his or her debts without the aid of the money so paid or the property " so transferred, and any claim under or in respect of such covenant or contract to dividend " in the settlor's bankruptcy shall be postponed until all claims of the other creditors " of the settlor for valuable consideration in money or money's-worth have been satisfied. " But nothing herein contained shall apply to or prejudicially affect such a covenant or " contract where the money or property which is the subject of the covenant or contract " is described in the covenant or contract as intended or expected to come from a special " source therein described or mentioned, or to a covenant or contract to take out or main- " tain or pay premiums or other sums payable upon a policy of life insurance, or shall affect " or prejudice the title or interest of any person who without notice of the settlor's bank- " ruptcy has bona fide and for value purchased or acquired from the person or persons " entitled to the benefit of the said covenant or contract the money or property the subject " thereof."

VIII.

VIII.—Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

199. We recommend the following amendments of the law :—

200. (1) That an assignment by a debtor of his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, or other instrument of arrangement to which the Deeds of Arrangement Act 1887, applies, shall be absolutely void unless before the date on which it is registered, or before the expiration of twenty-one days from the date of its execution by the debtor, or such extended time as a Judge of the High Court may allow from that date, it has received the assent of a majority in number and value of the creditors of the debtor.

(a) That the list of creditors annexed to the affidavit of the debtor filed on the registration of the instrument shall be prima facie evidence of the names of the creditors and the amounts of their claims.

(b) That the assent of a creditor shall be sufficiently established by his executing the deed or instrument, or sending to the trustee his assent in writing attested by a witness.

(c) That the trustee of every such deed or instrument shall at the time of registering it, or in the case of an instrument assented to after registration, forthwith after the requisite assents of creditors have been received, file with the Registrar of Deeds of Arrangement a certificate attested by a Commissioner for Oaths that the requisite majority of the creditors of the debtor have assented to the arrangement, which certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the facts certified.

(d) That any question as to whether any person claiming to be a creditor has been omitted from the list of the debtor's creditors as made by him, or by the trustee in making his certificate, or otherwise as to whether the above requirements of the law have been fulfilled, shall be decided in a summary way on application to a Judge of the High Court.

202. (3) That, except in the cases hereunder mentioned, the trustee of a deed made by a debtor assigning his property to a trustee for creditors shall within seven days from the date of the registration of the deed, or the date on which the certificate of the assent of the creditors is filed, give security by a bond with two sureties, or by a bond of a guarantee society approved by the Board of Trade, to the Registrar of the Bankruptcy Court of the district in which the debtor resides, in a sum equal to the estimated assets available for distribution amongst the unsecured creditors as shown by the affidavit filed on registration, to administer the deed properly and fully account for the assets which come to his hands, and a certificate by the Registrar that such security has been given shall be conclusive evidence of the fact; but if a majority in number and value of the assigning debtor's creditors, either by resolution passed at a meeting convened by notice to all the creditors, or by writing addressed to the trustee, dispense with his giving security the trustee need not give security.

203. (4) That if a trustee of a deed of assignment who is required to give security fails to do so, the Bankruptcy Court of the district in which the debtor resides, on the application of any creditor and on hearing such persons as it may think fit, may declare the deed or instrument of arrangement to be void and inoperative to vest in the trustee any property or rights, or may make an order appointing another trustee in his place.

204. (5) That if a trustee acts under a deed or instrument of arrangement after it has become void by reason of non-compliance with the statutory requirements, or after he has failed to give the required security at the time, or in the manner prescribed, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and punishable by fine or imprisonment unless he satisfies the Court before which he is accused that his contravention of the law was not intentional and was due to inadvertence.

205. (6) That a creditor of a debtor who has executed a deed or instrument of assignment for the benefit of his creditors shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor founded on the execution of the deed or instrument as an act of bankruptcy after the expiration of one month from the date on which notice in writing of the execution of the deed or instrument and of the filing of the registrar's certificate of creditor's assents with an intimation that, unless proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against the debtor within one month from the date of the receipt of the notice, the deed or instrument will become binding on all the debtor's creditors, is received by the creditor.

206. (7) That on an application in writing to the Board of Trade by creditors of the debtor representing one-half in number and value of the creditors entitled to the benefit of a deed or instrument of arrangement for an official audit of the trustee's accounts, the Board of Trade shall have power to cause the trustee's accounts to be audited, and all the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the institution and enforcement of an audit of the accounts of a trustee in bankruptcy shall, with necessary modifications, apply to the audit of the trustee's accounts, including a power on the audit to require production of an allocatur for the taxed costs of any solicitor whose costs have been paid or charged by the trustee, and to disallow any costs in respect of which no allocatur is produced.

207. (8) That every trustee under a deed or instrument of arrangement with creditors shall be required at the expiration of six months from the date of the deed or instrument of arrangement, and thereafter at the expiration of every six months until the estate under the arrangement has been finally wound up to send to each creditor who is entitled to the benefit of the deed or instrument a statement of the trustee's accounts and of the proceedings under the instrument or deed down to the date of the statement; that the trustee shall be required in his annual affidavit verifying his accounts transmitted to the Board of Trade to state that he has duly transmitted the statements to the creditors, and the dates on which he transmitted them; and that failure to comply with this provision of the law shall render the defaulting trustee liable to proceedings by the Board of Trade of the same kind as those to which a trustee under a deed of assignment who fails to observe the provisions of the law now in force is subject.

208. (9) That at the end of two years from the date of a deed or instrument of arrangement with creditors, or such extended period as may be ordered by the Court which has bankruptcy jurisdiction in the district where the debtor resides, on the application of a trustee or a creditor the trustee shall pay all moneys representing unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds then in his hands or under his control into a special account at the Bank of England, which moneys shall then be subject to the orders and directions of the Court, and that any creditor may apply to the Court to enforce compliance by the trustee with this provision of the law.

209. (10) That applications by the trustee or the creditors under such a deed or instrument for the enforcement of the trusts, or the determination of questions under it, shall be made to the Bankruptcy Court of the district in which the debtor was residing at the date of the deed, and that that Court shall have full power to enforce the trusts and determine all questions arising under the deed.

IX.

IX.—Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended, so as to include, and apply to, general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

210. (1) It is not expedient to alter the law by providing that all assignments of specific book debts, or debts growing due under specific contracts, shall be void as against the assignor's creditors on his becoming insolvent, unless they are registered in the same way as bills of sales are now registered; but subject to that exception the law should be amended by providing that any assignment in general terms by a trader of his existing book-debts, or of his future book-debts, shall on his becoming bankrupt, or arranging with his creditors, be void as against his creditors unless the assignment has been registered like a bill of sale of chattels.

211. (2) On the question whether the law with regard to hire purchase agreements should be altered, we recommend that for the protection of officers charged with the execution and enforcement of judgments a clause protecting them in proper cases against claims by the owners of goods which are subject to such an agreement should be passed into law, and the exact terms of the clause are set out in the body of our report; but on the question whether it is expedient that hire agreements and hire purchase agreements of goods should be subject to registration like bills of sale of chattels, we are unable to make any definite recommendation.

X.

Administration Orders in the Case of Small Debtors.

X.—No specific reference to the Committee.

212. The law and procedure relating to Administration Orders in County Courts should be amended by providing:—

(a) That an insolvent debtor whose debts amount to no more than the prescribed limit shall be entitled to file a request for an Administration Order in the County Court of the district in which he resides, notwithstanding that no judgment has been recovered against him.

(b) That the operation of an Administration Order in preventing creditors of the debtor from enforcing process against him shall apply to and be restricted to all creditors whose debts are in existence at the date of the Order and to any of the creditors for debts subsequently accruing who voluntarily come in under the Order and take advantage of it.

(c) That the Court fees and Judgment creditor's costs shall not be entitled to payment in full in priority to the debts due to the creditors, but shall be paid in instalments pari passu with the debts due to the creditors out of the moneys from time to time received under the order.

(d) That a list of the debtors against whom Administration Orders have been made and are pending in each County Court shall periodically be furnished to each of the other County Courts and that in each County Court there shall be kept open to public inspection a complete list of the Administration Orders in that and the other County Courts.

(e) That the limit of £50 be raised to £100 and that the procedure by Administration Order be extended and apply to all debtors whose total debts do not exceed £100 in amount.

213. In conclusion we have to state that in dealing with the enormous and complicated questions extending over the whole range of bankruptcy administration with which we have had to deal and the conflicting nature of the recommendations and evidence which have been submitted to us there have necessarily been some differences of opinion among the members of the Committee in respect of some of the questions on which the Committee was desired to report. Those members of the Committee who have been in a minority upon any question on which a difference of opinion has arisen have not considered their differences to be of so vital a character as to require a separate expression of opinion. In every case of difference of opinion the question has been thoroughly considered and in such cases the report states the conclusions arrived at by the majority.

214. The Committee has derived great assistance in its inquiry from its Secretary, Mr. Walter Kaye, and from those who have assisted him. Mr. Kaye's unfailing attention, great industry and minute knowledge of all the questions which have been under discussion, and his labours in consolidating and digesting the evidence, have done much to assist and lighten our labours.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

Mr. JAMES TODD, called; and Examined.

Mr. James Todd.

16 May, 1906.

1. (Chairman.) I think you are a Chartered Accountant carrying on business at Manchester, Preston, and Blackpool in Lancashire ?—Yes.

2. I think you have had a good deal of experience in the administration of insolvent estates in bankruptcy and under deeds of arrangement ?—Yes.

3. I think you have read the Order of Reference that has been submitted to this Committee ?—I have gone through it.

4. Dealing with the first branch of the Order of Reference, could you tell us whether you have formed any views with reference to the discharge of the debtor, and as to whether the provisions relating to the discharge should be made more stringent or not ?—I have.

5. Would you object to my taking that subject first ?—Not at all. I will deal with it in any order you may desire. I think it is desirable that the question of discharge should be dealt with in any alteration of the Act, and in one or two points which I may particularise. Upon the application of the debtor for his discharge, which may be at some period considerably subsequent to the administration of the debtor's estate, I find in practice that the report to be made by the official receiver is calculated to be weakened by the fact that in such cases where the administration of the estate passes to a trustee, the official receiver is not as fully cognisant of the debtor's conduct during administration, and matters relating to the debtor's conduct which crop up as the trustee is himself. The application may be deferred for a considerable time, and at the time of the application the official receiver has not the particulars of the estate at his fingers' ends and the report is weakened. Consequently, I should strongly suggest, sir, that it would be desirable in practice that the trustee in dealing with the estate should at the time of applying for his release file a report upon the debtor's conduct.

6. As regards the question whether there should be a report in every case by the official receiver, have you considered that matter ?—I have. I think it would be desirable in the interests of the community that all debtors should have to make the application within a reasonable time.

7. That is to say, I suppose, you mean that it should come up for hearing before the court ?—It should come before the Judge.

8. And as regards the penalties that now prevail, is it your view that they ought to be strengthened ?—I am of opinion that they ought to be strengthened, particularly in one or two respects—the keeping of accounts. Of course, it would be a difficult matter to detail what accounts should be kept by any particular class of trader, but I do think that it would be desirable to strengthen the law in that respect generally. There is no doubt I think, sir, that there should be, if it is possible, a strengthening of the law with a view to the improving of account keeping. Of course, I am speaking generally as a professional accountant, but there is no doubt that the question of insolvency bears very closely upon that of correct account keeping, and any increased stringency in that direction would, in my opinion, be of great advantage to the community.

9. As regards the existing provisions relating to the realisation and administration of property, and the suggestion that has been made that realisation might be more speedy and immediate, can you offer any suggestions ?—That is a somewhat difficult point, because it does not follow that speedy realisation is necessarily an advantage. I think the weakness of the Act as administered at present is that there is frequently delay between the making of the Receiving Order and the estate vesting in the hands, say, of the trustee or of the official receiver for realisation. Frequently lengthy delay takes place owing to the statement of affairs not being filed, and I should strongly suggest in some way that the time be shortened. I propose, sir, to submit my ideas in regard to the preparation of the statement of affairs generally, which bears upon the same point. The weakness appears to me to be the delay between the making of the Receiving Order and the estate being in a position for administration in the hands of the trustee, the first meeting of creditors being frequently delayed on account of the statement of affairs not being filed within a reasonable time.

10. Then you would suggest that there should be a fixed limit of time by Act of Parliament, or Rule. At the present moment, of course the time is rather elastic because the Court gives extension of time ?—Yes. Well, sir, I hold strong opinions with regard to the preparation of the statement of affairs, which I should like to lay before the Committee. The present practice—I am speaking now of the smaller estates—is to allow a fee for preparation of the statement to generally the nominee of the solicitor filing the debtor's petition in ordinary cases where the petition is filed by the debtor. In many of the smaller cases that statement of affairs is prepared possibly in the solicitor's office, and sometimes by the appointment of a qualified accountant. Now, sir, I think in realization the position is weakened by that practice in this way. I know, without particularising, that in many of the districts the realization of the debtor's estate is based upon the debtor's statement. I am speaking now of the smaller estates. The estate set out in the debtor's statement is the estate which the official receiver proceeds to realise. Now, sir, I think the weakness arises there, because a statement is prepared at present which is frequently a repetition of what the debtor has said in his answers to interrogatories without due investigation. I think a desirable amendment would be that an improvement should be made in the requirements of the Statement of Affairs. A particular instance to which I can call the Committee's attention is this.

11. (Mr. Chamberlin.) May I ask you what you mean by "due investigation" ?—I am going to give you an instance which I think will put it before you plainly. The debtor sets out what his book debts are. The statement is prepared in the solicitor's office and filed in due course. There is no investigation into the debtor's books of account in order to verify what his statements may be as to the debts owing to his estate. In practice, practically, the statement of affairs is a repetition of what the debtor says without investigation into his books On realisation the book debts and the property, as shown in the statement itself, represent the basis upon which the realisation takes place. I know an instance where, if a proper investigation into the debtor's book debts had taken place for the purpose of the statement, considerable additional estate would have been ascertained. I think the statement of affairs is calculated under present administration to be somewhat faulty.

12. (Chairman.) But surely if the debtor is assisted by an accountant when he comes to make out Sheet D the book debts due to the estate are generally taken from the books ?—They are.

13. And he estimates which are good and bad and so on ?—Yes, in that case. The weakness is not where the statement is prepared by a professional accountant, but frequently where the statement is prepared in the way I have indicated—either by the debtor's solicitor or by the debtor himself. There is not sufficient investigation in that case in the preparation of the statement.

14. (Mr. Smith.) Are you accounting now for the delay which takes place in the preparation of the statement ?—Yes. The delay which arises in that way.

15. Would there not be a greater delay if the statement were deferred until the books were investigated by an independent person ?—I do not think so, because such investigation could be made immediately upon the receiving order being made. At the present time the papers are handed to the debtor. He is instructed to lodge his statement within a certain time, and he may or may not do it. Perhaps he realises that he can get assistance ; he makes an application, and further delay arises in that way.

16. Do you suggest that he could not get assistance ?—No. I suggest that the idea be extended—that the idea of professional assistance in the preparation of statements should be extended, and that the statement in every case should be prepared and certified by a professional accountant.

17. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Is it your experience that the account is presented without being investigated at all—that is to say, is it the practice of the debtor to present his own figures without having had them put through the hands of any accountant ?—It is, sir. In the smaller estates in actual practice a small fee is allowed, frequently, as I say, to the solicitor who has filed the petition and who puts the figures together and prepares a statement of affairs, including a so-called deficiency account, but that statement, my argument is, is wholly incomplete, because there has been no investigation—it is what the debtor simply pleases to tell his solicitor.

18. (Mr. Evans.) Is not the statement made to be the basis of investigation ?—Yes, but I contend in practice, in the small estates of which I am speaking now, and in country districts, the statement is made from information which is lodged by the debtor, without that proper investigation into the books, accounts and circumstances which would prove beneficial, and at any rate it would lead to an immediate saving of time if the statement were prepared immediately upon the making of the receiving order.

19. (Mr. Addison.) Could you give us an idea of the average amount of indebtedness in the cases you refer to ?—I am speaking of cases where the assets run from a few pounds to £500 or £600. My remarks do not apply to larger cases, because in those, in nearly every case, the practice is for a professional man to prepare the statement.

20. (Chairman.) Passing on to the question of the law of insolvency as regards married women—this is paragraph 6 of the Order of Reference—have you considered that question ?—I have. I think it operates unjustly frequently against the trading community, and I think it might with advantage be extended.

21. Do you mean that married women should be made bankrupt in a larger series of instances than at present ?—Yes; accepting the trading advantages, they ought, in my opinion, to accept the whole of the responsibilities which attach to the stronger sex. May I instance a particular case in relation to a married woman which I dealt with myself in the Blackpool district, where a man and his wife were carrying on a lodging-house, both of them giving orders for goods. The position was somewhat complicated by them carrying on business in the same premises. An extraordinary complication ensued; as a matter of fact, both husband and wife were declared bankrupt.

22. That was not the case in Helsby ?—No. I know the Helsby case. This was another case in Blackpool.

23. As regards marriage settlements and the present state of the law, by which in certain instances they are void in bankruptcy, have you any suggestion to offer upon that ?—You are referring now to Clause 7, I presume ?

24. Yes. In your statement which you have sent to us, it is in paragraph 6 ?—I think the law ought to be strengthened there. My opinion is strongly in the direction of avoiding competition under circumstances of that kind—with trade creditors or other creditors for valuable consideration. I should set them aside—defer them.

25. You mean you would defer the right of proof of a beneficiary nature under one of those settlements to the trade creditors ?—Yes.

26. Now, paragraph 8 of our order of reference relates to voluntary arrangements or compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors ?—Yes.

27. And I think you have given that subject your particular attention ?—I have been concerned for a number of years in dealing with the difficulties arising under the Deeds of Arrangement Act and those I set out pretty fully in my statement in order that the Committee might, if they had thought it desirable, go into the difficulties and the points which arise and which seem to call for amendment.

28. Now, at present, as one knows, all that is done with the accounts of the trustee is that they are filed at the Board of Trade but they are not audited, and practically the Board of Trade and the Court of Bankruptcy have very little jurisdiction over the deed trustees ?—That is so.

29. Will you shortly state what your views are as to how the law might be amended with advantage ?—With regard to the provisions for auditing first, sir, in most estates—practically the whole of the estates with which I deal and which are dealt with in my district—there is a committee of creditors, an advisory committee, who act under the deed along with the trustee. In a case where a deed is taken in order to avoid preference, or to keep out executions, and the deed is taken without the inclusion of a committee of inspection, the constant practice is, in an estate of any magnitude at all, for the trustee under it to undertake to act under the direction of the committee which is appointed at the private meeting of creditors. Such committee appears to me as being the proper authority to control the trustee's expenditure. My own experience in practice is that those committees are very useful to the trustees, with a full knowledge of their duties—I am speaking of the textile districts principally now—and exercise a very strong overlook over the administration of those estates. My personal experience is that the committees are very keen to examine into the details of the trustee's administration and such committees appeal to me as the proper authority under any Deeds of Arrangement Act for the control of the trustee's expenditure.

30. But then you would make that compulsory—that there should be such a committee ?—Yes, sir, and I should suggest the accounts as filed contain an endorsement of the committee's certificate. In practice at present this means nothing, I am afraid, because the accounts are exhibited as filed without any such endorsement, and I think if a committee's certificate were made necessary, that would be sufficient control. They have a better knowledge than any Audit Department or Board of Trade Department would have of the peculiar circumstances and they appeal to me as the proper body to examine the trustees expenditure.

31. But then you would make it a provision of legislation that in every case there should be such a committee as there is in bankruptcy—where there is either a committee elected or the Official Receiver acts as a committee ?—I should, sir, with this stipulation that there might be estates within a certain minimum where, on the ground of economy, such a committee would be dispensed with, and in that case it might be desirable that the same provisions as to audit should apply to the Department. I am strongly of opinion that it is necessary that some legal control should be exercised over expenditure under such circumstances. I think the better form would be by the committee of creditors.

32. Then have you any views as to whether the trustee should be, before he is appointed, certified in any way as he is in bankruptcy ?—Yes. I hold very strong views on that point. I have given very careful consideration to this question and my suggestion would be that the trustee should be subject to the approval or certificate of the Department. I have tried to find out if any difficulties in working such a method would arise. What there are I think would be more than compensated for by the additional security that the community would get.

33. (Chairman.) You say in bankruptcy the Official Receiver reports to the Board of Trade the person who has been nominated by the creditors and the Board of Trade then enquire. Who would you suggest would report to the Board of Trade ?—I think the same practice should be followed. I should give power to the Department to refuse to certify. In practice I think it would work out all right.

34. (Mr. Smith.) You mean the Board of Trade by the Department ?—Yes.

35. You are speaking of the Board of Trade ?—Yes, by the Department I am speaking of the Board of Trade. They would necessarily require information which would be supplied by the Official Receiver in each case. The Official Receiver in each case has a knowledge taking the practice as it is—has a full knowledge—of the objectionable people who have brought the form of administration to some extent into disrepute, and I think in practice it would be quite feasible for the same power to attach to the Department as obtains at present in bankruptcy.

36. (Chairman.) The deed originates either through the debtor himself or at a meeting of creditors at which he is required to execute the deed. How would you get official knowledge of the matter either to the Official Receiver or to the Department ?—I think at the time of the registration of the deed. The deed does not become law until it is registered at present and the trustee, speaking generally, does not proceed to act under the estate until registration. The power of the deed prior to registration applies simply in the direction I have indicated namely, the prevention of execution.

37. Then have you any view as to whether a trustee should be ordered to give security ?—I think in all cases over a certain minimum it might be desirable. The question as it appeals to me is one of economy in working to a certain extent, and while personally I am of opinion that it is desirable, in view of my experience in the past, that there should be a guarantee, I am not quite sure that it might not tend to interfere with the smaller administration as being an additional cost.

38. Have you any suggestion to offer as to how the amount of security to be given would be arrived at. You see, in bankruptcy at present, the Official Receiver recommends to the Board of Trade what security there should be ?—Yes, that again could be taken from the figures filed for registration purposes. There is, at present a debtor's affidavit which sets out the gross amount of of his estate.

39. Now I think you have had some experience of the ways in which some deeds of arrangement could be worked greatly to the prejudice of the creditors and the debtor. Can you very shortly give the Committee what your experience has been ?—In the first place a method which arose some years ago of dealing under the Deeds of Arrangement Act appears to have been started somewhat ingeniously by a man who was connected at one time with Leeds. He found out that by issuing what he termed a "judicious" circular to traders who were recorded as having judgments against them, and holding out to them that he would be able to relieve them from their difficulties he could induce numbers of those people to convey their estates to him by this form of deed of assignment without the intervention of any advice—independent advice—to the debtor. The application goes direct to a man who has a judgment registered against him—"If you will place your affairs in my hands I will relieve you of your debts and you will be relieved of all trouble as regards your creditors." Principally in small cases but in a number of them, those estates became vested in certain men, their method of dealing being to get as much of the realisation as they could retain for themselves. If they were forced to part with any (they did it with a bad grace certainly), but if they were pressed by particular creditors they made a payment to a particular creditor or creditors, but the general estate was never administered in a proper manner. That went on for some years. A firm of those people commenced business in Preston, which is one of the towns in which I carry on business. I went into this thing somewhat fully and got together certain information which I supplied to all creditors in estates where these things took place. In the course of years the commercial public began to realise what this meant, and the number of those deeds to objectionable people is gradually becoming less and less. In many cases these men have been sued in various forms by creditors, and brought before various courts. In, I think, five instances I commenced an action as acting for creditors in the Palatine Court before the Vice-Chancellor of that court, and in each of those cases they paid over the money or accounted to the estate before the actions came on for trial. In numerous cases in different parts of the country I have appeared as a witness against these people, and in every case I think they have been ordered to account, and in many cases they volunteered, prior to the case coming on, to hand over the estate to a respectable practitioner. They have actually got these trusteeships now, but they are becoming fewer and fewer.

40. (Chairman.) What do you think is the remedy—unfortunately bad people will succeed in doing bad things. What do you suggest as a remedy for that ?—If the deed to be valid was obliged to be subject to a trustee's certificate I think that would stop it.

41. Or would you suggest that it would not be valid unless a certain number of creditors assented to it ?—No, I should not do that, because you see in the one case you make a positive action necessary. In what I may term private administration, we frequently find the creditors, although not disapproving, do not positively assent to a deed of assignment or composition. I think sufficient security would arise if the validity of the deed depended on the certificate of the administrator under the deed being granted.

42. Is there any other matter connected with the Order of Reference on which you have any assistance to give us that I have not touched upon—I think I have touched upon most of the things in your statement ?—No.

16 May, 1906.

43. (Mr. Smith.) I should like to ask a few questions. With regard to the report that you suggest the trustee should file, do you mean that he should file it upon the application for discharge ?—Upon his own application for release—upon the trustee's application for release.

44. For his own release ?—Yes.

45. He should file it with whom ?—With the department as he files his application for release.

46. Would not that often be too late ?—When a bankrupt applies for discharge previous to that I should call for the trustees report at that time on the application for the bankrupt's discharge.

47. Would it meet your view that he should make a report to the Official Receiver ?—Yes.

48. In every case ?—Yes.

49. Is that not the practice at present in any case ?—The Official Receiver generally asks for the trustee's observations upon the debtor applying for his release, but the particular point to which I draw attention is that frequently the application for the debtor's discharge does not come up until the whole estate has been practically dealt with.

50. That was another matter, but I did not know whether you wanted an alteration of the existing practice under which I understand the Official Receiver always welcomes any report by the trustee upon the administration of the estate and any information with regard to the debtor's conduct during the administration of the bankruptcy or before it ?—Yes, but I should make it part of the trustee's duty. I think it would strengthen the position.

51. You mean that he should be required by statute to report ?—Either upon application for discharge by the debtor, or upon applying for his own release.

52. And then with regard to coming up for discharge in all cases, of course that opens up a very large question. Do you think that it would be practicable to insist upon a bankrupt coming up for discharge in all cases. Would you fix a time ?—I should. I should fix a time within a period after the realisation of the whole estate; that is to say a sufficient period after the estate is realised or the trustee applies for his release. I do not think it would inflict any particular injustice on the debtor because from the point of view of publicity, the whole publicity has occurred prior to that and an undischarged bankrupt is a dangerous factor.

53. I quite agree as to that, but the question rather to my mind is whether it would be practicable to get a large number of bankrupts who do not care about their discharge to come up for it ?—It would be immaterial whether they came or not as long as their matter came before the public view upon a report.

54. You wish a report filed in every case ?—Yes.

55. Have you any definite suggestion to make as to the alteration or strengthening of the law which you suggest with regard to keeping accounts ?—It is a very delicate question indeed to lay down a formula.

56. Speaking generally, would you make it a criminal offence, as it is in some other countries, for a trader not to keep proper books ?—I am not sure that that could be surrounded by sufficient safeguards, and I am rather dubious about it.

57. Do you see any other remedy than that of qualifying the debtor's discharge or of refusing it ?—No.

58. That is the law at present ?—Yes, but I should lay greater stress upon the neglect to keep accounts and let it operate much more strongly than it does.

59. Is your criticism rather directed to the Bankruptcy Statute as it stands or to its administration by the Courts ?—The latter. I think that sufficient importance is not attached to the neglect to keep proper books of account.

60. Assuming that is so, how would you amend it ?—It is a somewhat difficult point. Personally I should prefer to go further and make it penal, but I am not sure that that is practicable.

61. Do you mean that that is your proposal, that it should be made penal ?—I do not, until I am satisfied that there would be a proper safeguard.

62. As to the delay which arises between the receiving order and the appointment of the trustee, and as to the suggestion you make that the statement to be made should be prepared by an accountant in all cases, you are aware that the statute requires that the debtor should file it upon affidavit ?—Yes.

63. If it were made a statutory obligation that the statement should be prepared by an accountant, would it not to some extent destroy the responsibility of the debtor? —I do not think so.

64. How could he be made responsible for accounts that he had not himself prepared ?—I do not think, in practice, the difficulty would arise. Of course, in the preparation of a statement, when any difference of opinion arose as to the position of any particular asset or liability, it would be set out in proper form. I should retain the debtor's statement, but in practice it is found that the debtor is prepared to attach his name to a fair statement.

65. But the debtor is subject to serious penalties if he makes a false statement of affairs, and at present in his examination his statement of affairs is put before him, and he is cross-examined upon it as to its accuracy. Would it not weaken the effect of the examination if the debtor were able to say, "I did not prepare that, it was the accountant who prepared it" ?—I do not think so in practice, because any items which appeared as doubtful to the debtor would be set out in proper form.

66. That might or might not be; but could you make him responsible for a false statement in his accounts, on the ground that certain things had been inserted or certain things had been omitted, if he were able to plead that that was not made under his directions or within his knowledge, or done with his consent ?—Take it in another way. Supposing the assistance allowed were what I should term properly qualified assistance, leaving the statutory requirements as they stand at present.

67. But unless you go the whole length of your suggestion, that the statement shall be prepared by an independent and qualified authority, do not you think that the best plan would be to leave the responsibility with the debtor and to give him such assistance as he himself thinks desirable ?—I do not; I think the assistance allowed to him should be properly qualified assistance, which at present in practice it is not.

68. You think that the solicitor, for instance, cannot in a small estate prepare a statement of affairs. Some solicitors have a considerable knowledge of accounts and some have not as much ?—Oh, yes, I have very great respect for the profession, but I do think that the advantage lies in the direction I have indicated, and that it would be a considerable advantage.

69. Notwithstanding the fact that it might weaken the responsibility of the debtor ?—I think it might be achieved without doing that.

70. But you do not suggest how ?—I suggest that the assistance to the debtor should in every case be accountancy assistance; I do not want in any sense to weaken the debtor's responsibilities, because I attach very great importance to that.

71. With regard to the investigation of books, do you not think it would create delay if the Official Receiver were to say, "I must not only have a statement of affairs, but I must have an independent certificate by an accountant that these books have been examined and that this statement corresponds with the books" ?—I think it would lessen the delay.

72. Lessen the delay of holding the first meeting ?—Certainly.

73. In what way ?—Because immediately the receiving order was made if the books and accounts were taken in hand at once by a professional accountant, we should find that the statement would be filed earlier invariably.

74. Do you mean that the books should be assigned immediately after the receiving order to the professional accountant to prepare a statement from ?—Yes.

75. And you still think that that would be the debtor's statement ?—I have tried to indicate what I mean by that—that this while prepared in this form and accompanied by an accountant's certificate should still remain the debtor's sworn statement—the additional assistance obtained and the lessening of delay being an advantage.

76. I have a question or two to ask with regard to deeds of arrangement. You would think it right that the Board of Trade should audit accounts in certain cases ?—Where there was not a committee of creditors—where there was no certificate of a committee of creditors.

77. In the great majority of small deeds of arrangement is not it a fact that there is no committee of inspection ?—Yes ; but I think there is in almost every large case.

78. In a very large number of cases does not the debtor make an assignment without a committee ?—In a certain number, but I should not say a very large number. He himself makes an assignment without the committee, but at the meeting the committee is appointed with which he undertakes to act. That is the invariable practice in large cases.

79. Is there always a meeting ?—In ordinary practice there is. Where there is no certificate by the creditors' committee I should give the power of audit to the Board of Trade.

80. Do you think that the Board of Trade could satisfactorily perform the audit without reference to the books and papers being in the hands of the trustee ?—I think an account could be sufficiently vouched and audited to cover the purposes which I think are necessary.

81. Do not you think that it is necessary that the audit authority, or whatever it is, should be able to ascertain whether the trustee has done his duty and realised the whole of the estate or not, and how is it to do that without getting the books ?—I should not extend the authority quite so far as that.

82. You are proposing to assign control in this particular to the Board of Trade ?—In cases where it is not effective otherwise.

83. I ask you how is the Board of Trade to perform that duty without practically going through the whole of the debtor's affairs and ascertaining from his accounts what his property is and how it has been dealt with ?—You have the sworn statement of the trustee and I should make that subject to vouching audit and enquiry.

84. You have suggested that in estates above a certain amount a committee should be required—is that by statute. Would you make it necessary to appoint a committee ?—Yes.

85. Would you make the deed invalid if no committee were appointed ?—Yes, I think I should.

86. You do not think that that would destroy the voluntary character of the deed ?—No, because I have indicated what takes place in practice—that although the deed may be registered without the committee the practice is, in my districts at any rate, for the creditors to appoint a committee.

87. I am speaking of these cases which I have reason to believe are very considerable, where there is no committee. In those cases you would compel them to appoint a committee ?—Yes, I should—there are very few cases of any magnitude where a meeting is not immediately held.

88. You suggest that the trustees should in all cases be certified by the Board of Trade as in bankruptcy ?—Yes.

89. Do you think that that would prevent the appointment of incompetent trustees ?—I think it would, speaking generally.

90. Do you think it would at present under the Bankruptcy Act ?—Speaking generally, it does—the question of competency is a somewhat difficult one to deal with.

91. Would you require the Board of Trade to certify the appointment of trustees although they thought the man was not a desirable, competent, person ?—Where the Department has sufficient evidence to bring them to that conclusion I should certainly allow them the power, but the question of comparative competence is a very difficult one to deal with. What I lay stress upon is the power of the Board of Trade to refuse to certify men who are known, not so much for their incompetence but for other more serious disqualifications.

92. How would you draw the distinction —would you make it on the same terms as the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes.

93. Are you aware that the Board of Trade have at present no discretion whatever ?—They have no absolute discretion as to the appointment of a trustee, or his confirmation. Supposing that the Board of Trade refuse to certify under the Bankruptcy Act at present, I take it that the matter would have to come before the Court. Just in the same way I should make the provision exactly similar, because that would achieve the very object.

94. But the Court acts in accordance with its views of the conditions of the Statute—the Court does not act upon its discretion as to the competency of the trustee ?—Not as to the competency.

95. Then you might get an incompetent trustee appointed ?—You might get that under any conditions.

96. You would require the Board of Trade to certify a man as trustee under a deed of arrangement although they believed he was not a proper person to appoint ?—They do the same thing under the Bankruptcy Act now.

97. They do—they very frequently appoint trustees at present whom they do not think are proper persons to administer an estate, because it has been decided they have no power to object. There are certain specific grounds on which the Board of Trade can alone object to the appointment of a trustee, and it has been decided that they cannot go beyond those grounds ?—Of course, I am having regard to the general position. Personally it would appeal to me very strongly if the Board of Trade had an absolute discretion.

98. I am glad to hear you say that because I quite agree with you that it would be most desirable. Perhaps I may be excused if I mention a case which I have in my mind, and on which I am basing my questions—the case of Games which occurred early under the Bankruptcy Act. In that case the bankrupt had a solicitor in South Wales and had a large amount of property, and a very complicated condition of affairs arose. The trustee proposed to be appointed was a tradesman—a grocer in Brecon, and he was supported by a relative of the debtor—his father, I think—in a claim which carried a majority of votes. The Board of Trade objected to the appointment of the trustee on the ground that he had been appointed by persons who had an interest contrary to the joint interest of the creditors, but as reported, Mr. Justice Cave held that that was going beyond their powers, and the trustee was confirmed. The result was that the creditors got nothing and a very large estate was squandered in litigation. Would you propose to give the Board of Trade similar power to that—to administer under deeds of arrangement ?—My personal view is that I should leave it absolutely to the discretion of the Department, knowing from my experience that they would deal fairly all round. I am not quite sure that my view is sufficiently representative of the views of accountants, but personally I think that that would be the best method of dealing with the difficulty, although my comments and my statements are aimed at a specific difficulty namely, the appointment of men who have been noted for mal-administration previously. My present suggestion covers thadifficulty I think, because the Court would support the Department in a case like that. Personally I do go further and say that it would be a very desirable thing that the Board of Trade with the knowledge it has of bankruptcy practitioners, should have absolute power to judge of their suitability.

99. But in many cases under trust deeds as well as in bankruptcy men are appointed who are not professional men ?—They are.

100. And how do you suggest the Board of Trade should obtain information about these men. Under the Bankruptcy Act they obtain information through the Official Receivers who administer trade estates and who know the people in the locality. They know whether the men selected would be in connection with the debtor. Would you propose that the Official Receiver should make similar investigation into the position of the trustee? —I do not think that there would be any practical difficulty in that being done, because all over the country the Official Receivers are fairly well in touch with what is going on in commercial circles, and I know, speaking locally, that they have sufficient knowledge to come to a decision on a point like that.

101. In Armstrong's cases were the creditors ever called together ?—Never.

102. And that I believe is not an uncommon feature. in deeds of arrangement ?—There are certain cases within my knowledge where meetings of creditors have not been called.

103. I mean by the creditors themselves ?—Yes, but I do not think in the course of my practice I have had perhaps more than two deeds since the Act came into force where there has not been a meeting of creditors.

104. I suppose you deal with the larger cases—the commercial cases ?—No, I deal with all sorts, and I make it an invariable practice and I think most accountants do.

105. You think in most deeds of arrangement there is a meeting of creditors ?—Most certainly

106. Either before or after ?—Certainly.

107. What is your objection to requiring the assent of the creditors to the validity of the deed ? I think the Chairman asked you if you thought it would be right to require the assent of the creditors ?

108. (Mr. Evans.) Or a proportion of the creditors —I do not think that it is necessary because I find in practice that creditors will frequently do neither one thing nor the other—they will simply let the thing stand and I do not think that any advantage would be gained

109. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think that it would be right that the property should be assigned by the debtor over their heads ?—I do not think that it is desirable, but my contention is that commercial people are fully alive to their position and where they feel it desirable that another form of administration should take place they are very keen on getting the estate into the Bankruptcy Court.

110. But you do not think it right that there should be the assent of the majority of the creditors for the validity of a deed. At present, as I understand it, the debtor can assign his property to a trustee on any conditions he pleases and without any consultation with any of his creditors and that becomes binding so far as the transfer of his property is concerned under the deed unless it is set aside by a receiving order made within a certain period —three months ; I think that is so ?—Yes, that is the position.

111. So that unless traders take action by going to the Bankruptcy Court they have no power of judging of the terms and conditions on which the bankruptcy estate is assigned ?—That is so ; but my contention is that as the Deed of Arrangement Act is administered at present, creditors are fully alive to, and in every case are properly advised as to what their course of action should be—they are not exactly in the position of being without knowledge. The Deeds of Arrangement Act is administered quite as consistently as the Bankruptcy Act.

112. Do you think in the Armstrong cases the creditors assented to the arrangement under which they acted ? —No.

113. Do not you think that that is rather inconsistent with what you said ?—I do not think so, because you see, I suggest a remedy.

114. No, but as to the fact, do creditors or do they not assent to the deeds which are entered into by the debtors ?—They do not ; but the remedy I suggest would give them sufficient power. If the remedy I suggest were adopted, there would be no deeds in the hands of Armstrong.

115. The remedy you suggest transfers the responsibility to the Board of Trade ?—I should require a certificate which would bar deeds of assignment in the hands of the people you have referred to.

116. But you would not require a certificate of assent of the creditors ?—No, I should not.

117. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I take it that in those cases where a bankrupt has not kept proper books of account you think the law ought to be strengthened ?—Yes.

118. Do you regard the law now to be insufficient which provides for the suspension of discharge ?—In practice it is insufficient, I do not think that sufficient attention is paid, in the consideration of discharges, to this default—that is the view I take.

119. Would you go so far as to require that a discharge should be refused in those cases where, in the opinion of the court, proper books of account have not been kept ?—Yes, that, I think, would perhaps, in the present position of matters, meet the case.

120. And I take it too, that you think that a report as to the conduct of the debtor should be brought to the notice of the court in every case ?—Yes.

121. But in the great majority of cases now, there is never a report of that kind ?—In a great many cases the debtors do not apply.

122. These cases represent about 80 per cent. of the whole ?—I do not know what the percentage is, but I daresay it is a large number.

123. A large percentage ?—Yes.

124. Would it meet your view, if in every case it were made compulsory on the trustee or upon the Official Receiver, within say six months of the termination of the examination of the debtor, to make a report to the court ? —I should not agree with the time suggested.

125. Or such extended time as the court might think fit ?—I should prefer to put it on the ground I indicated to Mr. Smith, namely, within a certain time after the assets were realised.

126. But you would insist on having a report of that kind brought to the notice of the court in every case ?—Yes.

127. And upon that report—the report itself being merely primâ facie evidence, which might be controverted by the evidence brought forward on behalf of the debtor—you would allow the court then to exercise its discretion as to whether the discharge should be granted or not ? —Yes.

128. Have you any view as to the operation of Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in regard to undischarged bankrupts.

129. (Chairman.) Incurring credit, without stating that they are undischarged ?—Yes, there is, however, a serious difficulty there, and I think it is mentioned in one of the clauses as to trading in other people's names. I think some legislation is necessary to avoid the difficulty we so frequently find in practice. A bankrupt does not trouble to apply for a discharge ; he immediately commences under the name of his wife or some convenient relative.

130. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Does not that rather point to the necessity of establishing a system of registration of firms and traders who carry on business in names other than their own ?—I do not know that that would quite meet the difficulty ; because it would be open to the alleged debtor to say that he is not the actual debtor.

131. (Mr. Addison.) With regard to the discharge, you do not think the provisions of the Act sufficiently strong. You know the provision, that where he has not kept proper books of accounts, there are certain limits which the court must not go below ?—Yes, a minimum.

132. Do not you think that that is enough ?—Well, I may judge by what occurs in practice. I do not think that sufficient attention is paid to the debtor's shortcomings, particularly in regard to keeping accounts.

133. You say that the court should refuse a discharge if books of accounts have not been kept ?—Yes.

134. To what cases would you apply that rule ?—The judgment would have to be based on the particular case to which attention was being called—it is a very difficult matter.

135. Of course it would apply, primâ facie, to traders ? —Yes.

136. Considering the variety of traders and the difference in their businesses, do you really suggest that if a little shopkeeper does not keep proper books of account that the court must refuse his discharge ?—Certainly, but as to what are proper books of account opens up a big question. My opinion would be that in the case of a small shopkeeper, a proper record of receipts and payments would be sufficient.

137. I want to ask you on that point—do you find that small shopkeepers keep proper books of account ?—

They do sometimes, but in the majority of cases they do not—that is a great lack, that I think would be partially met by legislation.

138. Or by the future teaching of the board schools ?—And the recognition of the value of accountancy.

139. Do you propose that deeds of arrangement should be made binding on a minority ?—Yes, but I want to be very cautious there. I should like to say that I should consider that the requisite majority should be as high as can conveniently be fixed.

140. Might I ask whether you would include this—that if deeds are to bind a minority that binding power should be exercised by the court on application; that is to say, there should be first of all required the assent of a certain majority, and if a minority dissented application might be made to the court, the court might consider the circumstances, and make the deed binding if it thought fit ?—My contention would be that in a case where a certain majority in number and value assented to the deed that it shou d not be feasible for the dissenting minority to place the estate in bankruptcy. But Mr. Smith asked me the question as to whether I should make it a requirement that there should be a certain assenting majority before the deed should be valid. I do not go that far but where you wish to exercise a right to bind the minority I should say that you must have a requisite majority to bind the minority.

141. About the realisation of assets and delay, do you think that that would be cured partly by a different mode of bringing in the debtor's statement ?—I think the delay generally occurs there and I would bring up the first meeting within the shortest reasonable time.

142. I was going to ask whether you had considered the propriety of there being some power in the court immediately after the receiving order, on the application, say, of creditors or possibly of the Official Receiver, to sanction the earlier realisation of the assets ?—Certainly not. I should oppose it strongly, because the result of inquiry often leads one to alter one's opinion as to realisation.

143. What I mean is such a case—I do not know whether it has come before you—as that where there is a goodwill and where a delay of five or six weeks may utterly destroy the value of that goodwill. If you had power in the court to sanction a sale immediately after the receiving order a sum might be realised for that ?—I have never known such a case, and I should view with strong disapproval any tendency to further facilitate immediate realisation, because my experience teaches me that in the haste to realise one often sacrifices valuable considerations in the way of assets. I think sometimes there is undue haste to realise.

144. You referred to undischarged bankrupts. Have you any views as to what some of us think is the danger of the number of irresponsible undischarged bankrupts who are accumulating amongst us ?—I think it is a very serious matter, and my remarks as to obtaining credit and the commencing of business under other names tend in the same direction. I think it is desirable that there should be some extension of legislation in that respect.

145. You see you are pointing out cases in which the discharge has been refused—that of course would be an increasing number ?—Well, sir, it is at any rate giving the commercial public the knowledge of the position. That is a strong point which I may emphasise.

146. I was rather meaning to ask whether you had considered the propriety of some other form of punishment instead of increasing the number of these non-descript persons ?—I do not know that I have given attention to that view.

147. Have you found in the case of your clients any business difficulties arising from their being brought, say, without their knowledge, into transactions with undischarged bankrupts ?—Yes, certainly.

148. Most of us have ?—Yes, there are so many floating about in space.

149. That is to say, people may find themselves quite unexpectedly engaged in commitments with an undischarged bankrupt ?—Yes.

150. That is to my mind a source of danger to the commercial community ?—I agree.

151. I was telling the Chairman that I had a case quite recently of an important firm in the City, a member of which was an undischarged bankrupt and the firm knew nothing about it. He had come from some other part of the country. He was a very quick smart man, and was taken into the firm. They woke up on some unexpected information to find that a partner in the firm—it was a very considerable firm—was an undischarged bankrupt. I need not say that that was a very distressing thing for them to find out. Have you found similar cases ?—Yes, and, incidental to that point, there is the question of the distribution of assets in the case of a second bankruptcy which is closely allied with it. I myself have had three or four cases in which hardship has arisen. Mr. James Todd. 16 May, 1906.

152. Serious hardships ?—Yes.

153 (Mr. Peat.) Is it your opinion that a bankrupt's discharge should be considered whether he applies for it or not; that is to say, that there are many bankrupts at present who never trouble to apply ?—Yes.

154. And as you say, or as has been said, there is a considerable number of floating bankrupts undischarged who are menaces to the public ?—Yes.

155. Is it your opinion that the discharge should be considered by the authorities whether the bankrupt applies for it or not ?—Yes.

156. Is it your opinion that certain offences should be considered in the nature of criminal offences, I mean in considering a bankrupt's discharge, as, for instance, where the bankruptcy has been brought on by gambling losses ?—Yes.

157. Take a man whose bankruptcy is brought on by gambling, or who states that gambling has been the cause of his assets disappearing, whether he can prove gambling or not. If, in fact, gambling has been the cause of his disaster, would you think that a suspension of discharge was sufficient for that man ?—I am not clear that any other form of arrangement would appeal to me, though. I am not quite satisfied that that would be a sufficient punishment.

158. The mere suspension ?—The difficulty as to the particular form of gambling would enter into the question and it might make it somewhat difficult to deal with what is actually gambling, because some may gamble in sugar and some on the Stock Exchange. That is the difficulty that I feel.

159. In the case of gambling which will result in a debtor's discharge being suspended you are of opinion that nothing more than suspension should follow ?—I am afraid that anything else would not be feasible.

160. Then take the debtor who fails a second time without getting discharged from his first bankruptcy—do you consider that that is also a matter that should be punished by mere suspension of discharge ?—No, I do not. I think that is a case which is stronger which ought to be made and ought to be treated as a penal offence.

160*a*. Take another very common or correlative instance of a cause of failure, namely reckless or fraudulent trading with an absolute and full knowledge of insolvency ?—I should treat that as penal.

161. And not to be settled by the mere suspension of discharge ?—No.

162. As to the failure to keep proper books of account you have already expressed your opinion that that is not a subject for penal punishment ?—I should like it to be so, but I do not think that it is practicable.

163. In regard to the question of assignments you mentioned the difficulty in regard to certain trustees who are improper trustees ?—Yes.

164. Where the Board of Trade might be asked unconditionally to certify a trustee, I think you seemed to find some difficulty, or Mr. Smith seemed to find some difficulty, as to how that could be done. Do you think that could be met to this extent that what I call professional trustees should take a general certificate from the Board of Trade that they are capable of being appointed trustees, and let that certificate be renewed year by year—that would be that members of recognised bodies of accountants should satisfy the Board of Trade by security, or in some other way, that they were suitable as trustees, and should be certified generally, as such ?—Yes, I should view that quite favourably.

165. And then that the chairman of the meeting of the creditors of the debtor who assigns his estate should report to the Board of Trade that A. B. or C. D. had been appointed as trustee—would that meet your point ?—Yes, I think the same point would be met in the way of registration. I do not know that it would necessarily call for the report of the chairman.

166. You have a considerable experience of these deeds of assignment, have you not ?—Yes.

167. Could you give me the percentage which are executed without the Committee of Inspection—is it 1 per cent., or 2 per cent. ?—Considerably more than that.

168. 10 per cent., 15 per cent., or 20 per cent. ?—I should think taking my own experience as a basis, that 25 or 30 per cent., but I have gone a little further and pointed out that in many of these cases at the meeting of creditors I have undertaken to act with a committee.

169. I mean that either in the deed itself, or in the meeting of creditors where no committee is appointed would you say that it is 1 per cent., 2, or 10 per cent. ?—5 per cent.

170. 5 per cent., might be entirely without a committee ?—Yes, but nearly all my deeds are under supervision or a committee is included in the deed itself.

171. You said that in many cases creditors did not assent, or perhaps were not asked to assent. I do not quite know what you said ?—I did not say that they were not asked to assent—they do not take the trouble definitely to assent.

172. Is it your experience that notice is given to all the creditors ?—Invariably, that is with respectable practioners.

173. And they are asked to assent ?—Yes.

174. Is it your experience that creditors rather delay assenting in case somebody should be getting the preference over them—do you find that at all ?—Yes.

175. They say, "We would rather delay assenting because A may get a preference or B may get a preference," and they would like to be in ?—Yes.

176. But do you find that during the course of the execution of the trust at some time or another the creditor assents ?—Yes.

177. That is your experience in the majority of cases ?—The creditor assents at some period during the trust, yes.

178. Not necessarily within the three months ?—True.

179. Do you find any considerable number of cases of blackmail by creditors who, non-assenting, just wait until about a week or ten days before the three months are up and then issue a bankruptcy petition or a writ ?—I think there are numerous cases.

180. Have you experience of that ?—I have not had very much experience of it myself because I find that most of my deeds go through and creditors frequently find that they assented when they had not intended, and there are various other ways in which the difficulty in got over.

181. There are five or six per cent. who go into bankruptcy regularly but I ask you, with your experience, do you know many creditors who blackmail—I do not call it anything else ?—No ; in my personal case I have not very many, but I meet a good deal of it in the course of practice.

182. Do you consider that the majority binding the minority would cure that evil ?—I think it would. As I have said before, creditors in the various trades are highly organised now, and they know just as much about deeds of assignment as we do who handle them.

183. Do you ever find that gambling is put forward as a cause to account for insolvency when gambling is not proved ?—I do think so. I think it is made an excuse and is an easy method of explanation.

184. A man says he has gambled on the turf or somewhere else and has no record of it, and that is his reason why his assets are short ?—It is an easy method of explaining his shortage.

185. You find that ?—Yes.

186. (Mr. Richardson.) Just one or two commercia questions—you say you would have the accountant's statement with the debtor's statement ?—Yes ; I would have a certificate of figures.

187. Can you tell me how that would benefit the creditors ?—I have indicated that I think it would materially shorten the time.

188. You think so ?—That statement would be lodged earlier. I know a large number of cases where the debtor says "I cannot file a statement ; I cannot make out accounts" and so on. I think it would shorten the time and I think it would be a great advantage in realisation.

189. Would you in that case stipulate the time for the meeting, because if you put it into an accountant's hands, what is there to prevent him letting it go on for months ? He might say "It is a difficult account ; I cannot get it out any quicker," and in that way, of course, costs would go running on all the time and the accountant would get the benefit and not the creditors. At present the debtor gives his statement and that is taken at an early meeting as to what is best to be done. The accountant's report would only be a moderately accurate one, because the accountant must take a great deal of his statement from the debtor ?—Yes, but I have pointed out that the advantage would be reaped, in my opinion, in the smaller estates. One point that has not been touched is that the cost to creditors of such an inquiry as I have indicated would be comparatively small. The advantage you would get would be the advantage in the shortening of the delay and the improved statement of the position upon which frequently, in the smaller estates, the realisation is based. I know innumerable cases where the debtor's statement has formed the basis of the realisation and it has been totally short.

190. In your item 4 on page 4 you say, "Amendment is required to secure a more immediate realisation in bankruptcy cases," and you go on to give cases namely, the delay occurring between the making of the receiving order and the appointment of the trustee. Have you any other suggestion to make as to the realisation of estates more quickly than now ?—I think I have said that I view with strong disfavour the craving for immediate realisation. I think that it is undesirable. I would shorten the time between the making of the order and the vesting the estate in the hands of the administrator. I view with strong disfavour the immediate realisation of an estate, the immediate selling by auction of the estate, except in certain trades where the system of selling by tender is favourable.

191. Do not you agree that a great deal of the money of estates is frittered away during long terms of realisation ? Do not you agree that that happens very frequently ?—No, I do not think so.

192. That where an estate takes a long time in realisation a very large percentage of the assets has been frittered away in realisation. Would it not happen that if the realisation took place quickly the shortage would be much less ?—No, I do not agree. I think within a reasonable time, speaking generally, estates are realised with the exception of certain specific trades or businesses where the assets require—where there are equities—nursing. On the whole, in deeds of assignment and in ordinary bankruptcy administration the realisation is not unduly prolonged. There are exceptional cases, I agree, but the benefit through nursing an estate is considerably greater than the benefit gained by the shortening in time and forced realisation.

193. (Mr. Chamberlin.) The only point that I see has not been touched upon in this proof is where you say that you would have the existing laws relating to the registration of securities—what does that mean ?—There are certain securities which I think it desirable should be registered. Difficulties are often found, in regard to hiring agreements particularly.

194. I take it from all you have told us to-day that your grievances are against the working of the Act rather than against the Act itself. Is that not so ?—I think that is so.

195. (Mr. Barker.) Do not you think if a proper set of books were kept by a debtor, it would in many cases prevent his bankruptcy ?—I do.

196. And would you recommend that where a debtor has not kept a proper set of books so that he can show his gambling and other transactions, that he should be punished with a term of imprisonment?—I can hardly go that far because there is a difficulty which was indicated by Mr. Addison, I think, that in certain trades, those of ordinary small retailers for instance—it would be very difficult to establish what should be the particular form of bookkeeping, and it might act rather unjustly. I think the punishment would be better by not granting the discharge at all.

197. Do you think that that is any punishment at all?—I think so, incorporated with the other suggestions of bringing him up before the court.

198. Do you think that withholding the discharge is any punishment whatever?—I should not like to go so far as to say I should punish him. As an accountant it would be an advantage to me but I am afraid the thing is not quite practicable.

199. Do you think if a man has indulged in hazardous speculation he should not be punished with imprisonment?—I should not go so far as that because I should require a definition of hazardous speculation.

200. Have you not found frequently when a man has offered we will say 10s. in the £ or a composition to his creditors that a few small creditors stand out with a view of getting paid in full?—Yes.

201. And you would agree, I suppose, that the majority should rule in a case of that sort?—I should want an appreciable majority.

202. A majority of three-fourths?—Three-fourths in number and value I suggested. I think there is a tendency to exploit the position of the law in the way that I think Mr. Peat indicated in some cases.

203. Now the assignment of book debts—do not you think that that should be treated in the same way as Bills of Sale?—I am inclined to agree that it should be registered.

204. (Mr. Evans.) With regard to the application for discharge do you suggest that the application should be made in every case?—That the matter should be brought before the court in every case, The debtor might not apply but it would come before the court on report—a report on the debtor's conduct. The debtor himself might not apply.

205. You could not compel him to apply. The only thing you could do would be to say that if the debtor did not apply within a certain time he could not apply at all—Would you suggest that?—I think that would operate satisfactorily.

206. It might in most cases, I think, but it would be possible to shut out a case of this kind. Supposing a man found he was able to pay 20s. in the £, after a limited time, it would shut out a case of that kind?—Yes. I think the difficulty might be met in the way indicated—it should go before the court either on his application or in another form if he did not apply.

207. With regard to the trustees, did I gather from you in answer to Mr. Peat that you intended that only certain persons certified by the Board of Trade should be capable of acting as trustees?—I do not know that Mr. Peat conveyed that quite.

208. (Mr. Peat.) I did not convey that.

209. (Witness.) But with regard to one section, what Mr. Peat indicated was that there should be a sufficient certificate.

210. Just as bailiffs are certified by the County Court?—I can hardly say that.

211. Do you think that it would be desirable that the registration of deeds of arrangement should take place in the County Court as well as in the Central Office?—I think it would be an advantage.

212. Would it not have this advantage that the Registrar of the County Court might come in and make a report to the Board of Trade?—I could hardly agree, because the County Court Registrar is not a registration official who is in touch with the community.

213. At all events the County Court Registrar might send a notice of the registration of the deed to the Official Receiver?—The particular form I do not think would be very material.

214. I particularly want to know what you mean by making certain things penal offences. You suggested with regard to not keeping books of account properly. The books that are to be kept are specified in the Act of Parliament and where they are not kept the person is to be punished by a refusal of his discharge?—Yes.

215. You know that by the Act of Parliament the bankruptcy judge has a discretion which enables him to grant a discharge subject to suspension in cases, for instance, where there has been gambling or trading after knowledge of insolvency, and so on. Do you suggest that in those cases also there should be a provision compelling the County Court judge to refuse a discharge?—I have tried to make my position quite clear in regard to that. I think too much leniency exists in dealing with that section.

216. That is pure administration, is not it?—Yes.

217. Do you suggest that trading after knowledge of insolvency, for instance, should be made a penal offence subject to imprisonment?—I am taking the broad definition.

218. Would you be in favour of imposing a penalty which could be enforced if there were no goods or chattels by imprisonment?—I should not go so far as that because there is always a difficulty in proving the particular knowledge of insolvency. That is a very great difficulty. There is just one point I should like to mention which has not been touched upon, and that is as regards the examination of debtors with a view to the disclosure of assets and the conduct of debtors up to the date of the meeting of creditors. In private arrangements my experience is that there is in most cases a very effective examination by creditors and their representatives at all private meetings.

219. I want to put one more question to you only—is it your experience particularly in small cases, that the business is carried on in the name of a wife by changing the initials of A. Smith, for instance, into J. Smith?—Very frequently.

220. Do you suggest anything at all to do away with the possibility of that?—Only that it should be made an offence in the way indicated subject to the usual proof of course.

221. That the business is in fact the business of the debtor or it would not be carried on in his house?—Yes, it would be a question of fact.

222. (Mr. Smith.) Arising out of some of the questions which have been put, I would like to ask you one or two further questions, and one of those is as to the majority binding the minority. I understand you to say that a majority of three-fourths in number and value of the creditors should have in all cases power to bind the minority?—Yes.

223. Was not that the condition which prevailed under the liquidation by arrangement clauses in the Act of 1869?—I think it was.

224. And was not that the alleged ground on which that Act was abolished?—My experience does not go so far back as that.

225. Was it not one of the alleged grounds?—I do not know.

226. Was it not alleged by Mr. Chamberlain when he brought in his Bankruptcy Bill in the House of Commons that one of his reasons for bringing it in was the abuses which had arisen under the deeds of arrangement clauses in the Act of 1869?—Yes.

227. Can you describe any of the abuses which arose under the deeds of arrangement clauses in that Act which would not arise under the Act now?—I must explain that I was not in practice under the 1869 Act.

Mr. CHARLES PARSONS, called; and Examined.

16 May, 1906.

228. (Chairman.) I think, Mr. Parsons, you reside at No. 70, New Street, Birmingham ?—Yes, and at Nuneaton.

229. And I think you attend as representing the National Chamber of Trade and the Ironmongers Federation ?—Yes.

230. Have you had a long experience in connection with trading insolvencies ?—About thirty-seven years.

231. And therefore you have had experience of more than one Bankruptcy Act ?—Of the 1869 Act and the present one.

232. Which is the portion of the Bankruptcy Act to which you have directed particular attention with a view to this matter ?—That of the penal clauses.

233. What is your view, first of all, as to the present state of the law being unsatisfactory if that is your opinion ?—My opinion is that it is almost impossible to get the Official Receiver to institute a prosecution. Unless the jury are satisfied that the bankrupt intended to defraud you cannot get the jury to convict. In fact, I have not been able to get a prosecution in any case. Even if you had a subscription amongst creditors to institute a prosecution you would never get a conviction, because you must prove that the bankrupt had an intent to defraud, and it is a very difficult thing to prove a man's intention.

234 As regards the present state of the law and as to the conditions on which the debtor's discharge is suspended or refused—in your opinion does that require alteration ?—That requires amending altogether.

235. In what direction ?—Suspension of the debtor's discharge is practically no punishment at all, I take it.

236. Would you make the present provisions more stringent ?—More stringent.

237. Would you go so far as to make any of the offences under the Bankruptcy Act penal offences ?—I should

238. Such as ?—Buying goods or manufacturing same and realising them at a loss. That would be one item ; another would be gambling, either in horse-racing or on the Stock Exchange with money belonging to his or their creditors ; not keeping proper books of account so as to disclose the position of affairs ; a debtor carrying on business and ordering goods after knowing he is insolvent.

239. I think that your society has passed a resolution on this subject ?—Yes, I think I sent you a copy of it.

240. Yes. Perhaps I could read it to you : "That the penal provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883, and 1890, and the Debtors' Act, 1869, as at present in force, are totally ineffectual for the punishment of fraudulent debtors inasmuch as it is almost an impossibility in any case to prove the bankrupt's fraudulent intent, and that in the interests of commerce the immediate attention of the Government is required to remedy such defects." Then I think you have sent us a list of the trading associations that have passed that resolution ?—Yes.

241. I think the members of the Committee have got that list. That list is :—

"Birmingham, Brighton, Bristol, Burton-on-Trent, Cheltenham, Leeds, Liverpool, London and District, Newcastle-on-Tyne and Gateshead, North Staffordshire, Southport, Warwickshire, National Chamber of Trade. Ironmongers Federated Association Conference :—Eastbourne, Nottingham, Midland Counties Federation." In addition to those with which you have been kind enough to favour us, are there any other matters to which your attention has been directed and on which you would be so good as to favour us with your views ?—This is one—every settlement of personal chattels made before or in consideration of marriage shall be void as against a trustee in bankruptcy unless registered.

242. Is there any other ?—Punishment by imprisonment of an undischarged bankrupt who becomes bankrupt a second time ; firms, names to be registered within one month after commencing business ; and any alteration in the name to be registered within the same time. A great many firms are trading under another name and it is very difficult to get at who are the real parties. Those are the only things that I have to bring before you personally. With regard to the Official Receiver the difficulty is to get him to move at all in the matter of bankruptcy.

243. You mean with respect to a prosecution ?—Yes, with respect to a prosecution.

244. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think the objection of the Official Receiver to prosecute arises from personal defects in administration ?—I really do not know what the reason is.

245. You do not know the reason ?—No, I know that if there are no effects there is not any possibility of it.

246. Do you mean that he never prosecutes ?—I have never known any instance where he prosecutes.

247. In what court is that ?—In Leicester and Warwick.

248. Have you had no criminal prosecutions there ?—I have never known of one.

249. In Leicester ?—In Leicester and Coventry, which are the Bankruptcy Courts that I am mostly connected with.

250. Have you asked the reason why in a proper case prosecutions have not been instituted ?—I have not.

251. Have you made any representations to the Board of Trade on the subject ?—No.

252. What amendment would you propose in the Debtors Act ?—With regard to what, sir ?

253. With regard to the question of intention to defraud ? You say you cannot get a conviction without proving intention to defraud ?—I take it in this way : supposing you or I should steal a loaf of bread, the question of intention would not then be inquired into, the evidence of the fact would be sufficient.

254. I do not know whether you have any suggestion to make as to amending the Debtors Act on that point ?—Not more than this, that I take it that the fact of a man having committed and been proved to have committed a fraud should be sufficient evidence of his intention.

255. Yes, if it is a fraud if he commits a certain act, but according to the Act at present, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intention to defraud the fact is sufficient evidence of a criminal offence. Do you suggest any alteration of that ?—I do not suggest any alteration if that be put in force.

256. Is your objection, then, to the interpretation which is put upon it ?—I will give you an illustration of a creditor in an estate at Leicester. There the bankrupts had only been in business twelve months and they had got into debt for £1,600. I went to the meeting of creditors, and after waiting some considerable time I found that I was the only creditor who had turned up. I asked the Official Receiver why it was that creditors did not attend. He said, "I think the fact is that when a bankrupt files a petition they simply wipe their hands of it and forget all about it if there are no assets, because it is not worth bothering about." I said, "I came on purpose to prosecute, and if I could have got one or two creditors to join me I should prosecute the debtor." He said, "You had better keep your money in your pocket." I said, "Why should that be so," and he referred to this clause in the Bankruptcy Act, that you must satisfy the Judge or jury of a man's intention to commit fraud. He said it was impossible to do that. On that I came away and the thing dropped through. That is the best illustration I can give you.

257. And you would propose to do away with that and make the fact itself, irrespective of the intention to defraud, sufficient ?—Yes, I would make the fact itself sufficient.

258. (Chairman.) In a great many instances, under the Debtors Act, the burden of proof is the other way, that is to say, that the matter is criminal, unless the debtor can satisfy the jury that he had no intent to defraud ?—I have given you my experience in that one particular case, and after that, I thought there was no need thinking of prosecuting a debtor.

259. (Mr. Addison.) I want to ask one or two questions about the registration of firms. Where do you propose the registration of firms should take place?—I should propose that the addresses should be lodged anywhere where they could be obtained. They might be remitted to the County Court in the district where the firms were engaged in business, and in that case you could apply to the County Court for the address.

260. What would you say to having a central registration at Somerset House?—I think that would do, if it would be for the convenience of the trading public, and if that could be seen, and you could also get the information at the nearest County Court.

261. Do you consider what a voluminous registry would soon be established if that were done, taking into consideration the deaths, removals, and cases of going out of business that would occur?—I know that it would be somewhat troublesome.

262. How is it to be kept up?—I do not quite know—I have not worked out any scheme for doing it.

263. You have not formulated any scheme?—No.

264. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Might I put a question with regard to the regist ation of firms. Perhaps you may be aware that the subject of the registration of firms has been before Parliament on several occasions, and that a Select Committee has recommended that such a course should be adopted?—Yes.

265. And that as late as the year 1900, a Committee reported in favour of the desirability of the establishment of the registration of firms and persons who trade in names other than their own; but while it was suggested that there were some departmental difficulties in the way of carrying out that particular Bill, at the same time special legislation was recommended on the subject—you are in favour of that?—I am in favour of that, if we knew where to apply for the names of the firms. There are so many firms that are carried on under names other than their own.

266. (Mr. Richardson.) I take it that you would be satisfied if the Official Receiver had power to order prosecution, if he were satisfied that the parties had intended to run away with the assets.

267. (Mr. Evans.) No, I think it was exactly the contrary. He said the Official Receiver would not do it.

268. (Mr. Richardson.) If he were requested to do it by the creditor or creditors, that it should be obligatory upon him to do it?—I believe that that would answer the purpose.

269. In the case of a debtor starting business again in any other than his own name, say, where A. Duncan fails, and three months afterwards starts business as B. Duncan, B. Duncan being the debtor's brother, would you be in favour of B. Duncan, on his admission that he has allowed his name to be used, being held responsible, where it was a case of a second bankruptcy?—Yes, I would, the same as a man putting his wife's name up, which is often done, in place of his own.

270. (Mr. Barker.) If a proper set of books are kept, in many cases it would prevent a debtor failing, would it not?—I think so. In the bulk of cases, especially in the smaller trades, the excuse is that they have kept no books.

271. In your experience in the cases you have come across that is so?—They have kept no books and no receipts or payments or anything of that kind.

272. Would you agree to a term of imprisonment being given to a man who had not kept a proper set of books?—I think it would very soon purify the atmosphere if we had some stringent clause of that kind. I do not mean in the ready-money business—in the case, say, of a potato merchant or a trader of that kind where they sell small things for cash, but in the case of business in the ordinary way of trade I think it should be compulsory that a proper set of books should be kept.

273. Do not you think that in the case that you have put that they should keep a cash book?—I think I should not make any exception in that case.

274. Do not you think that where a man entered into a gambling transaction or a hazardous speculation that he should be obliged to enter that on his books?—Certainly.

275. And that if he has not entered it do not you think he should be punished?—I think so. In many cases that is the excuse given—that they have invested on the Stock Exchange or gambled on horse racing. That is given as a reason why they have failed.

276. And if he has failed to enter that into his books?—It should be punishable. That is my idea of it.

277. (Mr. Evans.) You are aware I suppose that a creditor can now go to the Court and obtain an Order for the trustee to prosecute if there is a reasonable prospect of a conviction?—It may be so in print, but in my experience it is hopeless.

278. You complain as a creditor—have you gone to the Court yourself?—The only cases in which I have gone have been two to the Leicester Bankruptcy Court, and after the last one to which I have alluded I thought it was of no use trying to do anything.

279. Did you yourself go to the Court?—I did not apply. I simply explained affairs to the Official Receiver and said I was prepared to pay my share of the expenses of the prosecution.

280. But are you aware that you can yourself go to the Court and ask the Court to prosecute. That is by Section 16 of the Debtors Act (reading the Section)?—The difficulty is that jurors take a lenient view of these things, some of them being themselves undischarged bankrupts.

281. (Mr. Smith.) The Official Receiver has been referred to, and it is a somewhat personal matter. May I ask you when this took place?—It is a couple of years ago.

282. Was it the present Official Receiver of Coventry?—It was at Leicester.

283. I thought you said it was at Coventry?—No, at Leicester. I should like to read you this cutting from the Daily Mail of to day, as illustrating what I mean. "The discharge of Benjamin Woolf, a furniture dealer, of King Street, Hammersmith, was suspended in the Bankruptcy Court yesterday for six years. The Official Receiver contended that Woolf had been guilty of fraud and that he had contributed to his bankruptcy by rash speculation." What is the good of suspending such a man for six years or sixte n years?

284. (Mr. Evans.) You mean that there ought to be a provision to enable the trustee to prosecute in such a case as that?—Certainly. That is a cutting from the Daily Mail of to day. There a man gets suspended for six years who has been engaged in rash speculation.

285. (Mr. Barker.) Can you suggest any improvement for carrying out the realisation of estates for the benefit of creditors?—I do not know that I gave any suggestion in that way. As a rule if the estates are of any size they get a respectable accountant, or someone who is able to deal with the estate, and I think as a rule they do what they can to realise to the best advantage. If it is the creditors' trustee they get competent people to realise to the best advantage.

MR. EDWARD WILLIAM FORWARD, called; and Examined.

286. (Chairman.) I think you practice at No. 6, Parliament Street, Hull?—Yes.

287. I think you are Vice-President of the Hull Incorporated Law Society?—I am.

288. And I think you are also the sole partner in the firm of Champney & Forward of Hull?—Yes, for over ten years.

289. And you have had considerable experience in a practice extending over sixteen years?—Prior to going to Hull, I had sixteen years' experience both in London and in the country.

290. And has your experience been mainly in the conveyancing branch of legal practice?—Yes.

291. I think the point on which you desire most to assist the Committee is on the question of the position of innocent parties who deal with an undischarged bankrupt in regard to his real estate?—That is so.

292. By the 44th Section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, one knows that all the property of the bankrupt—real and personal—vests in the trustee in bankruptcy?—Yes.

293. Under decisions which I will just ask you a word or two about, if I may, in a moment, it has been held that transactions with an undischarged bankrupt in respect of personal property if made bonâ fide are protected?—Yes, until the trustee makes any claim.

294. That, I think, extends, if one may say so, broadly to chattels, choses in actions, and leaseholds?—That is so.

295. Now in regard to freehold land, I think your practical experience shows that a person who deals with an undischarged bankrupt in respect of land acquired after the adjudication in bankruptcy is not protected?—No, not as regards freeholds.

296. That is to say that notwithstanding that he has either advanced money upon it or bought such a freehold, the trustee in bankruptcy can come in and take it away?—Unless in the case of a mortgage the money has been advanced in pursuance of a prior agreement.

297. That, it is needless to say, is very difficult to prove?—Of course it is.

298. Just before I come to one or two instances of it, would you kindly tell us what would be your view as to the remedy for that?—To place it practically on the same footing as personal estate, that is that dealings bona fide with an undischarged bankrupt with regard to real estate should be protected until the trustee intervenes.

299. Bonâ fide dealings with the bankrupt notwithstanding knowledge of his bankruptcy?—Notwithstanding knowledge of his bankruptcy the same as it is in personal estate.

300. I think that in cases of real estate that the decisions have shown that knowledge or no knowledge—even without knowledge—it does not make any difference? There is no protection, you may say, with regard to real estate.

301. I have heard Lord Justice Vaughan Williams say—perhaps this is rather trespassing on purely legal grounds—that the origin of the doctrine which protects transactions in respect of personal estate is that the trustee is supposed, by not having intervened, to have allowed the bankrupt to carry them on, creating a sort of estoppel?—I do not know what may have been the origin of it; I do not remember that reference.

302. Would there be any objection, in your view, to that being applied to real estate and making the doctrine extend to that?—I do not think there would be.

303. Otherwise, if it is not supported by some such doctrine as that, there is a little difficulty in seeing how the Courts could protect a transaction by one man with another man's property—I mean the statute makes everything the absolute property of the trustee?—Yes, it does, that is where I think it wants altering to some extent.

304. Would there, may I ask, be any conveyancing difficulty owing to the fact that the land actually vests in fee simple in the trustee, if a section were passed extending the protection to real estate?—I think that any difficulty there would be could be easily got over by the drafting of a Bill.

305. I think that on the instructions of your Society a Bill was drafted, was it not?—It was not exactly on the instructions of my Society. At the suggestion of Mr. Gerald Balfour we brought the matter before the Law Society—the United Kingdom Society—and it was they who introduced the two Bills and Sir Albert Rollit, who was President of the Society at the time, and Sir Henry Fowler, backed the two Bills.

306. And what happened to the Bills?—They were blocked on each occasion by a private Member.

307. And their effect would have been?—I have prints of the two Bills; there are simply two clauses in them.

308. I think the leading clause was "In any bankruptcy, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the title of the bankrupt to any property acquired by or devolving on him after the commencement of the bankruptcy and before his discharge shall, subject as hereinafter provided, be, and be deemed to have been, valid and effectual as against the trustee of the property of the bankrupt in favour of the following persons, viz., (1) Any person deriving title to such property under, or making any payment, conveyance, transfer or delivery, of such property to or by the direction of the bankrupt in good faith and for valuable consideration, after the order of adjudication without notice that the trustee has intervened and claimed the property and whether with or without notice of the bankruptcy." And then there is a proviso that the Act shall not affect the title to property acquired by a trustee in bankruptcy before the commencement of the Act. In your opinion, as a conveyancer, would that effect the object which you think would be desirable if it were passed into law?—I think so.

309. (Mr. Evans.) There is nothing there transferring legal estate.

310. (Chairman.) No. I think you have obtained, or your Society has obtained, an opinion from Mr. Wolstenholme more particularly with reference to the case of Bird v. Philpott ?—Yes, it was mainly on that judgment and as the result of my own personal case that I did so.

311. Perhaps you will kindly tell the Committee what was the case in which you had personal experience of the unfair operation of the law as it at present stands ?—I entered into a contract to lend a sum of money on mortgage of real estate. Before the completion of the mortgage I found that the conveyance had not been taken—that the mortgagor was in possession of the land under a building contract. I completed the mortgage, my money going to make up the purchase money. Subsequently the mortgagor was adjudicated bankrupt, and it then transpired that he had been previously bankrupt and was still undischarged in another court where he had previously carried on a totally different business. In the one case he was carrying on the business of a builder and in the other he was in partnership with several others carrying on a lime quarry. The Official Receiver, as trustee in the first bankruptcy, claimed all the assets in the second bankruptcy, including the property on which I had lent my money. But it appeared that the general creditors in the first bankruptcy had been paid 20s. in the £, together with 4 per cent. interest, but the bankrupt's partners had not been paid, and there was a sum of money owing to them. Negotiations took place between myself and the Official Receiver and first one got into possession of the property and then the other—we kept on putting one another out in rather an absurd way, and we kept on threatening one another, but the result was that the Official Receiver took no steps for a time and then approached me with a view to a settlement. I got fairly easy terms, but the reason, I think, was simply not the want of strength on the part of the trustee's case, but the bankrupt's partners had looked upon the debt as a bad one for some years and were not disposed to find any funds with which to fight me, as I had threatened to fight the case to the bitter end. So in the end I paid the trustee a small sum and he gave me a conveyance of all his interest in the property.

312. I daresay you know, because I see you are acquainted with the case of Bird v. Philpott, that in that case the creditors in the first bankruptcy had to be paid off in full ?—Yes.

313. (Mr. Evans.) What is the reference to that case.

314. (Chairman.) It is in 1900 Law Reports (Chancery).

315. (Witness.) It is in 82 Law Times Reports, page 110, also.

316. (Chairman.) I ought not to detain you too long on this point, but you know of other cases in which mortgagees have had to pay the debts in the first bankruptcy in order to get their mortgages secured ?—We have had two other cases in Hull since mine.

317. Then I think Mr. Wolstenholme advised that Bird v. Philpott was good law ?—He did.

318. (Mr. Evans.) Who is responsible for the drafting of this section in Sir Albert Rollit's Bill ?—I cannot tell you.

319. Do you agree in principle with this: that there ought to be as much check as possible upon undischarged bankrupts' dealings with any property or trading in any way before they obtain their discharge ?—Yes, I think I do.

320. Do you think it is right to ask for an improvement in the law in the direction you have indicated to protect people in their transactions with an undischarged bankrupt, who have knowledge of the prior bankruptcy as well as those who have no knowledge of the bankruptcy ?—I do not see why it should not be put on the same footing as personal estate.

321. Would it satisfy you if you protected transactions with persons who have no knowledge of the prior bankruptcy ?—I should not have much fault to find with that.

322. That would mean leaving out from this clause Sub-section 6 the words "and whether with or," so that it would read "without notice that the trustee has intervened and claimed the property, and without notice of the bankruptcy"?—I should not have much fault to find with that, except that there would then be a difference between real and personal estate, and I do not see why there should be that difference.

323. (Mr. Peat.) When you answered a question just now you indicated that in your view a difference should be made between transactions by those who have knowledge of the bankruptcy and those who have not knowledge of the bankruptcy—I think that is so. Did not you say that in answer to Mr. Evans ?—I should have no serious objection to there being a distinction, but primarily I think that real estate should be put on the same footing as personal estate and the transaction protected, whether the party transacting the business with the undischarged bankrupt was aware of the bankruptcy or not—either by altering the law with regard to personal property or putting real property on the same lines.

324. Is it, in your opinion, necessary to make a difference between the rights of a person who knew of a bankruptcy and the rights of a person who did not know of a bankruptcy ?—I think it would be equitable that there should be a difference.

325. How is it possible easily to find out whether a man dealing with a bankrupt knew that he was a bankrupt or not ?—The onus should be on the trustee claiming the property.

326. The onus should be on the person claiming ?—On the trustee claiming the property, to show that the party dealing with the undischarged bankrupt had notice of the bankruptcy or had knowledge of the bankruptcy.

327. It is a very difficult thing, I think, to bring home to a man whether he had knowledge or not ?—I quite agree with you.

328. And therefore I asked that question, whether in your judgment a difference in the law should be made as regards the rights of a man who has knowledge and the rights of a man who has not knowledge, on the ground of the difficulty of proving and bringing home to the person a knowledge of the bankruptcy, or an absence of knowledge. I think you have answered that as far as you can go unless you wish to say something else on the subject ?—No, I think I have expressed my views.

329. The evil which you point out arises from the fact that there are so many undischarged bankrupts moving about and creating difficulty to trade in the capacity of undischarged bankrupts ?—That is so, and it is absolutely impossible to identify them in a bankruptcy that has taken place in another place under another name. No register is any good.

330. Is it your opinion that every bankrupt should be compelled to come forward for his discharge, and that the question of his discharge should be considered, whether he makes application for it or not ?—I cannot say that I have considered that point.

331. It is not within the evidence that you propose to submit ?—No.

332. You have not considered it ?—No; but then, I think, in any case we should get to the question of the insufficiency of any register because it would be a case of registering the discharge or non-discharge; and if the trading was under a different name and in a different place, one would not be able to get at it by a register.

333. However, you have not considered the point sufficiently to give evidence about it ?—I have not.

334. Is it your opinion that the property acquired by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy, but before his discharge—I mean by property, not only chattels but freeholds and every class of property—should be available in the first instance to pay his debts in the second bankruptcy before the trustee in the first bankruptcy has any rights at all ?—I do.

335. (Mr. Addison.) Your answers as to the register have practically dealt with one point I was going to put to you—namely, that no register would deal with the difficulty ?—No register would be of any good from that point of view.

336. There was one other point I wanted you to consider, and that was this title dependent on want of notice is not a title you can force on a purchaser. Therefore, if we make the title of the person dealing with a bankrupt dependent on want of notice, he does not get a good title ?—No, it is not satisfactory; to use a vulgar expression, I would rather go the whole hog and have it as it is in this Bill, either with or without notice.

337. A man who has dealt with a bankrupt may get a good title, not knowing anything of the bankruptcy, but he does not get a marketable title, which he should get ? —Yes, he may get a good holding title.

338. Have you had much experience in bankruptcy practice ?—No, I would rather not deal with the question of bankruptcy practice. I have really had very little experience of bankruptcy work pure and simple.

339. (Mr. Smith.) Do not you think that there is a difference between personal property and real property in this respect, that all commercial dealings would be affected by the alteration of the law with regard to personal property, so as to bring it into conformity with the present law with regard to land, and that that would be a very objectionable state of things ?—Most decidedly—I want to bring land on to the same lines as personal estate.

340. Do not you recognise the distinction between the two classes of operations—in the one case of deliberate dealing with land, which is generally done under legal advice, and with all due formalities, it would involve the necessary searches of various registers ; whereas in the other with regard to personal property, it would be impossible for a person giving credit to the bankrupt to go and search with a view of ascertaining his position ?—I quite agree.

341. Probably that is the basis of the distinction drawn by the Courts of Law ?—That may be so. I do not find any fault with the law with regard to personal estate what I want to see altered is the law with regard to real estate.

342. I do not know whether the proof which Mr. Forward has furnished us with is to be held as before the Committee to deal with ; but I have a copy of the proof which Mr. Forward has been good enough to give us, and I would like to ask whether the paragraph on the top of page 6 which is marked with marks of quotation is really quoted, or indicates the witness's own observations ? —That is a quotation from Mr. Wolstenholme's opinion.

343. The first part I recognise as a quotation from counsel, but the second part I have some doubt about, as to whether it is put forward as Mr. Wolstenholme's statement with regard to bankruptcy registers ?—That is his opinion. I think I have a print of it which we have circulated throughout England, that is to say, a circular that my Society sent to all the law societies in England on the point, and giving a copy of the questions put to Mr. Wolstenholme, and setting out his answers.

344. I refer to the paragraph beginning " Several attempts have been made to secure a proper register of bankrupts." Is that Mr. Wolstenholme's statement ?—That is his—I thought I might be asked questions about it.

345. You have not put it forward in your evidence, and I do not know whether I can ask you any questions on that ; but do you adopt the statement of the facts by Mr. Wolstenholme ?—As far as that is concerned, my personal experience of searching in bankruptcy is somewhat stale. I have been down in Hull for over ten years, and personal searches have been out of my line, so that I should hardly like to pronounce an opinion on that, but I should like if that point is raised to draw attention to a note in Key & Elphinstone's Conveyancing Precedents, where they adopt very much the same view as Mr. Wolstenholme. The note there in the 6th edition, volume I., page 439, says :—" Searches for bankruptcies ought also to be made, but they are necessarily imperfect, as there appears to be no statutory provision for the registration of receiving orders or adjudications, and that though a register is kept at the Court of Bankruptcy both of town and country bankruptcies, the latter is not kept up to date."

346. Would you be surprised to know that a bankruptcy register is kept up in all respects to date—at least to the day after the Gazette notice—the bankruptcy register is written up ?—If you tell me so, I am perfectly prepared to accept it, but my point is that no register is of any good.

347. I quite understand that, but I was referring to the statement here made which has not got on our notes, and I do not think that it is desirable that it should get on our notes, Mr. Chairman, because I believe it is made under a total misapprehension. I am assured that the registrar who could be called before this Committee has instructions, and I believe he acts upon those instructions to make an entry when the Gazette notice appears, and I believe it is made within twenty-four hours of the notice of adjudication and not only of adjudication but all the other steps up to the discharge of the debtor ?

348. I may also say that there is an index of the bankruptcy register ?—Yes, I remember that.

349. A fresh index is issued every five years, in which the whole of the cases during those five years are put in absolutely complete alphabetical order, so that a consultation of those registers for five years will always give you the name of any bankrupt under the present Act. Of course, that does not meet the difficulty which is raised on this point of a debtor becoming bankrupt in one name and then going and trading in another, but I do not see how any register can possibly meet that difficulty ?—No, it is impossible.

350. I thought it right to ask these questions, because otherwise the members of the Committee who have this under consideration may be under the misapprehension that there is some ground for the statement made whereas there is none.

351. (Chairman.) On this point I propose to circulate amongst the Committee a memorandum which has been drawn up on the present rules relating to the bankruptcy register.

352. I was going to ask you one question about " with or without notice " transactions—that after a receiving order the onus is generally cast upon the person to prove that he had not had notice ?—I quite see, but I think the onus should be on the trustee. I think the innocent party, or presumably innocent party, should be protected. I do not think that the benefits accruing to other parties are sufficient to justify the onus being thrown on the innocent party, because, presumably, he would be innocent, as, if he had knowledge he would not enter into the transaction.

353. I do not know if your views are at all affected by this—that this is a very old branch in bankruptcy law. I mean it was very much more stringent at one time than it is now ?—That is so. I am a strong Conservative, but at the same time I should like very much to see this altered.

354. I mean for some reason or other the Legislature of old times did think that a bankrupt's property—after acquired property—ought to be divisible amongst the creditors regardless of the transactions he had entered into ?—Quite so, but I trust we improve as we go on.

355. (Mr. Evans.) May I put this, as this is rather important, as to whether the notice ought to affect it ? Take the simple, concrete case of a bankrupt undischarged, who deals possibly with a friend of his ; the friend knows of his bankruptcy, but notwithstanding that enters into a deal. How is the trustee to prove in that case that there was notice of the bankruptcy ? Would not you, first of all, call upon a man who entered into the transaction at any rate, if necessary, to go upon his oath and say : " I knew nothing about it " ?—I do not know that there would be any objection to the man being primarily put upon his oath as to whether he had notice or had not, and then leaving it to the trustee subsequently.

356. Then that would shift the onus on to the person dealing with the undischarged bankrupt ?—Primarily, and then it would be for the trustee to prove the contrary.

357. The question of onus is, of course, merely as to who deals with the matter first.

358. (Mr. Addison.) You spoke of this, Mr. Chairman, as old law ?

359. (Chairman.) Yes.

360. (Mr. Addison.) Formerly it applied to traders only.

361. (Chairman.) That is quite true.

362. (Mr. Addison.) Then what were called certificates were granted much more quickly. We had nothing like the number of undischarged bankrupts then that we have now. A trader who was adjudicated usually applied within a month or six weeks for his certificate and in the majority of cases got it, in either the first, or second, or third class.

363. (Chairman.) That is quite true about the traders. I had forgotten that.

Mr. E. V. Longstaffe, called; and Examined.

364. (Chairman.) I think that you represent the London Association for the Protection of Trade ?—I do.

365. Your firm has been for many years their solicitors ?—For many years.

366. You are also a member of a firm that every one in my profession knows, namely, the firm of Dod, Longstaffe, Son, and Fenwick ?—I am.

367. I think in the practice of your profession you have had considerable experience in bankruptcy matters in acting for creditors ?—I have.

368. Would you be so kind as to favour the Committee with your views as to the defective state of the law with regard to fraudulent transfers of property and with any suggestions that you have to make in the way of amending it in connection with the terms of reference either specifically or generally ?—I have dealt with it both ways. I deal with each paragraph of the terms of reference specifically beginning with each paragraph.

369. I think it would be most convenient, if it is equally convenient to you, if you would just take us through the terms of reference and give us your views upon them ?—I say as to paragraph 1, it is desirable that Section 11 of the Debtors Act of 1869 should have effect as if there were substituted for the words "if within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, by or against him" the words "if within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition or in case of a receiving order made under Section 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, before the date of the order, or the execution by him of a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of creditors." Since I wrote that I should amend that by saying that it should be Section 26 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, because that section amended Section 11 of the Debtors Act by adding the words "or in the case of a receiving order made under Section 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, before the date of the order." The object of my suggestion is the inclusion of a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of creditors.

370. So as to make the penal consequence of the concealment of property or the falsification of books apply in the case of a deed of assignment ?—Yes, that is so.

371. Then I think besides that you have some views as to the official receiver ?—Yes, I think that where the official receiver, as a result of his investigation of a bankrupt's affairs, finds that the debtor has committed an offence under the Bankruptcy Act or the Debtors' Act, 1869, and the debtor does not within a time to be fixed, say within six months of the filing of the petition by or against him, apply for his discharge, it should be the duty of the official receiver to bring the conduct of the debtor before the court upon a report, as though the debtor had applied for his order of discharge and for the court to give such directions for prosecution or otherwise as it may think fit.

372. That is a serious change, do not you think—I mean it is imposing on the court a very considerable duty. By the court you mean the Court of Bankruptcy ?—The Court of Bankruptcy.

373. Because I mean generally the court acts upon an application by somebody ?—Yes, it does.

374. But you have very carefully considered this.—Yes, we have very carefully considered this. There are such a number of bankrupts who never apply for their discharge

375. As regards the machinery, you would make the official receiver apply for a day, I suppose, for the consideration of his report. He would make a report ?—The official receiver should make a report.

376. And it should be considered on a particular day ?—On a particular day.

377. With notice to the bankrupt ?—With notice to the bankrupt.

378. And then as regards the directions for prosecution, would you make it obligatory, as far as possible, on the public authority to prosecute. There is, you know, a difficulty now in regard to prosecutions ?—I think if the court considered there was a proper case for a prosecution that the Public Prosecutor ought to carry it out.

379. Now, then, with regard to the second paragraph ?—With regard to the second paragraph, I think it is desirable that it should be made a penal offence (1) To trade without keeping proper books of account such as are usually kept in the debtor's trade; and (2) To fail to give an account of any loss of any substantial portion of his estate; but to enable the non-keeping of books to be made a penal offence it would be necessary that the law should be altered so as to compel traders to keep certain specified books of account, and a summary power should be given to the Bankruptcy Judge and County Court Judges having bankruptcy jurisdiction to inflict a short term of imprisonment in either case if, in the opinion of the court, the offence had been committed, and, further, that whatever is treated under the Bankruptcy Act or the Debtors Act in respect of the conduct of a debtor by or against whom a petition in bankruptcy had been presented, should equally apply to a debtor who had executed a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of creditors.

380. How would that affect, if brought into law, small traders. One knows from experience that there are people of indifferent education who very often do not know how to keep proper books ?—There are, no doubt, small traders who do not keep what we consider proper books.

381. (Mr. Chamberlin.) No, but the Chairman said who do not know how to keep them ?—It would be a question for the judge to say whether or no he considered that the debtor, having regard to his particular trade, had committed the offence of not keeping proper books of account.

382. (Chairman.) I mean, in one's practice, one has so often come across debtors who have said, "Although I know all about my business, I know nothing about books. I leave them all to a bookkeeper or somebody else," and then it turns out that the bookkeeper has kept very bad books. Would you make the trader responsible in those cases ?—I should not make the trader responsible if he had attempted to keep proper books.

383. I mean one finds that in the building trades there are very often men engaged in large transactions who keep very bad books ?—Yes, but I think that there would be an improvement in that if it got to be generally known that proper books of account were expected to be kept.

384. I want to mention a matter to the Committee before I go to the next question. What do you think about Paragraph 3 of the terms of reference ? I understand there is a Bill before Parliament, is not there, promoted by the Incorporated Law Society affecting this very thing.

385. (Mr. Addison.) Yes, that is so. We need hardly take evidence upon it.

386. (Chairman.) No, we need hardly take evidence upon it.

387. Now Paragraph 4 of the terms of reference deals with the realisation of bankrupts' estates. Would you tell us what your views upon that are ?—It is suggested that if a trustee in bankruptcy or under a deed of assignment has not within (say) six months from the date of the trustee's appointment or the execution of the deed realised and distributed the bankrupt's property, it should be open to the official receiver or to any creditor who in the case of a bankruptcy has proved his debt, or in the case of a deed of assignment has executed or assented to the deed, or is returned in the debtor's list of creditors and filed with the deed as a creditor, to call upon the trustee to convene a meeting of the creditors and explain why the estate has not been fully realised, and that if at that meeting a resolution be not passed by the creditors present or represented extending the time for realising the outstanding estate, it should be open to the creditors to apply to the court by way of motion in bankruptcy, or in case of a deed, by summary application to the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy for the district in which the debtor resides, calling upon the trustee to show cause why he should not be removed and another trustee appointed in his place, and the cash and property in his hands be disposed of as the court might direct. I do not know whether six months would be too short a time, but I should say that in most cases in six months one ought to be able to ascertain and get in what is the property in that time.

388. Would that interfere with the sort of auxiliary jurisdiction that the Committee of Inspection have, do you think?—No, I do not think that would. There might be some cases where there are no Committees of Inspection.

389. I know that is a frequent case, but I mean the trustee acts under the direction of the Committee of Inspection, does not he?—Yes, certainly. You might vary this to "unless the time is extended by the Committee of Inspection."

390. Do you think that there should be any summary power given for the Official Receiver to realise the estate before the appointment of a trustee so as to secure a speedy realisation—I mean sometimes the appointment of a trustee is delayed a little?—That is so. No I do not think it would be necessary for the Official Receiver to go so far as that.

391. The experience of some of us is that sometimes between the Receiving Order and adjudication there is a considerable interval?—There is.

392. I mean adjournments are negotiated and so on?—Yes.

393. During all that time very often the property is hung up because there is no means of realising it. Do you think there should be power either for the court to direct a speedy realisation, or something of that kind?—In the case of bankruptcy I think there should be.

394. I mean sometimes it happens when the Receiving Order has been made?—Yes, it does, I have recently had a case exactly similar to that.

395. I know of a case where over two years elapsed between the Receiving Order and the adjudication. Do you think it is right that the court should have power to direct that the Official Receiver should realise in the same way as a Receiver in Chancery?—Yes, I do.

396. Then the next paragraph—paragraph 5—is the one which deals with this very troublesome question of after-acquired property?—My view with regard to that is that where an undischarged bankrupt has acquired property since his bankruptcy the bankrupt's trustee should not be at liberty to claim such property, but only the surplus thereof after making provision for the payment of all debts which the bankrupt has incurred since his bankruptcy, and of persons who, without express notice of the former bankruptcy have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after-acquired property from the bankrupt.

397. Then you would do away, I suppose, with the difference between transactions in real estate and transactions in personal estate which has been laid down by the recent decisions of the court?—Yes, that is so.

398. I do not scruple to ask you, as you belong to our profession, how would you ascertain the persons who had become creditors of the bankruptcy for the purpose of providing for their debts—would you give notice to them to come in, or would you allow the process of any one of them who levies execution to prevail over the trustee's title?—I should allow that certainly. As regards other creditors I do not know at the present moment how the trustee would ascertain who were creditors except by advertisement.

399. If a person had become a creditor since the bankruptcy and had got his judgment in execution, you would not in fact allow the title of the first trustee in bankruptcy to prevail against him—that is how you would deal with it in practice?—So far as after acquired property was concerned.

400. Then comes the thorny question of the married woman. At present we know that she can only be made bankrupt when she has a separate estate, and when she is trading separately from her husband, and I dare say it is your experience and other people's, that the husband is very often living with the wife and so comfortably prevents her being made a bankrupt?—Yes, there is a difficulty further than that, because a married woman cannot be forced into bankruptcy. She can only present her own petition; you cannot make her bankrupt by serving her with a bankruptcy notice; you cannot compel her to commit an act of bankruptcy

401. But, of course, you can make her a bankrupt on such an act of bankruptcy as departing from her dwelling-house. What would be your remedy?—My remedy is to permit of her being served with a bankruptcy notice exactly in the same way as if she were a feme sole.

402. Would there be any difficulty arising from the terms of the judgment against married women as it is only enforcible against her separate estate. You would have to say, "notwithstanding the terms of the judgment," I suppose?—I should take it you would.

403. Now, paragraph 7 of the terms of reference relates to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, covenants, and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt. Will you tell us the result of your experience with regard to that?—With regard to after acquired property, it seems to me that settlements made in consideration of marriage, whether post-nuptial or ante-nuptial, should so far as they affect to deal with future acquired property be subject to avoidance in the same way as voluntary settlements now are under Section 47 Sub-section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, with this modification, that such settlements of future acquired property should be absolutely void against the trustee in bankruptcy if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the property or money has been actually transferred to or paid pursuant to the contractor's covenant, and should also be void against the trustee in bankruptcy if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after such property or money has been so paid or transferred as aforesaid, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was able to pay all his debts at the date of such payment or transfer without the aid of such property. The object of that is to make the period run from the acquisition of the property and not from the date of the settlement.

404. Have you any view on the subject of altering the law so as to prevent persons who are creditors under covenants made by bankrupts with trustees of their marriage settlements or otherwise coming in, and as it were swamping the trade creditors?—No, I do not express any view on that.

405. Paragraph 8 relates to the provisions of the law relating to voluntary arrangements by insolvent debtors with their creditors. Would you tell us your views upon that?—I do not think I need say all that I have put down in my proof with reference to that, but I think there ought to be a short amending Act to the effect that it should be compulsory for a meeting of creditors being made necessary before the deed is registered. Then (2) creditors by a majority having the right to confirm the appointment of trustee or appoint another before the deed is registered; and (3) compulsory security as in bankruptcy being given by the trustee who should not be at liberty to act under the deed until such security had been given.

406. How would you ascertain the amount of the security to be given. In bankruptcy the Official Receiver reports to the Board of Trade on the estate, and then the Board of Trade fixes the amount of security to be given. Under a deed, have you considered how that would have to be modified?—No, I have not considered how that should be worked; I state the principle. If it were not sufficient security, there ought to be power to apply to increase it.

407. Then as regards the trustee's accounts, I see that you point out that the Board of Trade has no power to audit the accounts. In your opinion, should there be such an audit?—Not a compulsory audit in my opinion—only if it should be required by the committee of inspection.

408. You mean that there should be an audit of accounts by the committee of inspection?—There should be an audit of the accounts by the Board of Trade, should the committee of inspection require it.

409. Is it your view in questions arising in the administration, such as default by the trustee to distribute a dividend or anything of that kind—that the Court of Bankruptcy should have power to deal with them ?—Yes, that is my view.

410. At present a man can only go to the Court of Chancery ?—Yes, or to the equitable side of the County Court.

411 And in your view it would be right for him to go to the Bankruptcy Court ?—That is so.

412. On paragraph 9, which deals with a subject which is not exactly bankruptcy law but which is still akin to it, namely, with regard to registration first of assignments of book debts, what do you think about that ?—I am not in favour of registering assignments of book debts, because I think it would be an injustice to the debtors to publish to the world the fact of their indebtedness, nor am I in favour of registering hiring agreements, because I think it would be detrimental to a trade which is a very large one.

413. Now you have dealt with specific points. Besides those, I think you might be able to assist us on one or two other matters which I do not think would be outside the terms of our reference. As regards the fraudulent transfer of property, is it your view that the law could be strengthened in any way ?—I think it frequently happens that fraudulent transfers of property take place on the eve of bankruptcy, being made by the debtor to apparently bona fide purchasers, payment in such cases being frequently made by bills which are at once negotiated with apparently bona fide holders. I suggest that as a step to prevent these evils in all cases of transfer of property which takes place within three months of the date of the petition and are not in the ordinary way of the bankrupts' tradings, the onus should be on the transferee to satisfy the court that the transfer was not fraudulent, but was bona fide.

414. Then I think you point out in the statement with which you favoured us that the law as to fraudulent preference has now become very unsatisfactory ?—Yes, I think it is very unsatisfactory and uncertain. I think, having regard to the decision in Sharp v. Jackson, where it was held that the debtor intended to save his own skin and not to prefer his creditors—I think if that is followed that this section is of very little value.

415. I think you would throw the onus, after insolvency is shewn, on to the creditor ?—Yes.

416. As Lord Justice Vaughan Williams held in the case of re Eaton ?—Yes.

417. Which I am afraid was afterwards disapproved ?—Yes.

418. I see in your opinion the protective section of the Bankruptcy Act is not quite efficient ?—Section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 protects transactions provided the person other than the bankrupt has (Sub-section 2) no notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time. And then I point out a case—I do not know whether you wish me to deal with it—of very great hardship.

419. If you please ?—B served a bankruptcy notice on A and subsequently presented a petition. C presented a petition without B's knowledge, but within three months of non-compliance with B's bankruptcy notice. Three months elapse from B's act of bankruptcy. But note this act of bankruptcy was and is still an available act of bankruptcy for C's petition being within three months of it. A pays off B's debt and costs and B's petition is withdrawn. B continues to trade with A. C's petition is adjourned from time to time, but after ten months or so a receiving order is made on it. A's trustee under C's receiving order and adjudication can recover from B the payment made to settle B's petition, and all subsequent transactions between B and A can be set aside for the trustees' benefit because B had notice of the non-compliance of A with his (B's) own bankruptcy notice, which act of bankruptcy having occurred within three months of C's petition was an available act of bankruptcy within the meaning of Section 168.

420. (Chairman.) How would you alter that ?—I would alter that by suggesting that Sub-section 2 of Section 49 might well be amended by substituting, "notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt within three months of that time," for "notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time."

421. (Chairman.) I think you have a suggestion to make about trading after insolvency ?—Yes. I suggest that continuing to trade for a period of six months with a knowledge of insolvency should be made a misdemeanour, punishable by imprisonment, and that Section 11 (14) of the Debtors Act 1869 should be amended.

422. Just passing on—I will not trouble you personally except on the subject of deeds of arrangement the creditor assenting. I see you have got some observations upon that ?—Yes. I say it often happens that under a deed of assignment the trustee thereof within the three months from the execution of the deed proceeds to collect. Is that the one ?

423. (Chairman.) No, but I should rather like to hear what you say about "when he proceeds to collect" ?—Yes, that is a very hard case.

424. He must pay over again ?—He must pay over again. He proceeds to collect the debts due to the estate, and then the debtor becomes a bankrupt and the trustee in the bankruptcy calls upon the person who has paid the trustee under the deed of arrangement to pay the debt over again. I say that something should be done to remedy that.

425. To protect a person who honestly pays ?—The person who honestly pays the trustee under the deed.

426. I pass over what you have said about the Judgments Extension Act, because I think that is a little outside our sphere of enquiry. Then with regard to deeds of arrangement ?—Until the case of in In re Brindley ex parte Taylor, decided by the Court of Appeal in December, 1905, and reported in the Law Reports (1906), 1 K.B.D. 377, it was supposed that unless a creditor had expressly assented to a deed of assignment executed by a debtor he was entitled to use the execution of such an assignment as an act of bankruptcy and present a petition in bankruptcy against such debtor. But by the case referred to, although the petitioning creditors had expressly and in writing refused to assent to the deed yet because they had supplied to the trustee under the deed goods to be used by him in carrying on the business of the debtor it was held that they had done an act which amounted either to an acquiescence in the deed or the recognition of the trustees' title thereunder, and could not therefore use the execution of the deed as an act of bankruptcy and their petition was dismissed. I myself had the case of re Goldstein quite recently, where a petition was presented by a creditor who had refused to execute the deed. The petition was adjourned, and during the adjournment the debtor laid a trap—there is no doubt about it—for my client by calling upon the creditor and buying the goods of him and getting him to invoice them to the trustee. Then at the adjourned hearing the matter came before the Registrar at Brighton and he was bound by the case of in re Brindley and held that my client had assented to the deed by supplying the goods to the trustee.

427. Re Brindley followed an earlier case really. Do you think that that is a matter that could be remedied by legislation ?—I think it could be remedied by legislation.

428. I mean to say I was rather wondering whether it was anything more than that the judges had come to a decision with which one was inclined to disagree ?—It must be followed.

429. Yes, I know it must ?—The Registrars at the District Courts follow that case.

430. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Do you think that there is any great delay caused in the working of the Bankruptcy Act at the present time in the distribution of assets ?—I do not think there is any great delay in the working of it—you mean so far as the trustees are concerned ?

431. Yes, I mean to say assuming that the person is an accountant who has charge of the Estate—is it your opinion that there is any improper delay in the distribution of the estate ?—No, I do not think there is any undue delay generally.

432. Have you a large experience in bankruptcy ?—Yes, I have a considerable experience in bankruptcy.

23 May, 1906.

433. Of course you live in London, and have to deal perhaps with the better class of traders in the larger way of business. Is it your experience that there is a great lack of keeping proper accounts amongst them ?—Oh yes, there is, even in my experience.

434. Even in London ?—Yes, even in London.

435. And you think so much so that you recommend it should be made a penal offence ?—I do.

436. Beyond that of holding up the discharge of the debtor ?—Yes.

437. (Mr. Richardson.) On page 7 you say you would not make a trader responsible if he attempted to keep books ?—I do.

438. (Chairman.) Do not you find in your experience that those people who have attempted to keep books are able to keep books, and have ceased keeping books for the purpose of fraudulently getting through a bankruptcy ?—I do not think altogether that persons who attempt to keep books are able to properly keep them.

439. Do not you find in your experience that great numbers of bankrupts—you must know it from your own personal knowledge, I think, as I do—who are able to keep books and have kept them properly, begin to keep them in an intermittent sort of way with the express purpose of meeting a bankruptcy which they know is coming on ?—It looks like it.

440. Those people should be held more responsible than those people who have not kept books at all, should not they. In my opinion it should be penal for such traders to keep on trading under such conditions. If a person has been keeping proper books and has ceased to keep proper books, I would make that penal ?—I agree.

441. But there are many thousands of shopkeepers up and down the country to whom it would be utterly impossible to keep books—women who have lost their husbands and so on ?—But they can always keep them. There are very few of these who fail. It is a wonderful thing how very few of the little shopkeepers fail. They are honest enough to sell up before they come absolutely to failure, but I should make it penal for people who had kept books and were able to keep books, but who ceased to keep books.

442. Then as to paragraphs 9 and 11, with regard to book debts, you are not in favour of those being registered ?—I am not.

443. Is it not the fact that the assignment of book debts is more frequently than not made by an insolvent debtor ?—I cannot say that that is my experience.

444. But why should they assign book debts if they are not insolvent ?—For the purpose of raising money and putting it into their business.

445. But I should say at least in 75 per cent., even in 90 per cent. of the cases where book debts are assigned the person at the time is insolvent, and therefore I think they should be registered just the same as bills of sale. You see that to permit the assignment of book debts is to give to the creditor who presses the debtor an undue preference over the rest of the creditors, and the majority —I say the majority of those who assign book debts—are undoubtedly insolvent at the time ?—It may be so.

446. We should legislate rather for the majority of the cases than for the few ?—Yes, I have not any particular feeling in the matter one way or the other, but I think it would be an injustice to the debtor.

447. Why should it be any more an injustice than in the actual lending of money on a bill of sale. It is practically the same thing as a bill of sale, it is only handing over goods instead of money ?—Yes, I am only looking at it from the point of view of the debtors whose debts would be assigned.

448. If the debtor gives a bill of sale he has to register it. You permit him to assign his book debts, which is practically the same thing, without being registered ?—But it is rather a different case. There the debtor who gives a bill of sale knows the consequences of a bill of sale being registered against him.

449. We should also make a debtor know the consequences of assigning book debts ?—I know, but in this case you are bringing up other persons' names before the public. I might have incurred a bill to my tailor, and if my tailor goes and assigns that debt I would be very much annoyed to find that it was known to the public that I owed my tailor £30.

450. But all that would not appear in the book ?—Yes, it would.

451. Then you say trading within six months from a knowledge of insolvency should be made penal ?—Yes, it should. A man who goes on trading for six months without calling together his creditors or filing his petition should, in my opinion, be deemed to have committed a penal offence.

452. It would be very difficult to prove it ?—You would have to prove it before you could prosecute him.

453. It would be very difficult to prove it. You say that generally in the winding up of estates there is no undue delay ?—That is my experience.

454. Have you any experience to give with regard to where delay does take place. There are great numbers of cases of delay in bankruptcy—there are delays sometimes ?—Oh ! decidedly.

455. I know of cases that for years have never really been settled at all. Have you any suggestion to make about those ?—No. I have no suggestion to make except an application to the court.

456. (Mr. Peat.) You mentioned in reply to the Chairman that in some cases you consider the Official Receiver should realise immediately after the Receiving Order, and possibly before the adjudication and appointment of trustee ?—Yes.

457. Did I understand you to say so ?—Yes, I did say so.

458. Do you consider that advisable as a general rule ?—No, I do not consider it as a general rule advisable.

459. Only in exceptional cases ?—Only in exceptional cases.

460. On this subject have you experience of the fact that a speedy realisation of assets which are disclosed sometimes results in assets undisclosed being lost to view altogether—that is that an investigation by someone competent to make that investigation into the assets of the debtor is absolutely necessary before proceeding to realise somewhat speedily. Had a proper inquiry as to the assets estimated by the debtor in his statement of affairs been made, it is possible that other assets might often have been ascertained and discovered ?—It is possible.

461. And is it your opinion that very early realisation would prejudice the chance of that ?—It might—I am not pressing for a speedy realisation, or not for an unnecessarily speedy realisation.

462. It was only in exceptional cases ?—Only in exceptional cases.

463. Now in regard to married women and their debts, is it your opinion that the household debts of a married woman and her husband should be considered to be due by the married woman as well as by the husband ; that is to say, that where the husband has no estate and where possibly the wife has a considerable estate, that the debts for the proper upkeep of the house and establishment should be chargeable against the woman or against her assets as well as against the man's ?—I have not considered that.

464. You have not considered that ?—No, I did not know that that point came within the terms of reference.

465. In the case of bankruptcy or of an action brought against the married woman for her debt where the question is what is her debt—for instance the up-keep of the house or the woman's clothing—it has been held in frequent cases to be due by the husband, who, it may be, has no means as distinguished from the wife, who may have large means ; but you have not considered that ?—No.

466. Then I pass that over. On the subject of settlement, I am sure that it is your experience that in many cases of settlement the settlor contracts to settle a specific sum payable at some future date ?—That is so.

467. Is it your view that settlements of that character, which I describe as voluntary settlements, or settlements in consideration of marriage, should rank pari passu and equally in all respects with trade creditors ?—Yes, I think so.

468. Assuming, of course that the settlor remained solvent for two years and that for ten years he was able to prove that he was solvent ?—Yes, or that there was a valuable consideration.

469. Well, the consideration of marriage for instance—a voluntary settlement does not always contain a sufficient consideration ?—No.

470. However, I take your answer to be that in your opinion such settlements should not take a back place as compared with money lent and trade debts incurred for sufficient consideration ?—That is so.

471. Now on the subject of the keeping of books, is it in your experience that failures are most frequent where books are kept, although they are not kept properly ?—Where they have not been kept ?

472. That failures are most frequent where they have not been kept ?—In my experience ; you ask me whether failures are most frequent where books have not been kept ?

473. Where they have been improperly kept, or not kept ?—In my experience there are numbers of cases of failures where books have not been kept or have not been properly kept.

474. With regard to the keeping of books, does it in your experience tend to prevent failures ?—I should say that it does.

475. That is your experience—that the keeping of proper books tends to prevent failures ?—Yes, decidedly.

476. I conclude that you mean that a trader keeping proper books is informed of his position more frequently ?—True

477. Or is able to recognise his position ?—Yes.

478. Whereas a man who does not keep books drifts along and suddenly finds himself unable to pay his debts without knowing exactly why ?—Quite right.

479. Therefore I should possibly conclude from that, that in your view it is a very essential feature that debtors ought to be compelled to keep proper books ?—Very essential.

480. With regard to the assignment of book debts, Mr. Richardson directed your attention to the desirability of registering assignments of book debts ?—Yes.

481. And I understand your view was to the contrary ?—It is to the contrary. If it could be done without disclosing the names of the debtors I should have no objection to it

482. But are book debts not a little different from stock in trade and so on—stock in trade requires a bill of sale, but book debts change from day to day ?—Yes.

483. They are the result of contracts in some cases ?—They are.

484. Consequently, you may find a bankrupt—perhaps I am putting words into your mouth which you do not wish to use, and I would rather not do so—but in the case of a bankrupt taking an advance against a specific contract—giving as security an assignment of the sum coming from that contract—do you think it is necessary in the interests of bankruptcy law that the assignment of such a debt should be registered ?—No, I do not

485. In regard to book debts generally I understood you already to say that you do not think it desirable that the assignment of those should be registered ?—That is so.

486. In regard to deeds of assignment, you have expressed an opinion as regards the position of a creditor and of an assigning debtor who subsequently trades with a trustee ; that such a creditor should not be precluded from making the assignor a bankrupt ?—Yes.

487. Does your view apply where a creditor who does not express dissent from the deed, but takes a neutral position—does not express dissent or assent, but goes on trading with the trustee under that deed, contracting debts with that trustee and receiving payments from that trustee. Would you consider that creditor in a position to ignore the deed under those circumstances ?—No, I think he should not—I think he should be taken to assent.

488. Have you any experience of creditors under a deed of assignment waiting until a week or two before the debtor issues a deed of bankruptcy and then demanding payment of their debt in full, in order to secure a preference over the other creditors ?—I have known of them.

489. Do you consider that fair ?—No, I do not.

490. In your observations you suggest that the majority of the creditors should appoint a trustee ?—Yes.

491. Is it your opinion that a majority, and if so, what majority should make a deed compulsory upon all creditors —for instance if you have 90 per cent. ?—Certainly.

492. You think it should make it compulsory on the rest ?—Yes, I do.

493. Do you express an opinion as to what majority ?—No, I do not.

494. You mentioned, that in your judgment the realization of an estate ought to be completed in six months but you also said that that period might be varied considerably ?—Yes.

495. Did you suggest six months from any knowledge of any particular estate or any class of estate ?—No.

496. But six months was the period within which the realisation ought to be made ?—Yes.

497. Would you consider that where the committee of creditors considered that, say, twelve months ought to be a fair time, or that where the business was carried on, that six months should not apply ?—That six months should not apply.

498. I concluded your meaning to be, that where assets that could be realised are not realised and are not distributed in six months, that then action should be taken ?—Yes, that is so.

499. In deeds of assignment it sometimes happens that no committee of creditors is appointed under the deed. That is not so in many cases, but in a few cases no committee is appointed at the meeting of creditors. Assume what I say is correct, is it your view that where no committee is appointed that the Board of Trade should audit the trustee's accounts ?—Only if they are required by some creditor.

500. Is it your opinion that the execution of deeds of assignment should remain an act of bankruptcy for a statutory period, or that the deeds of assignment as an act of bankruptcy should be limited to a month or six weeks ?—I should limit it to a period unless the creditors by a majority fell in with the deed.

501. At present, as you are aware, it extends over three months ?—Yes.

502. And during that time the creditors remain on the fence ?—Yes.

503. And give very considerable trouble ?—Yes.

504. And I understand from your answer that you are rather in favour of limiting that period of three months to a lesser period ?—Yes.

505. The trustee under the deed of assignment, if the bankruptcy subsequently supervenes, may have difficulty in getting his transactions approved, that is to say, that he has collected the debt and it does not follow that a trustee in bankruptcy will recognise that he has given a valid receipt for it ?—That is so.

506. Because the act of bankruptcy relates back to the execution of the deed, and the transactions under the deed therefore are invalid : would you be in favour of trustees' transactions so far as covered by the Deeds of Assignment Act and approved by the committee of inspection being considered valid, notwithstanding bankruptcy ?—If the trustee had been properly appointed by the creditors at a meeting called as I suggest within four days of the execution of the deed.

507. In that case you would consider that a trustee having properly discharged the trusts of the deed subject to the approval of the committee, that his transactions should be considered legal and binding ?—Yes, I think so.

508. (Mr. Addison.) There are one or two questions I want to ask you. First, with regard to the early realisation of property, do you think there should be power in exceptional cases for the court to sanction early realisation, say of goodwill or certain assets ?—Yes, in certain cases I think there should be.

509. So as to protect the goodwill which might be saleable at once ?—Yes.

510. And which would depreciate with delay ?—Yes.

511. There has been delay in getting adjudication ?—Yes, there has.

512. If one gets judgment one has to serve a debtor's notice, and the debtor can contest the proceedings at every stage and keep one out as we know for three, four, or five weeks ?—Yes, that is so.

513. Would you agree that prima facie a final judgment of the Supreme Court should be sufficient to serve an immediate petition upon without more ?—Yes.

514. Without the necessity of the seven days' notice ?—Yes. I think so. I think that would be sufficient.

515. Or possibly unless settled within seven days it should not be capable of being disputed ?—That is to say it should not be open to the debtor to dispute it.

516. You have found according to the way in which the law is now administered very great delay in getting adjudication ?—There is great delay in adjudication in some cases.

517. A clear and defined debt, secured by a judgment it may be on a bill of exchange or for goods sold, in such a case the debtor tries to keep the petitioning creditor at arm's length for an unduly long time ?—Yes, he does.

518. Do you think that the fees, the £5 petition stamp, and the £5 for expenses are proper fees ?—I have not considered that question of fees.

519. You spoke of marriage settlements and property which the debtor did not possess. Do you think there would be a difficulty in applying your rule in such a case as this where, by a marriage settlement, the husband covenanted to bring in money he might come into on his father's death under his will or otherwise ?—Yes. That is after acquired property.

520. Would you apply your proposed rule to that ?—Yes.

521. As to discharge the rules, as you know, are very stringent, the debtor must have paid 10s., or have shown unavoidable misfortune ?—Yes.

522. Do you think there ought to be a discretion in the court to consider the circumstances or that that absolute bar should be maintained ?—I cannot say that I have considered that, but I should say that the court should have discretion.

523. Now as to bookkeeping I quite agree with your views generally, but take a great number of small traders —shopkeepers in villages and country towns—what do you say about the offence in their case ?—Well, it might be a hardship.

524. In the case of widows and others who start in shops ?—I should give the judge discretion.

525. To treat it as an offence or not ?—To treat it as an offence or not.

526. Do you think there ought before applying in bankruptcy any penalty such as you suggest to be any rules as to the books which should be kept in particular trades ?—There ought to be some rule as to what books ought to be kept ; there ought to be some enactment.

527. Some prescribed books ?—Some prescribed books.

528. You would not, I presume, apply the rule to non-traders ?—No.

529. We have no definition of traders now under our Bankruptcy Act ?—No, I do not think we have.

530. In your view a deed of arrangement assented to by a certain majority of creditors should bind the minority ?—It should in my view.

531. The objection no doubt to that is that a debtor may escape consideration of his conduct. Would you think the suggeston a good one, that a deed so assented to could be made binding on application to the court, the court having the opportunity then of considering the debtor's conduct ?—Yes, I think that would be an advantage.

532. That might meet objections that are made by the Board of Trade ?—Yes, that might.

533. (Sir Edward Fithian.) With regard to the assignment of book debts—I see your objection to registration is that it would work injustice to the debtors by publishing their indebtedness ?—That is it.

534. Have you considered the question from the point of view of the creditors ?—Yes. I have considered it from the point of view of the creditors but I think it cuts both ways.

535. I suppose you are aware that the assignment of book debts is carried on very largely in the manufacturing centres ?—I believe it is more largely done out of London than in London.

536. And that in point of fact assignments are made and schedules to the assignments are revised month by month, striking out debts that have been paid and adding other debts ?—That may be so.

537. Do you not think it rather a hardship to the creditors that in the event of failure taking place the whole of those assets should be conveyed really to one person to the exclusion of all the trade creditors ?—If he paid a consideration for them, no.

538. But he may not have paid a consideration for them—does it not in fact amount to an undue preference to one creditor as against the rest of the trade creditors ?—Possibly it might—it is quite arguable that it would—I do not express any strong opinion on it, one way or another ; only I think it would be rather a hardship on the debtors to have their names disclosed.

539. But why any greater hardship in that case than in the case of a bill of sale ?—Because there only the names of the parties are disclosed who are the parties to the bill of sale, but in this case, you are disclosing the names of other persons who are not parties to the transaction.

540. But would not the information of registration enable possible creditors to know the extent to which those debts have been hypothecated and so tend to limit, at any rate, undue credit being given to a person who has given an assignment of this kind ?—It would give the information, but I doubt very much whether it would tend to limit the credit.

541. You think that the creditor would still continue to give credit although he knew that the debts had been assigned ?—I do, just as it is in the case of hiring agreements. They still sell goods on credit, although in fact they know that the furniture on the premises has been obtained on the hire purchase system.

542. But there is no information published as to hiring agreements ?—No.

543. But surely that makes all the difference ?—It has become so general to buy furniture on the hire system that I do not think creditors give credit on the faith of furniture that is in the house.

544. You think that the official receiver should report as to the conduct of the debtor in cases where the debtor has committed an offence. Do you not think it desirable that the official receiver should report on the conduct of debtors in all cases ?—Yes, in all cases.

545. Whether an offence has been committed or not ?—Yes.

546. And that the court upon that report should adjudicate—give a discharge or refuse a discharge ?—Certainly.

547. So that every case in bankruptcy would be brought to a legitimate termination ?—I think so.

548. And instead of having a number of undischarged bankrupts who may or may not have been guilty of offences against the Bankruptcy Act or Debtors Act, those who were undischarged would be known as persons who had been guilty of offences in the opinion of the court ?—That is so.

549. Then as to the omission to keep proper books of account you would make that a penal offence. By that I suppose you mean a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act ?—Yes.

550. You do not think that the suspension of the discharge would be a sufficient punishment in all cases ?—No, I do not.

551. Then you say that it would be necessary to specify certain books of account which ought to be kept ?—Yes.

552. Would you introduce the French law on that subject ?—I am afraid that I cannot say what it is.

553. Which requires certain specified books to be kept and posted ?—I cannot say that I go as far as that.

554. However, with regard to that matter it is very strictly provided for by French law ?—That may be so, but I cannot say anything as to that.

FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 30th May, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman)

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. E. V. LONGSTAFFE, recalled; and Examined.

555. (Mr. Smith.) I understand it to be your suggestion to make a voluntary deed of arrangement assented to by a certain majority of creditors binding upon all the creditors ?—I said so.

556. You have not made up your mind as to the majority ?—I have not.

557. I understand that you would make anything which constitutes an offence under the Bankruptcy Act or the Debtors Act an offence under the deed ?—Yes.

558. And subject to prosecution in the same way ?—Yes.

559. And would you apply the law of bankruptcy for the purposes of remedying a wrong or of deciding any question arising in the management and distribution of the estate under a deed ? I have taken that expression from your proof ?—Yes.

560. I do not exactly know what is meant by the remedying of a wrong—perhaps you might give some amplification of that—perhaps it refers to fraudulent preference ?—It does.

561. Would you make a meeting of creditors necessary before the deed was registered ?—Yes.

562. And for the appointment of a trustee ?—Yes, that is so—I should make the appointment of a trustee subject to confirmation by the meeting and also in the case of the appointment of a new trustee.

563. And you would require the trustee to give compulsory security ?—No, I did not suggest it.

564. I did not know whether you meant to suggest that. You say, "When the Act of 1887 was made it was the aim of the Legislature to bring deeds of arrangement under the control of the Bankruptcy Court" ?—I only say that for the purpose of showing that it came under the bankruptcy law.

565. But these suggestions which you have made, if carried out, would be carried out by statute, and would practically become a part of the bankruptcy law ?—That would be so.

566. Do deeds of arrangement generally contain a provision for the release of the debtor ?—Yes, they do generally.

567. On what principle do you defend the proposal that the majority of creditors should have the right to release the debtor from all creditors who do not assent ?—On the principle of fairness.

568. You think that it is fair that one set of creditors should have power to release the debtor from another set ?—I think if three-fourths of the creditors in number and value were to decide that the deed of assignment should be binding on all the creditors, then that it would be fair for them to give the debtor his release.

569. Why do you consider it fair—has not every man a right to insist on payment of his debt ?—Every man has the right, no doubt, to insist on the payment of his debt, but if it is an insolvent estate, it should be governed by the votes of a certain majority of the debtor's creditors.

570. What I am at a loss to see is, what right the majority have to determine that, unless you put it upon the ground of the general interests of the community. Do you put it on the ground of the general interest of the community ?—I put it on the ground of the general interest of all the creditors. Mr. E. V. Longstaffe. 30 May, 1906.

571. Then you think that it is in the general interests of all the creditors that the majority should have power to release the debtor from the obligations to a minority of them ?—I should say so.

572. Upon such conditions as they think proper ?—Upon such conditions as the majority think proper.

573. (Chairman.) By majority do you mean the majority in value or the majority in number ?—Both. I express the opinion that there should be a three-fourths majority in value and number.

574. (Mr. Smith.) And that without any opportunity to the minority of creditors of having the affairs of the debtor or a proposal under the deed investigated by an impartial tribunal ?—They would have that, sir.

575. How ?—They would be able to attend a meeting of creditors.

576. But if the majority wish to do certain things, is it an impartial body for the purpose of investigation ?—They can bring any information to the knowledge of the trustee.

577. Supposing they bring to the knowledge of the trustee the fact that the bankrupt has been guilty of fraud ?—If the trustee should consider that that is so, he could bring that matter before the court.

578. You still think that the majority should be entitled to release him, notwithstanding that the debt had been incurred by an act of fraud ?—Yes.

579. Then you would make a certain proportion of creditors necessary for registration ?—Yes.

580. What value would the deed have prior to registration—none except that of a voluntary conveyance which could be set aside, I suppose ?—That is so, I take it.

581. Would you allow a period to elapse during which the dissenting creditors could take action to upset the deed ? Three months at present is allowed; would you allow any period ?—Yes.

582. What period ?—I think three months is rather too long.

583. Would you say two or one ?—I should think two months would be quite long enough.

584. Would you require a notice to be given to all the creditors besides those who attended the meeting; would you require notice to be given to the other creditors ?—Yes, I would certainly require notice to be given to all the creditors.

585. With an intimation that the deed would become binding unless they objected within a month ?—That would be useful.

586. Now, at the meeting of creditors (I want to ask a question as to practical procedure) how would you proceed with regard to proving debts—would you adopt the Bankruptcy procedure?—That is to say, would I require that every creditor should have a sworn proof of his debt before he is entitled to vote.

587. (Chairman.) How would you ascertain that he was a creditor at all or for a particular amount?—I should assume that he was a creditor if he were put down by the debtor on his list.

588. But you would not assume that as sufficient evidence of his title to vote at the meeting?—Yes, I should do so.

589. (Mr. Smith.) Would you assume a statement by the debtor as sufficient to enable the creditor to vote?—Yes.

590. Supposing the debtor puts down a fictitious debt by collusion?

591. (Chairman.) It is done with a wife?—Yes, he could do that.

592. (Mr. Smith.) You do not suggest any means for preventing that?—No, I do not; I look upon that as a detail.

593. Yes, it is a detail that I rather think lies at the foundation of the whole of the proceedings, because if the assent of creditors is to be an essential requisite to the deed, then you ought to be satisfied, first, that you are dealing with real creditors, and, secondly, that you are dealing with creditors whose representations as to their debts are true?—I should not object to it being limited to trade creditors.

594. You would give trade creditors the right to discharge a debtor from all his liabilities?—That is a very difficult question.

595. The question in my mind is really the matter of fictitious debts, or debts which, if not fictitious, are exaggerated. Then how would you deal with secured creditors; would you require them to value their securities?—Before voting, do you mean?

596. Yes, before voting?—No, I do not think so.

597. You would allow them to vote for a secured debt?—At present I think so.

598. And supposing at a meeting of creditors only a certain portion of the creditors were present, would you take into account absent creditors at all, although they appeared in the debtor's statement, or would you require a certain fixed majority of those present?—Only of those present.

599. Would you permit the creditors to vote by proxy?—Yes.

600. Would you impose any restriction upon the use of proxies such as is imposed under the Bankruptcy Act?—I should adopt the same course.

601. How would you prevent touting for proxies such as existed under the old Act and such as, I suppose, may exist under deeds of arrangement, but which cannot exist under the present Act, because the proxies are issued by the Official Receiver direct to the creditor and he is required to return these proxies direct to the Official Receiver, whereas under the old Act it was a very common thing for proxies to be carried round by touting trustees and collected. They obtained general proxies to vote at a meeting and then those proxies were made a subject of bargain and sale and arrangement between the various competing trustees. Would you do anything to prevent that abuse?—Yes. I think something ought to be done to prevent that; it is an open question whether proxies should be allowed to be used.

602. There is another question which perhaps you have considered, and which, I think, was a very important question in connection with the last bankruptcy legislation. The holder of a bill of exchange, as you are aware, of course—the indorsee of a bill of exchange—is entitled to vote upon it?—Yes.

603. And it was a common practice under the old Act for holders of bills of exchange which had a large amount of first-class names upon them to vote in connection with a bankrupt's estate. They were entitled to vote and carry the election of the trustee and any resolution without valuing the security. That has been done away with under the present law. Would you have the same thing done away with in regard to deeds of arrangement?—Yes.

604. Of course, it was obvious that under that system a man who held a large number of bills from a debtor and who was perfectly safe to get payment from some of the indorsees was able in bankruptcy to control the debtor's estate. If there was any dispute as to the debts who would decide upon it?—The chairman of the meeting.

605. Would you allow any appeal?—I should allow an application to the court by any creditor who thought he had not been fairly dealt with.

606. Then, with regard to the investigation of the debtor's affairs, how is that to be conducted?—Conducted by the trustee exactly in the same way as it is now. I am speaking under a deed of assignment.

607. Is there any investigation at present?—By a trustee?

608. Yes?—I should say there was.

609. You would not allow the creditors to investigate?—There would be a committee of inspection—they represent the creditors.

610. You would not allow the individual creditor to investigate the affairs of the debtor?—I do not think it would be necessary.

611. If fraud were alleged in the conduct of the debtor?—If fraud were alleged by one of the creditors and he reported to the trustee or committee of inspection they could take it up.

612. Supposing they did not?—I would not put much reliance on the creditor.

613. Would you trust entirely to the trustee and committee of inspection?—I should.

614. You would not allow it to be brought before the court?—No, not unless the committee of inspection or trustee desired.

615. But as to the committee of inspection, would you put any limitation on the appointment of the committee as to the class of persons who should be appointed?—I should not have it all from one class.

616. You would not treat them all from a money-lender's point of view. Suppose they were not creditors?—I should not allow any man to serve on the committee who was not a creditor.

617. Are you aware under the Bankruptcy Act that is so?—It may be.

618. That a proxy can serve as a member of the committee?—Yes.

619. You would not put any restriction on the appointment of committees?—No.

620. With regard to offences under the Bankruptcy Act, the non-keeping of proper books of account, trading while insolvent, and fraudulent preference—would you treat those as criminal under a deed?—Certainly, exactly the same way as in bankruptcy.

621. I understood you to say you would make the most of these offences criminal, but certainly with regard to the non-keeping of books?—Certainly.

622. And trading while insolvent?—Trading with the knowledge of insolvency for six months.

623. Would you make a preference, granted with the intention of preferring certain creditors at the expense of others, criminal?—I do not think that I have suggested that I should.

624. No, I do not think you have?—No, I should not.

625. How would you deal with fraudulent preference under a deed—by "preference" I mean that which could be set aside under the Bankruptcy Act as fraudulent but which could not, apart from the bankruptcy law, be set aside? Would you apply that law?—Yes, I would.

626. And if criminal fraud were alleged against a debtor, how would you deal with that? You would leave it to the trustee and committee to prosecute?—I should.

627. You would not give the creditor power to bring the matter before the court?—No, I do not think it would be necessary.

628. But supposing the creditor thought it was necessary ?—Then he could prosecute as a member of the public.

629. But you would not allow him to allege as a reason either for setting aside the deed or obtaining justice in the Bankruptcy Court that there was fraud which required investigation ?—No.

630. Would you apply such disqualifications of the Bankruptcy Act to persons who had executed a deed as not sitting in Parliament or acting as mayors ?—I have not considered that.

631. You suggested that security should be given by the trustee; to whom should it be given ?—It should be given in the same way as the trustee now gives it.

632. To the Board of Trade ?—Yes.

633. And by whom should it be fixed ?—It should be fixed by the committee of inspection with permission or leave to apply to increase it.

634. And if they did not think it necessary to fix any security you would not compel them, would you ?—No I think not.

635. With regard to the remuneration of trustees under the Bankruptcy Act the remuneration is fixed by way of commission on the realisation and distribution—would you adopt that principle in deeds of arrangement, or would you allow the creditors to fix it in any way they pleased ?—I have not considered the question of the remuneration of trustees.

636. There is another provision with regard to the remuneration of trustees, that it must not be shared with their solicitor or accountant or any other agent of theirs ?—Yes.

637. You would not apply that, would you, to deeds ?—Certainly I would.

638. (Mr. Addison.) I do not think that that is the rule of any respectable office.

639. (Mr. Smith.) I am sure that it is not of any respectable office, but there is a provision in the Act with regard to it. I am not suggesting that it is a common practice among respectable people, but it is to prevent abuses.

640. (Mr. Peat.) A man doing that would be turned out of our institute.

641. (Mr. Smith.) I am quite aware of that, but if all the trustees were members of the institute I should not put the question, but a large number of trustees are not.

642. (Mr. Peat.) I think the members of the Society are under the same rules.

643. (Mr. Smith.) I am only speaking of the worst class of trustees. It was deemed necessary under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 to put in a provision to guard against abuses on the part of these people.

644. (Mr. Peat.) I ask your pardon for having interrupted.

645. (Mr. Smith.) That is what I wish you to direct your mind to. We are not proposing legislation against respectable people, but to prevent abuses by the very worst classes of trustees. In cases of excessive remuneration, or wherever any creditor thought there was excessive remuneration, there is an appeal to the Board of Trade under the Act. You would not give that power under deeds of arrangement ?—No, I think not.

646. With regard to solicitors' bills. I hope you will not object to my putting a question on the subject. They are liable to taxation. In all cases they require to be taxed before they are paid under the Bankruptcy Law. Would you require the same thing under deeds of arrangement ?—If the committee of inspection desired it.

647. Not otherwise ?—No.

648. With regard to trust funds, would you require them to be paid into a separate banking account ?—No, I do not think so.

649. You would allow the trustee to mix them with his own money ?—It is a question for the committee of inspection.

650. Unless the committee of inspection intervene, you would allow the trustee to mix trust funds with his own moneys ?—Yes.

30 May, 1906.

651. How would you do it with unclaimed balances and dividends ? You are aware that under the Bankruptcy Law they are required to be paid into the Bank of England ?—If they are not claimed, I suppose the trustee would still hold them.

652. Would you allow him to continue to hold them ?—Yes.

653. And undistributed dividends ?—If they are not claimed.

654. I draw a distinction as to unclaimed balances. You would allow him to keep them ?—Yes.

655. Is the committee of inspection to be compulsory in all cases ?—I do not think that I have suggested that it should be.

656. No; I am asking rather for information. Do you think it is desirable—what should you do in those cases where there is no committee of inspection ?—It would be advisable, no doubt, to have a committee of inspection in every case. I have always suggested it.

657. Would you enforce that by statute ? Would you make it a necessary condition of the registration of the deed ?—I think it would be advisable to have a committee of inspection in every case.

658. Of course the question arises which I have already referred to, whether a committee man should be appointed if he was not a creditor ?—Yes; I think a committee man should be a creditor.

659. If your views were carried out and embodied in a statute and became part of the legislative system of the country, would you make all deeds which did not comply with these conditions—deeds of arrangement I mean—absolutely void ?—Yes, all—I think I should make them absolutely void.

660. Would not that be a great interference with the rights of individuals. I suppose again you would justify that upon the ground of general utility ?—Yes, for the general benefit of the creditors.

661. I suppose I may put it that if the interests of the community and of the general body of the creditors required protection against abuses which experience has shown to be invariable where there is no check, you would prohibit, in fact, those arrangements which did not comply with your conditions ?—Yes.

662. Is not this system which you propose practically the same as under the Act of 1869. I suppose you are familiar with the Liquidation Clauses of the Act of 1869 ?—I have not compared this proposal with the Act of 1869.

663. Perhaps you are not familiar with them ?—No, I should not say that I was.

664. But if you are satisfied that it was practically the same thing as has been embodied in various Acts of Parliament from 1825 to 1883—in a variety of Acts, such as those of 1825, 1845, 1861, and 1869—if all those Acts had contained provisions for voluntary arrangements more or less similar to those which you now suggest, and they had failed entirely to give satisfaction to the public in their actual working, would that modify your opinion at all ?—No. I do not think so—the community was not ripe for it then.

665. (Chairman.) In fact, in those days the deed was considered to be a fraudulent deed of assignment—at the time of the great Bankruptcy Act of George IV. it was considered to be a fraud.

666. (Mr. Smith.) When the Act of 1869 was under consideration for repealing the Act of 1861, the Attorney-General of that day, Sir Robert Collier, declared that the effect of the Act of 1861 had been to enable a bankrupt to defraud those to whom he was indebted and set them at defiance, and Lord Cairns also expressed the opinion that a large increase had taken place in the amount of annual insolvency. If you are satisfied that that was due to the clauses in this Act which promoted voluntary arrangements of creditors and the majority binding the minority, would that affect your view ?—No, it may have been the opinion at the time, but it might be quite possible that it would not be the opinion of those same gentlemen at the present time.

667. I want to refer to the objects on behalf of which the present bankruptcy law was passed. I have got here a copy taken from Hansard of the speech of the President of the Board of Trade in introducing the Bill which is now the law.

668. (Mr. Chamberlin.) What was the date of that ?

669. (Mr. Smith.) That is April 8th, 1881, on the occasion of the first introduction of it when it was not carried. I hope I may be excused for reading this because I think it throws a great deal of light on the whole subject. This is what he said in giving his excuse for introducing the Bill. He said : "In 1879, a memorial from bankers and merchants of the city of London, one of the most influential ever presented to any Government, was presented to the late Prime Minister. In that memorial it was said that the defects of the bankruptcy law might be stated as follows : First it affords new and vicious facilities to insolvent persons to escape from the reasonable control and supervision of their creditors by private arrangements wholly beyond the jurisdiction of any public court or judge. And by reason of these facilities it is the fact that every year there is an increasing number of cases in which the grievous and dangerous scandal is exhibited of men failing for vast liabilities, and finding it easy, in consequence of the defects of the present law, to get their speedy discharge by the payment of no dividend, or a dividend of some small fraction of a £ or even 1s., and without being subjected to any efficient investigation of their affairs." I need not read the whole paragraph, but that is from the memorial of the traders and merchants of London. Do not you think if you revived the old system that the same results might possibly follow ?—I do not think so. The merchants and traders have altered their opinion since 1881.

670. Does not human nature remain the same ?—I am not prepared to answer that.

671. Perhaps people have altered their opinion because the law has been during the period of the present Act very much more strict than in all these preceding Acts ?—I cannot say what has occasioned the alteration of opinion.

672. If such a state of things were to be brought back, and if similar results were to follow from like causes in the future, do not you think it would lead to a large increase in insolvency ?—I do not think it would.

673. Here is the experience under the working of the 1869 Act quoted from Mr. Chamberlain's speech, "From these reports it appeared "—that is the report of the Controller in Bankruptcy—"that the total bankruptcies and arrangements under insolvency proceedings had increased from 5,002 in 1870 to 13,132 in 1879. The liabilities during the same period had increased from £17,456,429 to £29,678,193. The estimated assets had increased from £5,381,533 to £10,193,617 from which it resulted that the loss during the same period had increased from £12,074,896 to £19,484,576." And then he sums up the effect of the Act of 1869 thus, "Therefore only 7 per cent. of the whole of the cases of insolvency were subject, under the present system, to public control, while 93 per cent. were left without supervision, and naturally presented the widest possible field for every kind of fraud and abuse. It was, of course, this absence of proper control which tempted and induced debtors who feared it, and professional agents whose gains would be diminished by it, to resort to liquidations and compositions in preference to bankruptcy. The question arose, under what provisions of the existing law this state of things had been permitted to exist ? Under Section 125 of the Act it was possible for a debtor who found himself unable, or who might be unwilling, to pay his debts, to have a meeting of creditors summoned on his behalf, at a time and place convenient to himself, and certainly in very many cases inconvenient to the majority of the creditors. At that meeting the creditors present, either by themselves or by proxies, creditors, in some cases, in friendly collusion with the bankrupt, in other cases fictitious, in not a few cases fraudulent, might, by the requisite majority in number and three-fourths in value, elect a trustee, agree to a liquidation, dispense with the security which the Act required the trustee to give." I understand you would correct that ?—Yes, and the appointment of the trustee also would be corrected.

674. I do not follow that, but I will finish the paragraph. "Get rid of all investigation of the previous conduct and affairs of the bankrupt, and discharge the debtor, even although he might be guilty of fraud or scandalous negligence, and even although the assets showed no dividend whatever ; and this arrangement they were competent to impose upon a dissenting minority of bonâ fide creditors. Under this system there was absolutely no public inquiry whatever, no examination on oath, and no security for the protection of the public interests which were involved in every insolvency. The position of a trustee elected under these circumstances was an exceedingly enviable one, provided he was not troubled with any moral scruples whatever. He was practically uncontrolled as to his disposition of the estate and its administration. He could, and very often did, appoint his own committee of inspection, from whom he was bound to take his instructions."

675. (Mr. Peat.) I should like to take your opinion on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Smith is reading something that Mr. Chamberlain said which I have not the least doubt reflected very serious discredit on people who did not deserve such discredit. Not only that particular speech was delivered on that occasion, but other speeches were delivered on the other side, and I hardly think that the extract which Mr. Smith has read should appear on the minutes of our proceedings. I would invite Mr. Smith, if he is going to read that and have it recorded on the proceedings, to read what was said on the other side in the discussions in 1890 when the Bankruptcy Act or that year was passed, so that we may see what the trading community then said after seven years' experience of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. I do not wish to take up any side on this particular question, but that speech does take a very prejudiced view which was criticised many times over in the discussions which took place at the time.

676. (Chairman.) I think Mr. Smith is only putting the matter in this way that if that was a correct representation of the feeling as to the results of the working of that Act would it make any difference in Mr. Longstaffe's opinion in advocating a reversion to that state of things.

677. (Mr. Peat.) I think it is making suggestions which no evidence has ever demonstrated to be true.

678. (Mr. Smith.) I am not putting it forward as having been demonstrated to be true. I am putting it forward as the allegation on which the legislation in 1883 was proposed and carried, and I am asking if such a state of things were again possible and could occur now, whether it would affect the witness's opinion. I propose to refer to the practice under the present Act, and under the present deeds of arrangement system to show how far these practices still exist.

679. (Mr. Peat.) It will be occupying rather a lot of time.

680. (Mr. Smith.) I am very sorry indeed that I should occupy time, but the question relating to deeds of arrangement strikes, in my opinion, at the very foundation of the bankruptcy system. It was not on my motion or by my will that the matter was introduced at all, but proposals have been made which, if carried out, would, in my opinion, be absolutely fatal to the present system of bankruptcy administration. I am in the hands of the Chairman, but I cannot allow these suggestions to remain on our notes without showing that the whole history of bankruptcy legislation has proved that this system has been tried over and over again and has led to the repeal of former legislation.

681. (Mr. Richardson.) The speech you are reading from was delivered when ?

682. (Mr. Smith.) It is the speech which was delivered on the introduction of the present Bankruptcy Bill in 1881 by Mr. Chamberlain.

683. (Mr. Richardson.) I should like Mr. Chamberlain's opinion on it to-day.

684 (Chairman.) The question at present for decision raises the question whether it is in order for Mr. Smith to put the extracts from the speech to the witness. My view is that that is in order because Mr. Smith is entitled to say these were the expressions of opinions in Parliament at the time, and inasmuch as our recommendations are, I suppose, to go before Parliament in some form or another, it is legitimate to put this expression of opinion delivered at that time. I think that that is right. Of course it will be open for any member of the Committee to put either to Mr. Longstaffe, or to any other witness, opinions to the contrary, and I should not like to take upon myself the responsibility to exclude it.

685. (Mr. Peat.) It will take up a very long time.

686. (Chairman.) I think that is inevitable if we are going into this question, because this question possesses in my view 99 per cent. of the importance of the whole of the questions on which we have embarked. At the present moment the system that prevails is that no arrangement is to have statutory validity unless it is preceded by a public examination and by the decision of the Court upon a report dealing with questions of morality. A system which would exclude that in any form at all is one which requires investigation, and I do not think that any time devoted to its consideration would be too great.

687. (Mr. Smith.) I may say, sir, that the main reason why I put it forward was to suggest what is possible and what can be done under a system such as that which Mr. Longstaffe has advocated, viz., that of giving power to the majority to bind the minority. I say that all these results with regard to the practice under the 1869 Act may ensue from that system which he advocates.

688. (Chairman.) The only thing I was going to suggest as regards reading to Mr. Longstaffe this extract, with a view to asking his opinion upon it, was whether extracts from speeches in Parliament might not be read to the Committee when we come to consider this matter on our Report, and whether it would not be more convenient at any rate merely to put anticipated results to the witness.

689. (Mr. Peat.) I think the witness has already stated his opinion very clearly and very distinctly, and the reading of this speech which was a very one-sided speech indeed—which was natural from having been delivered in Parliament—seems to have been with the view of asking the witness to change the opinion which he has deliberately expressed by placing before him a statement of facts without the contradictions bearing upon them, and which, in the subsequent discussions in 1890, were still more forcible and marked. You have ruled that the matter is in order, Mr. Chairman, and, therefore, I have no more to say.

690. (The Witness.) Speeches on either side at that time would not affect my opinion in the least.

691. (Mr. Smith.) Nor would these considerations, if true, affect your opinion I suppose?—I do not think that the same circumstances existed then as exist now, or would exist after the scheme which I have expressed an opinion in favour of, became law.

692. I am not dealing with the circumstances—I am dealing with the power of the trustee placed in a certain position which you think he should be placed in. I suggest that he would then have power to do, or to omit to do, various things that are mentioned here; that is my only reason for putting the speech at all. It is the most convenient method of setting out the defects to which your system is liable—altogether apart from the history of past legislation or past administration. For instance, the fact that the trustee may keep the creditor's money in his own hands and use it for his own purpose, I say, is one of the defects that your scheme is open to?—The creditors would have the right to make an application to the Court if they felt that they were ill-used in consequence of that.

693. Am I to take it that whatever the considerations may be, and although you must admit that there is a possibility at least of such things occurring, it would not affect your views in making the recommendations you do?—That is so.

694. Then I need not proceed with the matter further. I do not wish to prejudice the enquiry in any way. I do not want to state anything but facts. I suppose you may take it from me or from the Chairman that there was a very great increase in insolvency during the time that the 1869 Act was in force?—I take it from you.

695. And that it was stated to be the object of the new law to diminish the amount of that insolvency. Now, under the present Act, do you know what the result has been—whether insolvency has diminished as compared with the previous state of things or not?—No, I do not.

696. May I give you these figures, which are official figures, taken from the Board of Trade reports, upon the working of the present Act. The Board of Trade Reports show that the average liability for ten years under the 1869 Act in Bankruptcy——

697. (Mr. Addison.) I do not like to interfere, but is this putting a question?

698. (Mr. Smith.) I am going to put a question which will affect the witness's opinion.

699. (Mr. Addison.) It is such a mass of detail that I hardly think it is a question.

700. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think it regular, Mr. Chairman?

701. (Chairman.) I think it is regular, but were you going to give very many statistics, because if so, we might circulate them amongst the Committee?

702. (Mr. Smith.) What I want to know is this—I will point out in a single sentence what I want.

703. (Mr. Richardson.) Does not the amount of insolvency depend on the state of trade at any given time?

704. (Mr. Smith.) All I want to point out is this, that under the system of the Act of 1869, which allowed voluntary arrangements, there was a very great deal of, and a very great increase in, the amount of insolvency, and that under the present Act, which has brought all these voluntary arrangements within the law, excepting deeds of arrangement, there has been a great reduction in insolvency.

705. (Mr. Richardson.) I do not know what the inference to be drawn from that is?

706. (Mr. Smith.) The inference is, that it is due to the working of the Act.

707. (Mr. Richardson.) Then you say that there is no need for improvement?

708. (Chairman.) That is rather a matter for discussion hereafter.

709. (Mr. Richardson.) Precisely.

710. (Mr. Peat.) I should very much like the figures from Mr. Smith upon which he was asking the question. I daresay they are all before us in the Board of Trade Reports; but if they are to be used as foundations of questions, we might at any rate have them; so that we might look at them beforehand.

711. (Chairman.) We will circulate them if you like. Perhaps Mr. Smith will hand them in. (Document handed in.)

712. (Mr. Peat.) So far as I am concerned, the statistics would have quite as much affect as if they had been filtered in the first instance through Mr. Longstaffe.

713. (Mr. Smith.) I only wanted to know if they affected Mr. Longstaffe's opinion in any way.

714. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Might they not be put before Mr. Longstaffe now?

715. (Mr. Smith.) I do not want to do anything irregular.

716. (Chairman.) I do not think it will be irregular.

717. (Mr. Smith.) The result is this, that under the Act of 1869, in the ten years from 1874 to 1883, the liabilities amounted to £21,991,964; the assets to £6,523,879, and the loss to creditors to £15,468,085. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, for the five years between 1896 and 1900 the liabilities under bankruptcies and deeds averaged £10,000,000; the assets £4,000,000, and the loss to creditors to £5,000,000—that is, the loss was reduced by two-thirds. Then, during the last five years the statistics which include liabilities under voluntary deeds of arrangement, show that the liabilities averaged £10,000,000; the assets £5,000,000; and the loss to creditors £6,000,000. So that we have a total loss, under bankruptcies and deeds, of between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000, as against £15,000,000 under the Act of 1869. Now what I want to put to you is this; that the object of the Bill having been, as stated in its introduction, the diminution of insolvency, and that diminution in insolvency having taken place during the period to such an extent as I have mentioned, does that in any way affect your judgment in asking that the system of voluntary arrangement, which was in force before the present Act came into being, should be restored ?—No, it does not.

718. (Chairman.) I am not quite clear as to how you would originate the proceedings. What I mean is this, at present all proceedings under deeds of arrangement practically originate with the debtor himself ?—Certainly.

719. Under the Acts, an impartial person calls the creditors together and decides who are creditors and who are not and so forth. Would you give validity to arrangements started by the debtor, or only to those which the creditors in some way or other originate ?—I do not see how creditors can originate them.

720. You do not think that they could ?—No.

721. (Mr. Richardson.) Last week you were good enough to say that the main objection you had to the registration of the assignment of book debts was, for instance, that a man who might have incurred a bill to his tailor would under such a system have his debt made public ?—Yes.

722. Would you object to the registration of an assignment of book debts if it were done on precisely the same lines as a bill of sale, simply putting it in this way ; that John Smith assigned to William Brown £459 worth of book debts on such a date. If it were done in that manner, would your objection be removed ?—Not altogether.

723. It would not become known whose the debts were then, but it would be simply a bald announcement ?—I quite understand your question, but there may be two ways of assigning a book debt, either by way of mortgage or absolutely. It happens—I will not say often—the creditors assign book debts not because they want money.

724. It is the debtor who assigns a book debt—you said the creditor ?—Yes, I am speaking of a creditor who assigns a book debt.

725. But it is the debtor who assigns the book debt ?—I was speaking of the person to whom the debt was owing. I called him a creditor. Take A, the person to whom the debt is owing. It may be that he would assign it because he is asked to assign it and not because he wants any money to put in his business, or because he is hard up. For instance, I have had a case where a man chooses to assist a relative, to whom he has advanced certain monies in order to pay a number of creditors. In order to secure himself he takes an assignment of each of their debts. Those creditors assign their debts to the person who has provided the money to pay the debts of the person who is hard up. Now it would be very much against their wish, I am sure, that their name should appear in the register as having assigned their debts.

726. True. But do not you agree that the assignment of book debts is injurious to the remaining creditors ?—It may be so.

727. And you agree that it is right that we should legislate for the majority, and not for the minority ?—I do not think credit is given on the book debts a man has made. For instance, if you are going to register the assignment of a book debt, which is, after all, only a way of curtailing credit, a way of turning a credit transaction into a cash transaction, you will have to register the discounting of bills.

728. But as soon as a bill of sale appears in the Gazette the creditors immediately begin to cease giving credit to the man who has given the bill of sale. The assignment of book debts, I maintain, is simply a bill of sale in another form, and is given generally by men who are insolvent at the time they are given, and if it had to appear in the Gazette in the same form as a bill of sale, there would then be an opportunity for other creditors to at once prevent an injustice being done to them by a sharp creditor who has secured a monopoly of book debts ?—That might be so.

729. (Mr. Peat.) I would ask if you have any considerable experience in public limited companies ?—Not considerable—I have some—but I will not say considerable.

730. You were asked a question a little time ago with regard to the bankruptcy law and the law of insolvency, comparing the present Bankruptcy Act with the last Bankruptcy Act. You were not asked whether the creation of limited companies in the last thirty years, and the failures of limited companies in the last thirty years affected the matter ?—I was not asked that.

731. Would you say it does effect the matter ?—I should say it did.

732. To an important or unimportant extent ?—To an important extent.

733. You were asked several questions with reference to the evils arising from what I might call voluntary liquidation, as distinguished from liquidation under the Bankruptcy Act. Do you think those evils less, because in every case 100 per cent. of the creditors must sign or be paid out, than they would be if similar cases arose which were brought into operation by a majority, not necessarily a bare majority, but some majority. I do not know that I have explained it sufficiently clearly. The voluntary arrangements under deeds of assignment exceed, say, 4,000 cases a year. In most of the cases in order to make them successful, certain creditors have to be paid more than they are really entitled to by a fair distribution. If the same cases could be carried by a reasonable majority those creditors would not be paid ?—That is so.

734. Does the fact of the need of paying those creditors in full, or more than they are entitled to, result in that class of case being more or less satisfactory, than if it were carried by a majority ?—I think that if it were carried by a majority it would be more beneficial to the general body of the creditors.

735. In your opinion is the mischief of a voluntary deed of arrangement—an assignment—minimised because certain creditors have to be paid in full to make it effective ?—I do not quite follow you.

736. Is the evil minimised at all by the fact that in order to carry a deed of assignment certain creditors have to be paid more than they are entitled to ?—I do not quite follow that question.

737. I am very sorry that I have not put it sufficiently clearly. A deed of assignment requires 100 per cent. to carry it. Do you know that there are 4,000 odd cases every year, and that it requires 100 per cent. in order to carry them ?

737a. (Mr. Smith.) What do you mean by 100 per cent ?

738. (Mr. Peat.) Of the creditors ?

739. (Chairman.) What Mr. Peat means, I think, is that the one dissenting creditor can go to the Court of Bankruptcy and upset it ?

740. (Mr. Peat.) Yes ; one creditor for £50 may upset the deed ?

741. (Chairman.) And what I think Mr. Peat was further suggesting was that two or three small dissenting creditors can stand out and go to the Court.

742. (Mr. Richardson.) And those creditors may get their full money and the other creditors only get a proportion ?

743. (Witness.) Yes.

744. (Mr. Richardson.) The three or four creditors who stand out get their full money, and the others who agree to the assignment only get their proportion, and Mr. Peat wants to know whether you think that having a three-fourths majority to divide the whole of the estate amongst the whole of the creditors would be an advantage to the community at large ?—I agree it would be. I did not understand quite what he meant when he mentioned the "evil."

745. (Mr. Peat.) The evil is the evil that was referred to in a previous question that was put to you—the evil is not reduced because you have paid someone twenty shillings in the pound. It is made worse by the fact that you have to pay somebody twenty shillings in the pound ?—Yes.

746. Assume in the case of a deed of assignment that you have certain offences committed by the debtor—let it be that he has traded after knowing himself to be insolvent, or that he has not kept proper books. Do you think that in certain cases a debtor's affairs ought to be administered in bankruptcy because he has committed those offences ?—Not necessarily. I would give the trustee power to bring the matter before the Court.

747. If the creditors desired it?—If the creditors desired it.

748. (Chairman.) I wonder, Mr. Peat, if you would just follow that up—supposing it did come before the Court, what could the Court do?

749. (Mr. Peat.) Punish the debtor.

750. (Chairman.) Under a voluntary deed?

751. (Mr. Peat.) I do not quite see how it could be done—not under existing legislation certainly?—No certainly not. I should legislate for that—that is just what I say. I should give the trustee power to bring that matter before the Court on a summary motion for the purpose of having it decided whether the debtor had been guilty of that offence, and if so decided, having him punished.

752. (Chairman.) At the present moment you suspend his discharge, but under the deed he would get a release. I do not understand what the punishment would be. Would it be imprisonment or what?—It might.

753. That would be having a man in prison without a trial?—No, I would certainly say that there should be a trial.

754. You think that he should be committed for trial?—Yes, if the judge of the district or of the Bankruptcy Court decided there had been an offence he would order a prosecution.

755. (Chairman.) I just wanted to follow you.

756. (Mr. Peat.) You have asked the further questions which I had omitted to ask, but which I see the need of.

757. You mentioned that in the preparation of the statement of affairs the debtor might enter a fictitious debt?—It has been suggested that he might.

758. Mr. Smith suggested that as possible. Have you had experience of statements of affairs whether by debtors or by accountants or others who represented them?—They are generally prepared by accountants in the majority of cases.

759. And do you think that the accountants under such circumstances would pass as a proper debt, one which appeared to be fictitious or one which required enquiry?—In my opinion he would require evidence. They would have to put in the debtor's books or some evidence of that kind.

760. It is the duty of the accountant who prepares the statement to see that the debts are reasonably authenticated?—Yes.

761. You mentioned in the case of deeds of assignments that you would give a dissenting creditor two months in which to dissent?—In cases where the majority had not passed the deed.

762. That is the explanation?—Yes.

763. (Mr. Smith.) In cases where the majority had not passed the deed?—In cases where the majority of the creditors at the meeting had not decided in its favour.

764. I thought it required a majority in all cases before registration?—Before the deed became absolutely binding on the minority. There still might be cases where the deed had been executed and yet the majority had not assented—that is to say, the required majority.

765. I understood you to answer my question in this sense that those cases you would make void unless they had complied with your conditions?—If I said that, I was wrong.

766. (Chairman.) You would make them voidable as they are now?—Yes, to stand in the same category as they do now.

767. (Mr. Smith.) You would leave the voluntary deeds outside the statutory provisions?—I would leave them as they are now.

768. They at present have the validity of a Common Law contract?—They become null and void if the debtor becomes bankrupt within three months.

769. (Mr. Addison.) Mr. Smith has pointed out the possibility of fraud and the danger of allowing a majority to bind the minority. Where it is sought by the majority to bind the minority you think that objection might be got over if it were enacted that the matter should be brought before the Court, who might inquire into the circumstances and make the deed binding or not binding as it thought fit?—Yes.

30 May, 1906.

770. And possibly by legislation which in a proper case would enable the Court to take cognisance of the debtor's conduct and punish him?—Yes.

771. Either by making the proposed discharge under the deed subject to conditions, or such other way as a defaulting bankrupt may be punished?—That is so.

772. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I take it with regard to the assignment of book debts that the objection you have is rather to the publication of the names of other debtors?—That is so.

773. If the registration consisted simply of a notification that "A B" had assigned his book debts, representing so much, to "C D," that objection would scarcely apply?—That would not apply then.

774. And you admit that creditors may be very seriously prejudiced by the general assignment of book debts to one creditor to the prejudice of the rest?—I do not altogether agree with that.

775. You think that is not the case?—I do not think they are to a great extent.

776. If my information is correct assignments of book debts are very largely adopted in the manufacturing centres and revised, as I said before, from time to time. One creditor really sweeps up the whole of those assets, to the detriment of the rest of the creditors who have had no means of knowing that such assignment has taken place. Surely that is to the prejudice of the creditors?—But then the creditors possibly might not have known that the debtor was carrying on business on credit.

777. Where the very nature of his trade is one of giving credit the assumption is that a large portion of the assets of the debtor would consist of the trade debts owing to him?—Yes.

778. In those cases, if these trade debts have been assigned, say to a banker, surely it is very greatly to the prejudice of these trade creditors. Ought not they to have the means of knowing beforehand that something of that kind had been done before they give credit?—If it is the case that had they known it they would not have given credit.

779. Of course I mean that case. Is it probable that a manufacturer would give credit to a trader if he knew that the whole of the book debts of that trader were pledged—hypothecated, to a banker?—It might make him consider.

780. It might?—Yes.

781. Could not you strengthen that answer?—Yes, I should say it would.

782. Do not you think then it would be an advantage that where there is a general assignment of book debts there should be a registration of them, and that that assignment should not be binding until the registration had taken place?—Do you put it generally?

783. Yes, undoubtedly—where it is the general practice?—There may be individual cases where one debt is assigned where it would not be an advantage, but where the trade debts are assigned generally I say that there should be registration, provided the names of the debtors are not disclosed.

784. (Mr. Smith.) There is one question arising out of answers the witness has given that I should like to put, in order to make clear what his evidence is. I understand you to say that you would have three systems of administration of an insolvent estate—one which would be binding as the assignment of all property on conditions proposed by the debtor himself, if not upset within three months?—Yes, under the existing law.

785. Then you would have another which would be binding if only assented to by a majority and not upset within two months?—The present system of three months I would curtail to two.

786. And the other object of the meeting is that a requisite majority should assent to the deed. When would it become binding—at once?—It would become binding at once.

30 May, 1906.

787. And then finally you would have bankruptcy ?—Certainly.

788. So that if the majority once passed the Resolution there would be no opportunity for a dissenting creditor to take any action ?—Unless the court upset it.

789. How could the court upset it ?—I have suggested that the court could upset it.

790. In what way ?—If a creditor questioned the majority.

791. I am assuming that the majority was sufficient—it would become binding, would not it ?—Yes.

792. And it would bind those creditors who had not assented to it ?—Yes.

793. And would prevent them taking any action to upset it ?—Yes.

Mr. William Simpson, called ; and Examined.

Mr. William Simpson.

30 May, 1906.

794. (Chairman.) I think your address is 23, Friar Lane, Leicester ?—Yes.

795. And you are a solicitor and a member of the firm of Owston Dickinson Simpson & Bigg ?—Yes, that is so.

796. I think you have had experience of bankruptcy practice for twenty-eight years ?—Yes.

797. I just wanted in the statement you have kindly furnished us to pass over the first two sentences and to go to the first of the matters, which in your statement is put down as No. 1 ?—Yes.

798. The first paragraph in our Order of Reference relates to the investigation and consideration by the Bankruptcy Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment. And what we should like to have the advantage of your opinion upon, is whether you think that the law ought to be amended in any direction in regard to that ?—Yes, I consider that the law ought to be made stricter, and the punishments added to. Section 11, as you know, of the Debtors Act, 1869, is the one under which prosecutions are usually instituted by the Treasury, and we find also that those offences are restricted unduly by reason of their being confined to four months—if within four months of the bankruptcy certain things have happened—such as that he has falsified his books or done something or other that is wrong. I would suggest that that ought to be extended, and that there ought not to be so narrow a statute of limitations under the criminal law. In the case of a serious offence there is no statutory limitation at all, but as regards the minor offences there is usually a limitation of six months. For offences of this kind I would suggest, at any rate, that there should not be a shorter period than twelve months.

799. (Mr. Smith.) For all the offences ?—For nearly all the offences. That is a matter of detail. There might be some that possibly four months or six months would be right for, but for the larger number of these offences, if they can be proved to have occurred within the year, I think they ought to be punished. There was one case that brought it home to me in a very marked way because the whole of our town was indignant because the man was not prosecuted. The bankrupt showed at his public examination that he had falsified his books in reference to certain large contracts with the War Office. He had systematically and deliberately falsified entries in his books with reference to those contracts to make himself appear in a better position than he actually was in. The result of that examination was that everybody thought, "Oh, here is a man who has committed a criminal offence whom you ought to prosecute." I was most anxious to prosecute, but I found what the public scarcely realised that all the offences I speak of had occurred more than four months before the actual bankruptcy. In other words he had kept the things going by these frauds sufficiently long—I do not say that he had really done it deliberately, but the effect was that he escaped punishment altogether.

800. (Chairman.) You were not able to reach him under Section 13 ?—No.

801. That is of the Debtors Act. You are aware of the present provision respecting the way in which a man obtains his discharge or has it suspended. Do you think that the provisions in the law in that respect ought to be varied ?—I think, if I may be just allowed to read my written statement on that point, I would say that I believe it is a fact—I cite it on the figures from our own district—that about 80 per cent. of the bankrupts never apply for discharge at all. Certainly there are more than 80 per cent. in our own district who do not apply for discharge at all. When their public examination is closed they are practically free, although their assets often are too small for any substantial dividend. In every bankruptcy the bankrupt should be bound to send to the trustee his address and occupation, and a statement as to his means, say every three months, under penalty for default. He should be kept under observation. At the end, say, of two years from the adjudication, the trustee or the official receiver should file in court a report of the bankrupt's conduct and affairs, as in cases of application for discharge, and the bankrupt should be summoned before the court. The judge should then have power (a) to order the bankrupt to make weekly payments into court out of his earnings until a substantial dividend has been secured to his creditors. Procedure similar to an administration order under Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 ought to be adopted. Then (b) (which is a new suggestion), the judge should on that report have power to order the punishment of the bankrupt if the facts reported against him in the report are so serious as in the judge's opinion to require punishment.

802. Is it the case in Section 122 that the debtor has to make payments into court ?—That is so, that is in what we call administration orders.

803. But they have to make payments ?—They have to make payments into court, and it is done, as you know, generally through judgment summonses. It originated from our own district, so that I ought to know something about it. It was our own judge Barrow who suggested it.

804. As regards summoning the bankrupt before the court, would you also summon the creditors ?—I should give them notice.

805. In No. 2, which is a sort of branch of No. 1, the question is whether in your opinion the provisions of the law relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused, or suspended should be made more stringent. What is your view upon that ?—My view is that it is useless to make the law more stringent with regard to discharges. The effect of making more stringent the conditions under which the discharge of a bankrupt should be granted will result probably in further restricting the number of bankrupts who apply for a discharge. That would be a most undesirable result. In my opinion it should be made a punishable misdemeanour for a bankrupt (a) to have traded without keeping proper books of account, and (b) to have failed to give a satisfactory account of any substantial portion of his assets. Perhaps that goes under a different head.

806. (Chairman.) No ; I do not think so.

807. (Witness.) These offences should be added to those included in Section 11 of the Debtors Act of 1869.

808. (Chairman.) As regards (a) would not there be a difficulty in defining what proper books a trader ought to keep—I mean particularly in reference to small traders, such as builders, for instance, who, one generally knows, are men who keep untidy books ?—That is so ; I quite admit that. I do not know exactly the way in which in France it is worked, but I understand in France and in most European countries it is made a penal offence. If he told you he did not keep any accounts, and if he did not, and he was an honest man, it would be of less importance, but if he became bankrupt and it was indicated that he had been fraudulent it would be a very serious matter.

809. A publican generally does not keep any books?—As a rule he does not. He is supposed to have cash transactions.

810. I mean he does not keep any books as to his purchases from the distiller?—I think not; he only keeps invoices of his purchases from the brewer.

811. That you would work out as a matter of detail?—I would not wish to unduly press it against any debtor and under our criminal law we usually do not do so. In the case of a man who had acted innocently he would get off or would not be prosecuted.

812. (Chairman.) I will pass over No. 3, which I think is rather a matter of discussion, and I will take you to No. 4, which is with regard to the realisation and administration of property. The point that we were rather asked to consider was whether it would be desirable to have legislation so as, in favourable instances, to secure the immediate realisation of a debtor's estate as a whole, and to prevent the sort of wastage that arises from unnecessary delay?—As against that, do not you have to put the fact that you frequently realise more by delay than where you force the property in the market. For instance, if a builder fails, and you have got a lot of property in hand, and things are slack in the town, it may be that you will not find a bidder. In such a case an auctioneer will tell you that in six or twelve months there might be a reasonable chance of finding a bidder and in that case I would suggest on behalf of the creditors that they should wait for twelve months.

813. You do not think that there is anything to be done in the way of legislation?—I do not think so, unless a trustee is dishonest, or deliberately refrains, for purposes of his own, from realising.

814. Then the next question arises out of the hardships through undischarged bankrupts trading, and in the first place, as you know, if he acquires real property, any charges given by him become void as against the trustee in the first bankruptcy. The other question is as regards persons who become creditors of his without knowing he is bankrupt, and then find themselves with all the assets going to the earlier body of creditors. Do you think that the law ought to be altered at all so as to protect those two classes of people?—I think you can prevent the mischief rather than cure it, by keeping a stronger hold over the man, and I think that the present system is due to the fact that after he has passed his public examination, as I described in No. 1, he practically considers himself free, and is free. He goes to another town; he perhaps starts another business under another name, takes in a large number of creditors, and then bolts. He goes to a third town and does the same thing there; and as it so happens, I have come on the scene in such a a case and found him. Then the No. 1 creditors in our own town of Leicester say: "We believe this man trading in another name is the offender." He has been arrested for some other offence. In such a case, we have a right to go and we do go, say, to Shrewsbury, and take all the assets. You feel in doing that that it is very hard lines on the local creditors. At the same time, if that man had been well under observation and control, and prevented from going away from the town, by a warrant being issued for his arrest if he clandestinely tried to go, you would prevent a great number of those cases. I admit there are undoubtedly hardships on the later set of creditors; but I suppose logically until the bankruptcy is absolutely closed, and the man has got his discharge, you are almost bound to treat all the assets coming in as going to the first bankruptcy.

815. Now the next question we have to deal with is the question of the position of married women, because it is found by experience that married women who simply represent their husbands in carrying on trade cannot be reached. Do you think that some amendment of the Married Women's Property Act or Bankruptcy Act would be desirable so as to bring married women traders within the provisions of the bankruptcy law?—Certainly, I do. I think the present anomalous position of a married woman ought to be altered. If she is permitted by law to become a trader and to enter into contracts, she and all her property should be made liable to the same extent as if she were a male, in other words, in the law of bankruptcy, all persons and traders should be treated on the same lines, irrespective of sex.

816. And then would you give power to the court, as it is in some instances, with respect to costs of an action, to remove the restriction on anticipation?—Certainly, it ought to be, in my opinion, much more widely used than it is. The Clause is often now used as a cloak to defraud creditors. Mr. William Simpson. 30 May, 1906.

818. What are your views upon that? Do you think that Section 47, or other sections of the Bankruptcy Act, should be altered so as to prevent that or that they should be made deferred creditors?—I think that the exception of marriage settlements from Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, should be removed. If a marriage settlement is not made for valuable pecuniary consideration it should be treated as a voluntary settlement under that section, and I may perhaps just refer to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, with whom I have now a case on the question of Estate Duty. The Inland Revenue Commissioners take this view of a marriage settlement for the purposes of Estate Duty. They say that although a man on his marriage has conveyed to his wife a house, yet, if there is no money consideration, that the wife is liable on his death to pay Estate Duty, treating that as a voluntary gift if made within a year from the death. That was really the reason that occurred to me why the law might be assimilated—that if it was so with regard to estate duty it is almost a fortiori the case as regards creditors, because the marriage settlement frequently is used as a means of defrauding creditors. I have had two cases at least within my own knowledge where a man has stated at his public examination, when pressed, that he has married for the sake of settling his property. A marriage has taken place within a year of his bankruptcy, and it being a marriage settlement under strict law, it is excepted under Section 47, and we are not able to touch it.

819. You are not able to take it under the Columbine and Penhall rule, on the ground that it is fraudulent?—We could not in that case, nor in the cases I am thinking of.

820. The other subject under paragraph 8, to which you have kindly given attention, is that of the law relating to voluntary arrangements that are generally called deeds of assignment, and the question that is asked under our order of reference is whether the trustees under those deeds should be more under control, and whether there should be an audit of accounts and official control of the accounts in the hands of trustees. Have you considered this question?—I have, and I think that in the majority of private arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors the matter is fairly carried out, and that there is no need for official interference. I think the creditors in those cases, if they have selected a man of good standing as a trustee, prefer to let him be shackled as little as possible, but in a minority of cases—in some cases—there is a negligent or a dishonest trustee in a private arrangement, and in those cases I would suggest that the Board of Trade ought to be empowered, when invoked by any creditor to do so, to enforce on a trustee the performance of his duties. For this purpose I would suggest that Section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, should be extended to trustees under private deeds of arrangement just as if he were a trustee in bankruptcy.

821. I am afraid that Section 91 has not, in bankruptcy even, proved a very efficient instrument, because, if you recollect, the words are: "The Board of Trade may take such action as they think fit"?—Yes.

822. And it is a very difficult thing to know what that means?—It is very vague.

823. Whether it means that they may cut off his head or that they may deprive him of his dinner?—That is so.

824. It was pointed out at the time when the Bill was drawn, that it was vague?—There are, of course, other sections dealing with him which one would like to utilise, such as Section 102 (5.)

30 May, 1906.

825. Then you would, as I understand, give some power under deeds that are operative and under which the administration takes place to summarily control the conduct of the trustees?—Yes, you no doubt know of a number of cases, such as that of the man Armstrong. Armstrong's was a case in which I tried to intervene at Manchester, finding he was going about the country defrauding creditors all round. We tried to catch him, but there were great difficulties and the Board of Trade could not see their way to do anything. That is the kind of man one wants to get at. There are lots of men on a much smaller scale—hole-and-corner men not known to the creditors, into whose hands debtors put estates, well knowing that they are utterly unreliable; and we want to stop that sort of thing.

826. There used to be a man called Afford, who had an elderly uncle who passed as a trustee—he was a Norwich person?—I did not know him.

827. You have not been able to give us any suggestion on the ninth paragraph, with reference to the registration of certain classes of securities, but I am a little inclined, since you have had so much experience in large provincial towns, to ask you to tell us whether you think that harshness arises from the assignment of book debts and from hiring agreements which, owing to their being unregistered, nobody knows anything about, but which enable the judgment debtor to snap his fingers at the judgment creditor?—With regard to hiring agreements, I do not see my way to advocate the registration of them. I think it would be almost a dangerous thing to do.

828. We are going later on to have some evidence from High Court bailiffs and people like them, who complain that they are met in the ordinary process of execution in that way, and then perhaps have actions brought against them by the persons who own the goods under a hiring agreement. You would not go as far as to require registration?—I would not go as far as that.

829. (Mr. Chamberlin.) We have heard a great deal about the majority of creditors binding the minority—have you any special views to express upon that point?—No, I have not. Do you mean as regards private deeds of arrangement?

830. Yes.—Whether one man standing out should have the power to make a man bankrupt.

831. I mean where three-fourths of the creditors in number and value agree to the deed. What is your view as to the minority in a case like that?—I would leave the law as it is. Under the Bankruptcy Act, as you know a composition may be carried by a majority in number and three-fourths in value, but only in bankruptcy and under a very strict examination. I think to allow in a private arrangement the majority to prevail would not work well.

832. You in your proof have spoken about keeping the debtor under observation; how do you propose that that should be done?—By making it a penal offence for him to disappear, or go away, or fail to report himself periodically to the trustee until the end of two years. I should compel him to place himself under observation for that period and at the end of the two years his conduct would be fully considered. I think that the idea of the Legislature in 1883 was that every bankrupt should be looked at from this point of view—"First is there any criminal offence committed by you, the bankrupt, and if so you must be prosecuted." Short of that view then—"If you have done certain improper things—been guilty of extravagant dealings and various other things which are numerated in Section 8 of the Act of 1890, you must be put under some sort of penalty." The Legislature contemplated that every bankrupt would sooner or later come under this heading and be considered.

833. What is your experience in your own district as to whether proper books of account should be kept or not?—The report of my friend the Official Receiver in Leicester is invariably the same, that proper books have not been kept. The boot industry is the chief trade in our town, and in that the men are mostly uneducated men, many of whom start, in business not being capable of keeping books at all, and who keep very rough accounts, and in cases where fraud is afterwards discovered there is nothing in the books to show how the fraud has been perpetrated.

834. Supposing a man is incapable of keeping books, is it fair to suggest that it should be made a penal offence that he has not kept books?—I think so. A Frenchman would say, and rightly, that if a man is trading with the public and getting credit from the public, there ought to be an undertaking on his side to keep a proper record of his trading, and that if he cannot do that he must not trade, and when he comes for his discharge he ought to be told, where he had not kept a proper record, that this is a bad case, and his discharge should either be refused or he should be kept so many years before being allowed to trade again.

835. Could you give us as information from your own district any rough idea as to what is the percentage of debtors who do not keep books?—There would not be a large number who kept no books.

836. Or who do not keep proper books of account?—If one is appearing for a debtor one always says, if you are asking for his discharge, "Naturally you cannot expect this man to keep the sort of books that strict accountants keep," and therefore you pooh-pooh the charge and make light of it. There is a certain fairness in that. I do not want to go to an extreme. I think he ought to keep sufficiently good books to show what has been going on in all credit transactions. I would not lay down rules that he must have a cash-book and ledger or enumerate the various ways of book-keeping.

837. But you, in your judgment, I assume, think that a large number of bankruptcies are caused by the non-keeping of books?—Exactly.

838. (Mr. Richardson.) Do I understand that in the realisation of estates where it is thought there is undue delay in the realisation, you would give the right to creditors to apply to the court for power to enforce immediate realisation?—In proper cases, I would.

839. Now there is no power?—No; there is no power at all.

840. You would give power to creditors who might have a grievance as to realisation to go to the court and have an inquiry?—Yes.

841. And the court should then have the power to order the trustee either to realise or to take his time in the general interest of the traders, if it was thought desirable so to do?—Yes.

842. In answer to the Chairman, you said that you were not in favour of a three-fourths majority, and you said you did not think it would work well. You did not say why you thought so?—Many of those creditors who appear may be, and very often are, fictitious. The debts of a wife or a relation may represent a claim for a large amount which, if the claim be sifted in bankruptcy, will be knocked on the head. But at a private meeting of creditors there is nobody to say whether these proofs are properly admitted or not, and it is a common thing at a private meeting for an estate to be bolstered up by persons whose debts are not genuine. If you give this power to the debtor privately to say: "If I can show £400 debts on my list and at a friendly meeting of creditors can get £300 in value to support me," you may, in that way, be ousting a man who has a debt of £50 or £100 which has been contracted on genuine credit. That may be done privately behind the scenes without any public exposure, and I do not think that that ought to be so.

843. Would you not get over that rather by insisting upon proper proof of a debt. You see that is very often happens that a few creditors, because they stand out, get fully paid?—Yes. I know it is very annoying.

844. And the rest are content to have a composition?—Those who get the full payment are actually taking some of the money that the majority have agreed to accept as composition. I think it a very hard case.

845. Do you not think that there are more cases of that sort than of the majority being composed of relations who prefer fictitious debts?—Who is to decide that point, and who is to decide whether the debts are genuine debts? If you do not have it done officially through bankruptcy I think there would be very grave danger.

846. With regard to the assignment of book debts, are you in favour or not of book debts being assigned by the debtor to one creditor. Are you in favour or not of those being registered like a bill of sale?—I think there again, there would be a great practical difficulty; because we know that there is often a single book debt assigned. If you make it the law to require registration it would apply to all cases. I think, that all future book debts ought to be prevented from being assigned, but I do not think that the registration of present book debts should be insisted upon.

847. You will agree, I expect, that in the majority of cases, where book debts are assigned, that they are assigned by a debtor who is insolvent?—Yes, that is very often so.

848. They are assigned to a creditor who is pushful, and who has forced the debtor to hand over to him the book debts?—Unless you can set it aside as a fraudulent preference.

849. And the other creditors go on all the time giving further credit. Do you think, in the main, the registration of an assignment of book debts would be an advantage to the creditors generally limited to a line, as in a bill of sale, to the effect simply that "A" has assigned to "B"?—It would certainly have some considerable advantages, but on the whole I am doubtful whether the advantages would not be counterbalanced by the disadvantages.

850. I do not know what the disadvantages are myself but still, what disadvantages do you think there would be?—A perfectly honest man may be able to keep going by continually assigning his book debts if he has not to register them. The registration of a transaction of that kind of course would be like the registration of a bill of sale and would have the effect that his creditors would come down on him at once. No doubt in the majority of cases it is right that it should be so.

851. Very well, then we legislate for the majority. In the case of bills of sale, after a bill of sale has gone through the people who continue to trade with the man who has given the bill of sale do so with a knowledge of that fact. You agree that in the assignment of book debts in the majority of cases the debtor who has assigned is insolvent?—Yes, that is so.

852. I cannot understand why such an assignment should not be registered just the same as a bill of sale?—I am thinking of the great number of cases where the assignment of one particular debt is used legitimately without any sort of fraud.

853. But it is not going to be any disadvantage to the trader if he satisfies the people with whom he is trading as to the conditions under which he has handed over his debts?—No.

854. (Mr. Peat.) With regard to bankruptcy, have you any experience of gambling being made an excuse for failure, or of losses said to have been caused by gambling?—No, not in a large number of cases. I think it is sometimes used by persons as an excuse. They frequently put it up as an extenuating circumstance that they have been gambling. I think it is more often used in that way than legitimately—I mean for the purpose of assigning a cause for failure.

855. It is used as an explanation of the absence of assets?—Yes.

856. Not properly used do you mean?—Yes, I have had it recently in several cases, where a man has money traced to his hands—say a sum of £40. He is asked, "What did you do with that? You did not put it into your pocket," and he has said, "I lost it in betting and gambling."

857. Would you consider such a case as that a fit subject for criminal prosecution—not a question of suspension of discharge, but a question of punishment?—Yes, I think it might be if it reaches that point.

858. In the case of a bankrupt failing a second time without his being discharged from his first bankruptcy, would you consider that also a subject of punishment?—Not that alone—the first may be misfortune, and possibly also the second may be misfortune.

859. I expected your answer. Reckless and fraudulent trading after knowledge of insolvency, would you regard that as a matter of punishment and not mere suspension of discharge?—Yes.

860. Perhaps you may have had experience of a purchaser buying goods of a person whom we will call "A," and fraudulently pledging them?—Yes, it is a very common case.

861. And applying the proceeds to pay the debts of "B"; have you had experience of that?—Yes, frequently.

862. Would you consider a case duly proved of that character to merit punishment?—Certainly, I think it operates as a fraud in transactions of that sort.

863. Unless you are satisfied that there has been no intention to defraud?—Yes, but that applies to all the section, I think.

864. With reference to a private arrangement you have expressed your view that a majority of three-fourths should not bind a minority. Does your view apply to three-fourths, or does it apply to any larger minority, such as five-sixths or nine-tenths?—On principle of course I should object to it as a majority at all in a private arrangement where things are not checked.

865. Where things are not checked?—Where things are not checked, and you have no means of checking them. Very often at a private meeting you have no means of checking them. You may say that that debt is not a genuine debt, but if the chairman happens to be a friend of the debtor and he says. "The resolution is passed," there is an end of the matter.

866. Your objection to it is because the debts are not checked?—That is my chief objection. In bankruptcy where the debts are checked the Legislature does allow three-fourths, and I think properly does.

867. Your objection is not in principle to the majority binding the minority?—No, I think we should all agree that it is a very unfair thing for a small minority to oppose a composition arrangement.

868. Have you any view as to the period for which a deed of assignment should prevail as an act of bankruptcy. At present as you know it is three months?—Yes.

869. Do you consider it should remain three months or be less than three months?—I think it should remain three months.

870. At present a trustee under a deed of assignment may carry out the terms of his trust according to the terms of the deed and with the approval of the Committee of Inspection and still at the end of three months the estate may go into bankruptcy?—Yes, that is so.

871. And the trustee's actions are liable to be upset because the deed itself is upset. Do you consider that the trustee's actions under such circumstances properly taken in terms of the deed and approved by his Committee of Inspection should be liable to be upset?—I suppose that is one of those cases in which a lawyer has to look at the thing logically; One would say it is bound to be so. It is either good or bad. If it is bad all that is done under it is bad and yet it would be exceedingly hard not to give credit to the trustee and allow his proper expenses. I suppose he usually is dealt with on something like a fair footing, but if he comes to the Court, the Court may deal with him in the way I have suggested.

872. I was asking whether it was your opinion that the law should be altered in that respect. I mean by that whether the trustee's action properly taken and properly authorised by the deed and by the Committee of Inspection should be made incapable of being questioned?—I would not go as far as that.

873. How far would you go?—I would allow the trustee in bankruptcy when he comes on the scene and when he represents the creditors to have the power which I believe he considers himself now as having. I would say: "As you have done good I will allow you so much for that," but I would not say that the assignment trustee should have any absolute right to it, because he knows that the act of bankruptcy is committed in a strict legal sense when that deed is signed, and he must run the risk himself.

874. Have you any views as to the trustee under deeds of assignment giving security?—The present rule, of course, is that he does not give any because he is not officially recognised; but I think he ought to be liable to be called upon and that the security ought to be enforced at the request of creditors in the same way as we mentioned just now when the Court intervenes at the request of the creditor.

875. And to whom do you think he should give his security—to the Committee of Inspection ?—To the committee or to the court.

876. Or to the Board of Trade ?—Or to the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade would, under the proposal, exercise a sort of supervision over him, no doubt, when invoked.

877. Have you any opinions as to the summoning of meetings in the case of a private arrangement ? At present they are summoned sometimes by the debtor, sometimes by an accountant, sometimes by a solicitor, but I do not think I ever heard of one summoned by a creditor—do you think it ought to be summoned by an accountant or a solicitor ?—Someone on behalf of the debtor ought to be the person. He is the man supposed to be in peril and difficulties, and he says to the creditors, "Come before I have squandered my estate altogether—let us have things put in a proper form." I suppose theoretically it is the debtor who calls the meeting, whether through an accountant or through a solicitor. The creditor, of course, in a sense enforces it by taking proceedings.

878. (Mr. Addison.) Referring to page 2 of your notes, do not you think that your (b) is covered by the first subsection of Section 11 of the Debtors' Act ? Let me hand you a copy (handed) ?—I think it might be held to cover it generally, but not specifically quite enough, the object of that section being that he must make a true disclosure of all he has got—that is the primary object—at the time of his bankruptcy.

879. I wanted to ask—in your bankruptcy experience you think it would be desirable in cases where the good-will had to be realised, that there should be, immediately on the receiving order being made, power somewhere to sanction a sale. Sometimes there is a long delay before you can get anybody to deal—there ought to be power by application to the court to sanction the sale of the good-will ?—That is wanted, because, as you point out, the appointment of a receiver does not authorise a sale.

880. Do you think such a power would be useful ?—I think it would be very useful.

881. The discharge is now subject to stringent rules which absolutely bind the court ?—Yes.

882. Do you think it would be fitting that the court should have a discretion ?—I am afraid not, because we have to deal with a large number of county court judges, some of whom are strong, and some of whom are not so strong, and it was found under the old procedure that several of our old judges were very free and easy and used to say : "Yes, it does not matter, you will get your discharge in two months' or one month's time." This legislation was enacted in 1890 with a view of stopping that, and saying, "It is a very much more serious thing than some of you judges have been thinking that it is."

883. What I mean is that the innocent man who cannot show that his losses have absolutely occurred through unavoidable misfortune, cannot get his discharge without two years' suspension ?—That is not a very long period.

884. Even although there may be circumstances that should be considered ?—I do not think it is too long myself.

885. Very well then, I will not press it. Then I observe that you say in your notes that you would set aside a marriage settlement ?—Yes, I should.

886. In the same way as a voluntary settlement ?—Exactly ; if within two years of that time he is a bankrupt that should make it absolutely invalid.

887. As regards the bankrupt's property ?—Yes, of course.

888. You would not do that where the property was settled by the wife ?—No, I would not. I have had one case recently. Of course it would only apply to the bankrupt.

889. I mean, would you in that case set aside a settlement made by the bankrupt ?—Certainly.

890. Although on the part of the wife the corresponding value for settlement was made ?—Yes, because there is no appreciable benefit for the creditors—you see I am looking at it from the point of view of the creditors.

891. I must take your answer, I will not discuss it. One other question. We find in London great delay in getting adjudication. You have got a judgment, but when we serve the debtor's notice there are adjournments, delays, and expenses. Do you think there ought to be more summary and speedy adjudication obtainable than is now obtainable ?—It is a matter of appeal really, is it not, from the discretion of the registrar sitting ?

892. Yes, I wanted to ask whether in your experience you think there is unreasonable delay ?—Yes, I think there is unreasonable delay, and that that ought to be a ground of appeal.

893. When you have got a clear judgment on a bill or a debt, the debtor can, under the present circumstances, keep the creditor unduly at arm's length ?—Yes.

894. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I take it from the evidence that you have given, that you attach great importance to the report of the official receiver on the conduct of the debtor ?—Yes.

895. And that it would be desirable that the report of an official receiver should be presented to the court in every case ?—Yes.

896. You propose to give the court, I think, in these cases power to order punishment ?—Yes.

897. If the facts reported against him in the court are so serious, as in the judge's opinion, to require punishment. There are provisions for prosecuting fraudulent bankrupts. Are these, in your opinion, sufficient ?—No, I do not think they are.

898. Do you think they should be supplemented by power to the county court judge to punish directly ?—That is my opinion.

899. A sort of summary punishment ?—Yes.

900. Where the facts have been established on the report of the Official Receiver and where the evidence has been placed before the judge ?—Yes.

901. Then with regard to not keeping proper books of account do you think it would be sufficient if the court refused to grant a discharge in those cases instead of making it a penal offence ?—No. I think that in extreme cases where a man has defrauded his creditors and has wilfully, and, as very often happens, deliberately withheld any kind for evidence to show where the money or the goods have gone, that one ought not to hesitate to punish such a man.

902. I take it that you would prefer, in addition to refusing a discharge, to have punishment attached ?—Yes, to have punishment attached.

903. With regard to the question of registering the assignment of book debts, I take it your objection is to a case where one particular debt has been assigned ?—Yes, that is so.

904. But supposing that the debtor assigns his debts generally—in that case have you any objection to the registration of the assignment ?—No. In that case I think it would be quite fair to require registration.

905. And that it should not be valid until registration ?—That it should not be valid until registration.

906. (Mr. Smith.) Would you object to a new provision that where the debtor becomes bankrupt the second time the trustee in the first bankruptcy should only be entitled to the future assets on undertaking the liabilities in the second bankruptcy ?—I think that it would be very much fairer to make this alteration in the law.

907. There was a question put to you about the percentage of cases where proper books have not been kept. I do not know whether you have read the reports of the Board of Trade on the subject. The facts reported by Official Receivers under Section 8 on applications for discharge are that out of 788 cases the bankrupt omitted to keep such books as are required in 527 cases—that is 67 per cent. out of the whole number of cases. Would that correspond with your experience ?—I think it would, but may I explain that the Official Receiver often reports that the bankrupt has kept what ordinary people would call proper books, but not sufficiently fully.

908. Do you mean that he would report as an offence a mere technical default ?—Sometimes.

909. Although the books had sufficiently disclosed the debtor's affairs ?—Yes.

910. He would still report, but would the Court recognise that ?—No, the court would say if this is anything it is only a technical default.

911. I understand you to propose practically that every debtor should get his discharge at the end of two years, or be brought up, and in return for that you would increase the stringency of the criminal law ?—Yes.

912. Would you approve a clause such as this which is taken from the Debtors (Scotland) Act of 1880: "A debtor who at the date of the presentation of a petition for sequestration or cessio is indebted to an amount exceeding £200, and has not for three years next before such date kept such books or accounts as according to the usual course of any trade or business in which he may have been engaged, are necessary to exhibit or explain his transactions, is deemed guilty of a crime and an offence unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he had no intent to defraud, and on conviction before the Court of Justiciary, or before the Sheriff and a jury may be imprisoned for two years, or by the Sheriff without a jury, for sixty days" ?—I think that would meet the case very well.

913. You said you would give the creditor power to go to the court for an order to sell any portion of the debtor's estate prior to the adjudication; do you think it would be a reasonable thing to confer power on the Board of Trade to sell on the request of creditors or to instruct their officer to do so ?—Yes, in an urgent case; it would only be in an urgent case where such power was wanted.

914. I mean would you, instead of applying to the court, confer power on the Board of Trade to sanction the sale of property in urgent cases where there was a special manager in charge or in any other case where the creditors might think it desirable ?—Yes.

915. With regard to deeds of arrangement, do you think it is desirable to encourage voluntary deeds executed by a debtor without some security for due investigation—independent investigation, into the debtor's affairs. I mean is it desirable by special legislation to encourage them—I do not mean is it desirable to prohibit them, but is it desirable to encourage them by creating special facilities so long as the opportunity for independent investigation is withheld from creditors ?—I think, the very large number of cases of private assignments and deeds of arrangement shows that creditors prefer these to Bankruptcy. Mr. William Simpson. 30 May, 1906.

916. Would you increase that number by giving the majority power to bind the minority ?—No, I would not.

917. You adhere to that ?—Yes, I adhere to that.

918. If there is an allegation of fraud and if any creditor or any number of creditors thought there was a fraud in the matter, would you give them power to bring the question before the court ?—Under a deed of assignment ?

919. Under a deed of assignment ?—Certainly.

920. Would you give power to set aside the deed of assignment or the release contained in it ?—Certainly.

921. To any creditors ?—Yes.

922. (Mr. Addison.) In cases, say, where three-fourths in number and value agreed, would you say that it was fitting or the reverse on application to the court, that the court might, if it thought proper, and on due inquiry, make the deed binding on such terms as the court thought right to impose ?—Would not the court have power under the Bankruptcy Act ?

923. (Chairman.) Mr. Addison means without the man having had a receiving order made against him.

924. (Mr. Addison.) If a deed of assignment is assented to by three-fourths in value ?—I would not allow you to enforce it against the remaining fourth without some investigation.

925. Would you object to that being made enforceable by the court upon the court being given powers of investigation ?—I think then you would practically bring it under bankruptcy. I should not allow it without it being brought before the court and made the subject of investigation.

926. (Mr. Smith.) Supposing the official receiver were allowed a standing, would you object to it then ?—No, I would not object.

SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 13th June, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOHN BARKER, Esq., M.P.
GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., J.P.
SAMUEL T. EVANS, Esq., K.C., M.P.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. DAVID DICKINSON, called; and Examined

927. (Chairman.) I think you are an estate agent and auctioneer ?—I am.

928. And you have been secretary for the last thirteen years of the Blackpool Tradesmen's Association ?—Yes.

929. And I think you are Chairman of Committees of the National Chamber of Trade ?—Yes.

930. And you have been deputed to give evidence here to-day by that body ?—Yes, that is so.

931. I think you carry on business at No. 25 Birley Street, Blackpool ?—Yes.

932. Have you a large acquaintance with administration in bankruptcy ?—No, I cannot say that I have had a very large experience. I have been deputed to give evidence here to-day on behalf of the National Chamber of Trade, probably in my capacity as Chairman of Committees, and not on account of the very large amount of information which I personally possess. What I desire to do, and would like to do, would be to place before the Committee what is the general trader's view of this question. Mr. David Dickinson. 13 June, 1906.

933. Would you mind telling us exactly what is the constitution of the National Chamber of Trade—I mean of the representatives ?—I can only speak from memory—I have not the exact figures before me, but I believe that we have something like 100 affiliated associations, but possibly more.

934. Of traders ?—One hundred affiliated associations—that is to say, take my own association in Blackpool, it has between 300 and 400 members. We are an affiliated body, and there are something like 100 or more of these affiliated bodies.

935. What is the name of your association in Blackpool ?—The Blackpool Tradesmen's Association.

13 June, 1906.

936. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Mr. Ellis says in his proof that you have 103 affiliated associations?—Yes, I was speaking from memory.

937. (Chairman.) What I rather meant was that it is an association of traders?—Yes, that is so, it is an affiliation of trade associations. I might also mention, what I have not mentioned at the commencement of my evidence, that I am also a member of the County Borough Council of Blackpool.

938. Will you tell us what, as representing the National Chamber of Trade, first of all, are the general views which you wish to put before us with regard to the administration of the Bankruptcy Law?—The present law of bankruptcy is altogether too costly in the hands of Official Receivers, and would certainly be much less costly, and probably quite as effective, if not more so, if it were left in the hands of the creditors themselves, because each of the creditors has a personal interest and would be more likely to act in the best interests of the creditors than Official Receivers would be. I refer, perhaps, more particularly now in making that statement to small cases where the liabilities are less, say, than £200. Then again the expenses of administration in all these cases, in my opinion, are much too high, because, in a very large number of cases, practically the whole of, or a very large percentage, at any rate, of available assets are swallowed up in expenses and the poor creditor is left with almost nothing in the £, whereas if the small failures were conducted by the creditors themselves, with possibly the assistance of a good accountant, much expense would be spared and better results obtained. I would like to specially urge the alteration of the law in regard to one creditor being able to make a man bankrupt to the detriment of the majority of the creditors and against the wishes of the majority of the creditors. The law in this respect should be amended so as to make it more difficult, and indeed impossible, for one creditor to force an estate into bankruptcy. Another important matter in which the law should be amended is in respect to the ease with which a defaulting debtor can start business, say, under his wife's name or of some other name and go on trading, although he is a bankrupt, the person supplying the goods being absolutely ignorant of the fact that the man is an undischarged bankrupt. This is an act that, in my opinion, should be liable to a severe penalty. A debtor at present, as the law stands, or at any rate as it is carried out, suffers practically no inconvenience. He is whitewashed, it is true, by the proceedings before the official receiver and may not get credit for more than £20 from any one person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, and besides that, of course, any after acquired property is liable to seizure by the official receiver, for the first creditors, but all these disabilities put together do not trouble him, because he can put up his wife's name and carry on a business in another town, and that is practically how the thing goes on, and there is practically no penalty attached to his bankruptcy. Then, again, I think the penal clauses should be made more stringent. Under the present conditions it scarcely makes any difference how fraudulent a debtor may be. It appears to be practically impossible to get a conviction against him, owing to the very unsatisfactory state of the law, or at any rate the present way in which the law is carried or not enforced. I am not quite prepared to go into the technicalities of the law. I am speaking, of course, generally, but my friend, Mr. Ellis, who is to follow me, will probably go into technical matters more closely. At the same time I feel that great care would have to be taken with debtors who get into difficulties, perhaps through no fault of their own and who have met with misfortune in various ways. It certainly seems an unhealthy state of things that a man may continue trading until the whole of his assets are exhausted, except, perhaps, sufficient to pay the costs of a bankruptcy petition, and in that way practically evade payment altogether of what are his just debts. There are also to be considered the very hard and not infrequent cases where a debtor, perhaps through misfortune, finds his debts exceed £50, but cannot raise the necessary funds for a petition. He is thus devoid of the protection which is given to the fraudulent trader and is liable to be perpetually harassed by his creditors, simply because he cannot raise enough money. The law with regard to fraudulent and reckless trading should certainly be made more stringent, and the very fact that such trading has been carried on should be sufficient without proving "intent to defraud" to get a conviction. The fact that fraud has been committed should of itself be sufficient, as is the case in ordinary theft. Then with regard to deeds of assignment it should not be in the power of one small creditor to upset the deed which has been made with the acquiescence of the large creditors for the benefit of the estate. There should be a rule that on the assent of two-thirds in value of the bona fide creditors the remainder should be compelled to fall in with the arrangement and not, as is often the case, force a debtor into bankruptcy. Cases of that sort have come under my personal notice time after time. Then, again, more power should be given to the bona fide creditors, who are often swamped by accountants who obtain proxies for a certain number of creditors, and in some cases get the power to manipulate the estate to suit their own ends, and in such a way as is not always for the benefit of the bona fide creditor.

939. I should like to ask you one or two questions upon your proof, but if they are ones which you would prefer Mr. Ellis to answer I daresay you will tell me. If you will go to page 1 of your statement you say: "The present state of the law of bankruptcy is altogether too costly in the hands of Official Receivers and would certainly be much less costly and probably quite as effective in the hands of the creditors themselves." But it is the case, is it not, or do you not know it, that in bankruptcy the creditors are called together and elect their own trustee if they choose to do so, and it is only left in the hands of the official receiver if the creditors do not elect a trustee of their own?—Yes; but invariably, if I am correct in my view, when the bankruptcy is carried through by the Official Receiver it is very much more expensive than if carried through by creditors themselves with their own trustee.

940. But that is the result of the creditors not electing a trustee when they might have done so?—Yes, that may be so, but many of the creditors often enough do not take the trouble to attend meetings.

941. Is it your personal experience that the expenses are greater when winding up is officially administered, because I mean there are statistics to the contrary; or is it only the view of your society?—I think it is more a general view.

942. Are you aware also that in those small cases which are under £300, the creditors have now under the Act of 1890 power to elect their own trustee if they like?—I am not aware either one way or another. That is a point I have not considered.

943. Then there is another matter I wanted to ask you about. You say the fact that fraud has been committed should itself be quite sufficient without proving intent to defraud as in the case of ordinary theft, but in the ordinary taking of another man's goods there is no criminality unless there is an intent to steal?—No.

944. A man might carry on his business without knowing he was insolvent?—Exactly; then I should not call him a fraudulent debtor. If he is carrying on business fraudulently which is undoubtedly done in a great number of cases that should be treated in the same way as a case of ordinary theft, whereas at present a man gets off scot free.

945. (Mr. Evans.) I am not quite sure what the witness means by fraudulent.

946. (Chairman.) No.

947. (The Witness.) For instance I may explain. I should say that what I mean is this. If a man gambles, attends race meetings or bets on a racecourse or on the Stock Exchange or anywhere else, with money which does not belong to him, I should call it fraudulent trading if he is using money in that way.

948. (Chairman.) But betting on the racecourse is not trading?—No, but if he is using money in that way which belongs to his creditors.

949. But the fraudulent trading that one has most experience of is where a man buys goods on credit and sells them under cost price and then goes larking about with the money?—I have made a note somewhere of that as to gambling, buying goods and recklessly selling at less than cost price.

950. Slaughtering them ?—Yes, slaughtering the goods.

951. In your statement you say that there should be a rule that on the assent of two-thirds in value of the bona-fide creditors the remainder should be compelled to fall in with the arrangement. Have you considered the question of how it should be ascertained who are the creditors, because sometimes, you know, the debtor is asked in his public examination when at the meeting: "Why did not you summons" so and so? and he says, "I do not admit that they are creditors at all." I mean in Bankruptcy there is machinery provided for ascertaining who are the creditors and who are not, but in the origination of a private arrangement the debtor summonses whom he likes ?—I should make it a penal offence against a debtor if he did not disclose the whole of his liabilities.

952. (Mr. Smith.) Just following up that, supposing he does disclose the whole of his liabilities; supposing he discloses more and discloses all his doubtful liabilities, how would you treat those in reckoning up the majority ?—It is a point I have not considered and I am afraid I cannot give you an answer to it.

953. I suppose you are aware that in a great many of these cases, especially where there is a contest for the election of trustee, there are disputed claims which have ultimately under the Bankruptcy Act to be adjudicated upon by the Court ?—I am aware of that.

954. Do not you think there is a great temptation to a debtor acting in collusion perhaps with some of his creditors, in order to avoid bankruptcy and an investigation into his affairs, to return as debts, claims which probably could not be substantiated in Court, but which would afford sufficient foundation to prevent anybody else upsetting them without investigation. You have not suggested any method by which such claims could be investigated by any independent tribunal or person ? Do not you think that it would be possible by collusion in that way to influence the voting at a meeting of creditors ?—I should do the same as I have suggested before—make it a penal offence if a man did a thing of that sort.

955. But you could not make it a penal offence for him to submit what he holds to be a debt of his estate if he returned a man as a creditor. I remember a case where a claim was put forward for £10,000 by a colliery owner. It was something in the nature of damages, but at all events it was returned by the debtor as one of his liabilities. It was afterwards found—after the trustee had been elected—that that was not a claim that could be maintained in Court, and yet he succeeded in carrying the election of trustee—do you see any method of meeting that ?—For the moment I am afraid I do not, but at the same time the present state of the law inflicts a great deal of hardship on a very large number of creditors throughout the country, and while I am not prepared with a remedy for the moment I think there should be an alteration in the present system whereby one creditor, however small he might be——

956. I am not touching on that, but what I put to you is this. Can you suggest any method by which the claims of creditors to vote in a majority at a meeting can be determined ?—I am afraid I cannot.

957. Very well, then, I will not press that further. You have said that the cost of administration is too costly in the hands of Official Receivers. Have you any data on which to found that opinion, or is it merely a general impression ?—A general impression.

958. Have you studied the reports of the Board of Trade on the subject—I refer to the statistical tables which they publish showing the cost of realisation ?—No, I have not.

959. Then you would be perhaps surprised to hear that the cost of administration by Official Receivers is smaller than that by ordinary trustees. I am not suggesting that the official receivers do the work more economically, but so far as any information available from these statistics is concerned these statistics show that the cost of administration of estates by Official Receivers is much lower than it is by other trustees. You are not aware of that ?—I have a report here which I should like to read a few lines from—it is a book issued by the Law Society.

960. I think you had better not give their evidence I am asking if you have any information of your own ?—No.

961. No doubt we shall get the Law Society's views should we require them. Then you suggested that in small estates the whole of the assets are sometimes swallowed up in costs and that better results might be obtained if the creditors had it entirely under their own control. The Chairman asked you whether the creditors had not control in the appointment of the trustee and I think you admitted that they had ?—Yes.

962. I did not quite catch your answer, but how do you account for the fact that they do not appoint trustees who would give better results than the Official Receivers ?—My impression is that where a trustee is appointed—I think that was in regard to deeds of assignment, was not it ?

963. No, I understand you to deal with the Bankruptcy practice—I understood you to say that the present law of bankruptcy is altogether too costly in the hands of the Official Receivers ?—That is a general impression.

964. Have you known cases where the assets were of such a character that there was nothing to be recovered except by litigation ?—Yes, I have known cases of that sort.

965. They are very frequent I suppose where the assets are substantially nil except such as may be recovered by litigation ?—Yes, but my experience with regard to bankruptcies is not large.

966. I take that answer—that your experience is not large—but you have known of and you understand that there are such cases ?—Yes.

967. That the assets are such that nothing could be recovered except by litigation ?—Yes, and the man gets off.

968. Do you think that that litigation would be prosecuted more vigorously if the matter were in the hands of the creditors themselves than it is in the hands of the Official Receivers—would they take better steps to recover the assets in a doubtful matter of that kind ?—I cannot answer that question.

969. Do not you see that in a large number of estates where the estates are of that character the whole of them must be swallowed up in costs, and that then the question whether the creditors get anything or not depends entirely on the result of the litigation ?—Yes.

970. So that there must be many cases where the creditors get nothing, and where the whole of the estate is swallowed up in costs which afford no evidence in support of a charge of excessive costliness with regard to the present system in the hands of the official receiver. You have nothing to say upon that point ?—No, nothing to say upon that point.

971. You spoke of a trader carrying on business as an undischarged bankrupt in his wife's name—have you any remedy to suggest ?—I should make him disclose the fact.

972. But he is at present liable to a penalty if he does not disclose the fact when he incurs a liability ?—Not when he is trading in his wife's name. He can go on trading in his wife's name and ordering goods from people. I will explain my position as well as I can. When a man becomes a bankrupt he often starts again either in his own town, or some other town, in his wife's name. He carries on his business to all intents and purposes as before, but he puts up "A." or "W." Jones whereas he formerly put up "T." Jones. Then a traveller comes round and offers him goods which the bankrupt buys, and signs a cheque for, in his wife's name. The traveller never knows that the man he has been dealing with is an undischarged bankrupt and he remains for a time in blissful ignorance of the fact until the time arrives when he discovers that he has been trading with an undischarged bankrupt.

973. What would you suggest to prevent that or to amend that state of things, because I admit that that is a common practice and a great evil ?—I would make it a penal offence and I would make him disclose the fact that he was trading in his wife's name.

974. Are you going to make the man liable where he is in the employ of his wife carrying on the wife's business ?

—There is a difficulty one must admit, but at the same time something should be done to alter the state of the law whereby a man while still an undischarged bankrupt can trade in the name of his wife.

975. I agree, but there is nothing you can suggest which would be fair and equitable. You spoke of debtors who could not raise sufficient money for presenting a petition. Do you think it desirable to provide facilities for the discharge of such debtors. You seem to complain that they have not the power of getting a release from their debts ?—The point which I was trying to emphasise there was this, that a large debtor, whose debts, say, amount to thousands of pounds, files his petition because he has money to file it with and practically he wipes his hands of the whole thing. As I stated he gets whitewashed before the Official Receiver; but a small debtor, with debts that amount to less than £50, is simply harassed for six years by the creditors if they like to harass him.

976. (Mr. Evans.) Do you say with debts amounting to less than £50 ?—To less than £50.

977. Your paragraph deals with applications where the debts exceed £50.

978. (Mr. Smith.) I will not pursue that.

979. (Chairman.) You were referring to the small administrations ?—Yes, to the small administrations.

980. (Mr. Evans.) I thought you were referring to the last paragraph on page 2 of your proof.

981. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think the Bankruptcy Law should apply to small traders under £50 ?—No, I do not think so, but I say it is unfair as it at present stands.

982. What is it you suggest; do you suggest that the debtor should have the means of getting released from his debts if he cannot pay if his liabilities are under a certain amount ? (The witness did not answer.) I do not think I need ask any more questions.

983. (Mr. Peat.) I think I have no questions to ask.

984. (Mr. Richardson.) I have none.

985. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You quite understand the scope of this inquiry. It is to go into the matter of the administration of the Bankruptcy Law and to hear what amendments are advisable in the interests of the trading community ?—Yes.

986. It seems to me from the synopsis of your proof that you think that the working of the present law in the hands of officialism is too costly as compared with what it would be in the hands of the creditors themselves. I have not heard yet, but I should like to know what suggestion you have to make as to altering what you, as representing the traders' view, consider to be a wrong state of things. In paragraph 4 on page 1 of your proof you state the present law of bankruptcy under certain conditions, and that it would be more effective under other conditions, but I do not see that you make any suggestion or make any proposition which we can call evidence ?—What I mean is this—we will assume for the moment that the debtor is in debt to the tune, we will say, of £300 or £400—any amount we may take—and if he can get through with a deed of arrangement carried on by a trustee and a committee of inspection appointed by the creditors themselves it is generally understood, and I believe is the fact, that such an estate can be wound up very much more cheaply than if it is put into the hands of the official receiver and carried through the court.

987. But you had it from the late Inspector-General in bankruptcy, Mr. Smith, that the statistics are against that statement. I am merely asking you—have you any suggestion to offer us as a Committee as to how what you advocate can be carried out ?—I am afraid I have not.

988. You say in the next paragraph the law should be amended so as to make it more difficult for one creditor to force an estate into bankruptcy. Do we understand by that that you would suggest an amendment of the law to prevent one creditor from getting assets due to him ?—No. I do not suggest that, but I suggest that it should not be in the power of one man who may have a bit of personal spite against a debtor to force his estate into bankruptcy against the wishes of the bulk of the creditors.

989. (Chairman.) I apprehend that you mean that you ought to give power to the registrar to refuse to make a receiving order in a case where he saw that that was the case ?—Yes

990. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Then on page 2 of your proof at the third paragraph you say that it is practically impossible to get a conviction against a debtor, however fraudulent he may be, owing to the unsatisfactory state of the law. Have you any suggestion to make to us as to how that unsatisfactory state of the law should be amended ?—Perhaps it would have been better to say the unsatisfactory way in which the present law may be enforced. I am told by my friend, Mr. Ellis, that the law in itself is strong enough in some of these respects, but that it is often enough not enforced at the present time.

991. Then in the next paragraph you state that it is an exceedingly unhealthy state of things that a man can continue trading until the whole of his assets are exhausted. Is it not the case that a man proved to have traded after he has known himself to be insolvent can be brought within the power of the law as it now stands ?—Yes, but it is very rare I think that action is taken to make that offence a penal offence.

992. Then on the last page you say that to get a conviction—you use the word as to fraud and reckless trading—the law should be made more stringent without proving intent to defraud. When you have got a conviction against a debtor what would you suggest should be the sequel of such conviction ?—If a man has been fraudulently trading—deliberately trading fraudulently, I think it should be a penal offence, certainly, because it is dishonesty—it is theft in a way.

993. Then with regard to the last paragraph, is it your experience that bona-fide creditors are often swamped by accountants ?—That is so.

994. But is not that the fault of the committee of inspection or of the trustee allowing such a state of things to exist ?—But he is powerless to avoid it. At the present moment what happens is this. A man appoints a trustee first of all. Then he sends out a list of creditors and calls a meeting of those creditors and what happens is that a number of accountants send round to each of the creditors and each one asks, "Shall I represent you at the meeting" ? —I have seen these accountants coming to the meeting with quite a bundle of proxies, and they can practically do what they like.

995. Is not that the fault of the creditors rather than the fault of the administration of the law ?—It may be, but what I suggest is that less power should be given to the proxies and more power should be given to the actual creditors.

996. (Mr. Barker.) I suppose you have been connected principally with small bankruptcies ?—That is so.

997. And you have found in the winding up of those small concerns that the expenses are very excessive ?—That is so.

998. I had a case before me last week and I will just ask you a question about it. A firm of accountants were put in as trustees. They were employed less than a fortnight. Now would you think that £107 was too much for them to receive ?—I do not quite grasp that.

999. The accountants' charges were for less than a fortnight £107—do you consider that too much ?—I should think so 1000. In an estate worth about £800 ?—I should think so.

1001. Do you find a great number of the small traders very careless in the way they keep their books ?—That is a fact, there is no doubt about it, but I think 50 per cent. of the traders throughout the country do not really know how to keep books.

1002. Do not know how even to keep a cash book ?—Do not know how even to keep a cash book. In that case I do not think it is fraud on their part, because I do not think they know how to do it. In fifty years time, perhaps, when we have more school board education we may have a better state of things than at present.

1003. Would you make it a penal offence for traders not keeping their books properly and not recording all the risky transactions they enter into ?—No, I should not be prepared to go so far as that. I would make it an offence and I would punish a man for it, but I would not be prepared to go the length of making it a penal offence.

1004. What I gather from what you said just now was that you think that the small estates would be managed better and would yield more—would be more satisfactorily wound up if they were wound up by the creditors instead of an accountant being put in possession as trustee ?—I am not quite sure that I would debar an accountant from helping to wind up the estate.

1005. But do not you find that accountants are quite as expensive as lawyers ?—I think they have too much power with these proxies.

1006. Do you think they are more expensive than lawyers ?—I am not prepared to say that. I think they are pretty nearly as expensive, if not quite as expensive in these matters, and I also think that they manipulate a great many of these cases, because I have seen it, and it has come under my own personal observation recently.

1007. And you think, do you, that frequently an estate is delayed being wound up simply because two or three creditors do not agree as to the amount of dividends proposed to be paid ?—I do

1008. And you think that if two-thirds agreed that the amount, say, should be 10s. in the £ the others should be bound to come in ?—That is so.

1009. And it has been your experience, I have no doubt, that a great many of these small creditors stand out because a private arrangement is made by which they get payment in full. With that view they hold out and do not go in with the other creditors and in that way estates are frequently kept hung up for some length of time preventing them yielding what they otherwise would do ?—Yes, that is so; they should be compelled to come in.

1010. (Mr. Evans.) You have used the words "penal offence" very often. I should like to know exactly what you mean by them. You see if we have to recommend any alteration of the penal law we must know exactly what it is that is proposed. I will help you—do you mean crime when you say penal offence ?—I think when a man is deliberately defrauding his creditors he is committing an offence and should be punished accordingly.

1011. That is how you use the words "penal offence" ?—Yes, that is so.

1012. Have you made yourself familiar with the various criminal offences which are now set out in the Debtors Act of 1869 ?—I am afraid I have not.

1013. Is there any state of things which you think ought to be made criminal if proved which does not constitute a criminal offence now. There is a long list of them in Section 11 of the Debtors Act and in the sub-sections thereto. Take, for instance, this one with regard to obtaining any property on credit. This is the particular sub-section, No. 13, dealing with that. "If within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, or the commencement of the liquidation, he, by any false representation or other fraud has obtained any property on credit and has not paid for the same." That is one, but you have not made yourself familiar with these offences ?—No I have not. I am not a lawyer. Mr. David Dickinson. 13 June, 1906.

1014. No. When you say that the law should be altered, I wanted to know whether you could help us by saying in what respect. Do you mean that if a man is not able to pay 20s. in the £ when he is ordering goods, and afterwards becomes insolvent, that that should be made a criminal offence ?—No, I should not say that—not if a man cannot pay 20s. in the £.

1015. Then what do you mean by fraudulent trading ?—Gambling with moneys which belong to his creditors.

1016. The learned Chairman has pointed out that that is not trading at all, and that that is going into a class of offence with which this Committee is not called upon to deal—is there anything else ?—Buying goods and selling them recklessly at less than cost price I should call fraudulent trading.

1017. Any other case ?—There is no other that occurs to me just at the moment.

1018. I do not quite understand this last paragraph on page 2 of your proof. "There are also to be considered the very hard and not infrequent cases where a debtor, perhaps through misfortune, finds his debts exceed £50, but cannot raise the necessary funds for a petition; he is thus devoid of the protection which is given to the fraudulent trader." I do not quite understand what you mean. Do you think that some amendment of the law is wanted in that respect.

1019. (Mr. Smith.) A deposit of £5 is required, and a payment of £5 in stamp duty.

1020. (Mr. Evans.) I was aware of that long ago. Do you suggest that that money should be found, or that the stamp duty should be reduced, or what ?—What I mean is that it does not seem at all fair and equitable that a man, although he may have debts which may exceed £50, but is unable to find the necessary capital to file his petition should be harassed from time to time for the next six years, or perhaps longer—although he may have been perfectly honest—through being unable to find money for his petition, whereas another man, who may have been fraudulently trading, and who could find either with his own money or his creditors' money sufficient to pay the costs of his petition, is able to get relief from his creditors.

1021. What do you suggest in the case of a man who has not got the £10 available ?—I have nothing to suggest—I mean there should be some remedy for it.

1022. Then you mentioned the case of a man who did not owe £50 altogether. Such a man can get administration in the county court if he liked ?—Yes. I think there was rather a mistake in the answer which I made. I think I was referring to a man whose debts exceeded £50.

1023. Yes. I rather thought you were confusing two matters, and that you became a little involved ?—Yes, I think I did.

Mr. Sydney James Ellis, called; and Examined.

1024. (Chairman.) I think you are a solicitor practising in London and Watford, and have been in practice for nearly sixteen years ?—Yes. Mr. Sydney J. Ellis. 13 June, 1906.

1025. Do you practise in your own name or as a firm ?—As a firm under the name of Camp and Ellis in Watford, and Camp, Ellis and Panton in London.

1026. I think you are clerk to the justices for the Petty Sessional Division of Watford, Vice-Chairman of the Watford Urban District Council, solicitor to the Watford Tradesmen's Association, the Rickmansworth Tradesmen's Association, the Wealdstone Tradesmen's Association, and the Elstree Tradesmen's Association ?—Yes.

1027. And you are Parliamentary Secretary to the National Chamber of Trade ?—Yes.

1028. I think that has 195 individual members and 103 affiliated associations, with an aggregate membership of 50,000 spread all over the country ?—Yes.

1029. You have had considerable experience personally in bankruptcy matters ?—Yes, I have.

1030. And I think it would be convenient before dealing with the actual paragraphs in our order of reference if you would favour the Committee by giving us your general view as to the present administration of the bankruptcy law in the respect in which you think it is defective ?—I am not dealing now with any question between a deed of assignment and the Bankruptcy Law, but with the administration of the Bankruptcy Acts. It is a difficult thing to speak about the practice of a department. You only know of it by finding out actually what it is, but it seems to me that the Official Receiver should have a larger discrimination than he has at the present time. I have had several cases through my hands recently where the Official Receiver was absolutely certain that fraud had been going on, but where the Official Receiver took no steps, simply because there were no assets available. I have a case at the present time where we could recover assets by litigation, but where the Official Receiver agreed with the principal creditors, that as there were no assets in hand he would not go on unless he had a guarantee from my clients indemnifying him against all costs, and unless in addition to that I acted as solicitor in the matter, and was paid by my clients. It seems to me that if you are going to make the Bankruptcy Laws more useful, the Official Receiver should take up these cases whether there are assets or not, and carry them through.

1031. But supposing he loses the case and has to pay the costs, who do you suggest should indemnify him ?—I think there should be no power to give costs against the Official Receiver unless he acts improperly or carelessly. In dealing with bankruptcy matters you are dealing with very sharp people sometimes.

1032. Would you suggest that the State should provide the money, or who ?—It should come out of the Imperial Exchequer, or wherever the expenses of the present department come from. I know it might be contended that it would be rather an expensive matter, but I think the general trading public would be far more satisfied with it than with the present system.

1033. Then I think in the written statement you have been good enough to favour us with you refer not only to recovering assets by legal proceedings but to the prosecution of fraudulent debtors ?—Yes.

1034. What are your views upon that subject ?—I think that the penal clauses as they at present stand are fairly effective if they are used, but I do not think in the sixteen years' experience which I have had in the cases with which I have been personally connected that I have ever known a prosecution by the Official Receiver. I have heard of such cases, but I have never known in the cases with which I have been personally connected of one where there has been a prosecution by the Official Receiver. I have now a case in connection with which I am going to put a man in the Bankruptcy Court where there is most undoubtedly fraud, but the Official Receiver will not prosecute unless my client likes to pay the expenses.

1035. But if the Official Receiver reports it, it is for the Registrar or the Judge of the County Court—the Registrar in London—to say whether he will order a prosecution or not. Am I not right about that ?—I believe that is so, but that is practically never done—there is always trouble with regard to the matter of expense.

1036. Then on the general question have you anything to say ?—I think I have expressed my views on that preliminary point, put shortly, and I can answer any question afterwards.

1037. You have considered the terms of the order of reference to this Committee ?—Yes, I have.

1038. Would you kindly tell us what is your view with regard to No. 1, " whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor "—which means a man who has had a receiving order made against him— " and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not " ?—I am certainly of opinion that the conduct of the debtor should be brought before the court in every case, because there are a very large number of cases where the debtor never applies for his discharge. Then I think with regard to the investigation of the debtor's conduct, it would be advisable if the Official Receiver had power to have the debtor up to continue or resume his public examination at any time before his discharge.

1039. You mean notwithstanding the order for closing it ?—No, I am supposing his discharge is suspended for two years—at any time during the two years he should be liable to be brought up and have his public examination resumed. The question has been raised about the debtor trading in his wife's name and if the Official Receiver had power to bring the debtor up and resume the public examination of the debtor it would be some check upon him. As a general rule now the examination is closed definitely.

1040. And the thing you mean is at an end when the order for discharge or suspension has been made ?—Yes. Practically the judge makes an order suspending the bankrupt's discharge for six months or two years, and I do not know personally that any check is kept on him afterwards.

1042. (Witness.) If a debtor knew that he was liable at any time to be called up by the Official Receiver and examined as to what he was doing, in the witness box, it would make him a little more careful.

1043. There again, as with some other matters, comes in the question of expense. If the estate has all been distributed in dividends and in the payment of necessary expense, the calling up of the bankrupt and getting the appointment of the court, summoning the creditors and that sort of thing of course is a cause of some outlay ?—I am afraid you cannot do anything without outlay. The Official Receiver would conduct the examination himself and the expense would not be great. I do not think that if the debtors knew that the Official Receiver followed them up in the way I have suggested that these offences would be committed so often.

1044. The second matter which is referred to is as regards the provisions relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which a discharge may be granted, refused or suspended. In your view ought those to be made more stringent ?—I think they might be made more stringent. You see a discharge at the present time is simply suspended as a rule. I think they would be made more stringent by the fact that the debtor could be called up for further examination.

1045. It has been suggested in one or two quarters for instance that there should be a total refusal in a case where the man has not kept such books as he ought to have kept having regard to the nature of the trade which he carries on and his education and so forth ?—Total refusal of discharge ?

1046. Yes, have you considered that at all ?—I have considered the question of keeping books. I think it is one that requires to be carefully handled, because it is a very serious thing to leave a man an undischarged bankrupt for the rest of his life. It has been suggested that the not keeping of proper books should be proof of fraud, but I would not like to go as far as that, and I think it would be a most unsafe thing to go as far as that.

1047. There has been sent to me a recommendation by one of the Scotch bodies to the effect that there should be a provision that if the debtor be indebted to an amount exceeding £200 at the time of the presentation of the petition, if he has not kept such books of account as are necessary to exhibit and explain the whole transactions of his trading or business that that should make it a criminal offence. You would not go as far as that ?—I do not think so. I know a man in Watford, who is a horse dealer and general dealer, who keeps no books at all. He will probably buy two or three horses of the value of over £100 in a day. That man does not keep a book.

1048. (Mr. Evans.) He may not be able to write. I knew of a rich man, the proprietor of a colliery, who when he signed a cheque could only write the initials " R.H." upon it.

1049. (The Witness.) A man may be thoroughly honest and keep no books at all.

1050. (Chairman.) I do not need to trouble you on the question about solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, because that is rather a matter for the Incorporated Law Society to deal with, but as regards paragraph 4, we are asked to report whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made. One suggestion that has been made to us is that in some way or other the Official Receiver should, either under the sanction of the court or the sanction of the Board of Trade, be able at once if a favourable opportunity occurs, to realise the whole of the estate so as to prevent the sort of wastage which occurs when meetings are often adjourned and applications are appealed against from the order for adjudication and so forth. I mean there is sometimes a long time between the making of the receiving order and the adjudication ?—It is a matter of discretion, because the man might be able to effect an arrangement by which he would avoid bankruptcy afterwards. Then he would find as a result of that that his property had been disposed of. That is rather a serious thing. Supposing a man had a business and a receiving order is made against him, but who has a friend who steps forward and provides the necessary funds. The receiving order is then rescinded, but he finds that the Official Receiver has disposed of all his property.

1051. So that you would not be inclined to interfere with the present law ?—I do not think so. I do not think there is any undue delay as a rule.

1052. The next matter referred to is whether the law, so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property, should be modified in any and what way so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

1053. The first branch of that question rather suggests that the creditors in respect of subsequent trading should in some way be protected ?—It is a very difficult subject, that of after acquired property. The only suggestion I can make is that where there are subsequent creditors whose goods are in possession of the Board of Trade, that they should have the benefit of them and not the first creditors.

1054. That they should have a sort of lien upon them ?—Yes, because those are clearly not the property of the first creditors.

1056. Then the latter words of the clause relate to persons who have taken mortgages or securities for the after acquired property of a bankrupt without knowing of course that he was a bankrupt. I daresay you know of the reported cases ?—Are not they good at the present time.

1057. Not as to real property ?—Not as to real property, but they are in other cases.

1058. In other cases they are, but it is really rather a question whether the person who grants a mortgage to an undischarged bankrupt—lends him money on mortgage—should be protected against the claim of the first trustee ?—I think he should be. It is so in the case of leaseholds now.

1059. It is in the case of leaseholds, choses in action, goods and book debts, but not real property ?—I think that real property should be placed on the same footing.

1060. Then as regards the liability of a married woman to bankruptcy proceedings, as you know at present, it is only when she can be proved to have separate estate and to be trading separately and apart from her husband in respect of that separate estate that she can be made a bankrupt ?—I think a woman should be made bankrupt if she has any separate estate apart from any trading altogether.

1061. And apart from anything separately from her husband ?—Yes, if she has any property of her own she should be made bankrupt in respect of it.

1062. In short that having been given the privileges of an unmarried woman she should be liable to the disabilities of one ?—Yes, I fail to see any reason why she should not be.

1063. The next matter relates to the evidence of marriage and other settlements, and one of the chief points in that clause is with reference to proofs which are made either by the wife or trustee of the wife's settlement under covenants and which very often swamp the whole of the rest of the body of creditors. I daresay you have had your attention called to cases—— ?—I have had a good many of them.

1065. I am afraid that that would not quite meet the case, would it, because the suggestion is that the wife and the trustees of the wife's settlement should be postponed creditors as a partner is and as the wife is in respect of money lent for the purposes of trading ?—I do not think I should go as far as that. If they are registered that would give the creditor a means of knowing beforeland.

1066. Yes, I see what you mean. Have you considered the question of deeds of arrangement and deeds of composition outside bankruptcy ?—Yes, I should not be in favour of making them any more stringent than at present. The only advantage they have at present is that they are simple. If they are to be brought into line and more stringently looked after they would become very much more like ordinary bankruptcies. Mr. Sydney J. Ellis. 13 June, 1906.

1067. You would not provide for official audits and official control over the assets ?—I do not think so—I mean there is an audit now.

1068. Not an official audit. They have to send accounts to the Board of Trade but they do not get audited there ?—No, I know they have to send accounts, but I think the creditor can be trusted to look after that.

1069. You know at present if creditors complain, or if the question of proof has to be litigated, it has to be by means of an originating summons in chancery which makes the Court of Chancery a sort of amateur bankruptcy court for these things. Would you be in favour of giving the Court of Bankruptcy power to decide claims under deeds, or would you leave it entirely outside ?—I think the Court of Bankruptcy would be a better tribunal for them. It has more experience in these matters.

1070. And it would be less expensive probably ?—Yes.

1071. Have you considered the question of hiring agreements and assignments of book debts which means practically putting them on the same footing as bills of sale and chattels are on ?—I am emphatically in favour of registering hiring agreements because they are one of the greatest troubles with which we have to contend at the present time.

1072. I suppose you have calculated the question of the enormous number of them ?—Yes, I know the enormous amount of the evil.

1073. I mean that it would require a big register and a big staff ?—Yes, but as I have said before, if you are going to do anything you must expect expenses.

1075. (Mr. Evans.) Why should not they pay their debts ?—They ought to, but unfortunately they do not.

1076. (Mr. Barker.) With regard to book debts, do you think that it is a fair thing that the trader should assign his book debts ?—Under what circumstances.

1077. Under the circumstances that he is carrying on business ; that he has got short of capital and he wants to borrow some money. He says : "I give you my book debts as a security ?"—I might have begun before by saying that the assignment of book debts should be registered with the gross amount without giving the names of the individual debtors.

1078. There would be no names given in what I suggest ?—As long as that was so I should not object. I mean if you assign a book debt you must point it out in the schedule. If it was simply done in this way that the assignment of the amount was simply registered as an assignment by so and so of book debts for so much, then I would see no objection to it.

1079. Supposing in this case that I put, certain creditors came forward to assist the debtor and lent him, say, a couple of hundred pounds, but required him to insure his life for so much, and he was to pay back so much, and keep up the life insurance policy, but after the second payment he could not pay. Naturally he would be asked what security he could give. By that time he might have got rid of all his book debts by having borrowed £100 or £200 on them ?—I think an assignment like that might be registered in the way I suggest. My only objection to it would be as to the names of the customers being made public.

1080. That would not be made public. If you chose to assist a man temporarily he might offer his book debts to you for you to hold as a security. In such a case you need not give the name of any one of the customers ?—I think if you assign book debts you have to set them out.

13 June, 1903.

1081. That would not be necessary. There would be simply a list of the book debts and the creditor would be satisfied to take the list as security ?—I take it you would suggest to register an assignment of book debts in much the same way as you register bills of sale. You have to make a deposit of a copy of the bill of sale, and I suppose you would have to do the same where you had a registration of an assignment of book debts.

1082. With regard to hiring agreements. Supposing people remove into a larger house and want £200 or £300 worth more of furniture, and two or three years in which to pay it off—do you think that they should be registered ?—I do, certainly.

1083. When they have perhaps £700 or £800 worth of furniture besides ?—I think so. You cannot make any exceptions. Hiring agreements are the most awkward things we have to deal with, and under the county court rules, when we put in an execution, we have to run considerable risk in every case where there are goods on hire.

1084. I am only asking your opinion. You do not consider it a very grave offence for a man not to keep a proper set of books ?—I do consider it.

1085. But you would not punish him if he did not keep a proper set of books ?—I would punish him if it were fraudulent, but I think it is a rather strong thing to say that, because a man does not keep proper books, that should be made an offence.

1086. Can a man know his position financially if he does not keep a proper set of books ?—Yes, some people can.

1087. How can a man know what his financial position is until he takes stock ?—I am talking of a man who is a dealer—a horse-dealer, for instance.

1088. A man cannot know what his position is unless he takes stock ?—Such a man never takes stock. He has a very good general idea of what his stock is worth and what he owes.

1089. He may have if he is a very good business man. He may make a profit on his transactions, but it is guess work absolutely ?—Yes.

1090. Take, for instance, a man who goes in for risky speculations, do not you think that that man should record those in his books ?—What do you mean by risky speculations ?

1091. Gambling transactions or Stock Exchange transactions or mining transactions ?—Are we dealing with traders now ?

1092. Do not you think he ought to keep an account of those ?—I do not see how you can make him do so. Supposing a man goes down to Epsom and makes half a dozen bets each day, is he to enter them up in a ledger when he gets back ?

1093. I take it if you bought some stock to-day you would keep an entry of it ?—I should, because I keep proper books.

1094. But you would not expect others to do so ?—I would expect others to do so, but I do not think that you can make it a criminal offence unless there is an intent to defraud where a man does not keep such books. I mean if you did you would make half the people in the country criminals. Books are no good unless they are properly kept.

1095 Do you know that in France they are bound to keep books ?—I do not know that.

1096. According to rules that the Government lay down ?—I do not know that, but is it a criminal offence over there not keeping books ?

1097. (Mr. Barker.) I am not certain.

1098. (Chairman.) Yes, it is.

1099. (Witness.) I have a fairly good experience of the criminal law and I should hesitate to say that that should be criminal.

1100. (Mr. Barker.) They are not so lenient in France.

1101. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it that what you mean is that your difficulty in making any suggestion as to its being an offence or not to keep proper books of account is that you think that there are so many people who cannot keep books ?—Yes, I gather the suggestion made is that any person who has not kept his books properly, whether there is any intention to defraud or not, should be liable to imprisonment, but I say that I am not prepared to go as far as that.

1102. Your experience shows that a large number of traders do not keep books ?—Yes, but most, undoubtedly, keep some kind of books.

1103. We have two witnesses from your society, and the chairman of your committees has given in a proof contrasting the working of the present bankruptcy law as too costly in the hands of the official receiver as compared with what it would be if worked by the creditors themselves. Do you share that view ?—I think the expenses in both cases are perhaps too heavy.

1104. Then I may take it that your proof goes to show that you have a grievance not so much against the action of the official receivers as the Board of Trade itself ?—I am not familiar with the working of the Department behind and I have no means of finding it out. I know what the result is. I know what you cannot get now. I have the authority of a well-known Official Receiver for what I am saying.

1105. You say that the Official Receiver is far too much fettered by the control of the Board of Trade ?—Would you like an instance ? I have got an instance at the present moment where there is a question of an account in a receivership under a contract and the question of upsetting certain debentures. My clients are one of the largest creditors and they want the account of the receivership. The Official Receiver first of all has to get the permission of the Board of Trade, then we have to indemnify him against the costs and I have to give my services as solicitor and be paid by my client. In addition to all that we are standing all the risk. The Board of Trade people insist upon our taking counsel's opinion and paying for it out of our own pocket with no earthly prospect of getting anything, before they will authorise anything. My clients are a very well known and solvent company—the head of the firm dying a short time ago worth £60,000 but the Board of Trade wanted from them a guarantee as to costs. That is a case where if it had been left with me it could have been carried through in a fortnight, but we have been on it now for six months. The Official Receiver agrees with me himself. I have his authority to give his name if necessary.

1106. (Mr. Smith.) I think the allegation you are making is one that cannot possibly be allowed to pass without further inquiries.

1107. (Chairman.) Yes, except of course, that the reason as things at present stand is a fairly obvious one, namely, that if the Official Receiver's proceedings were not to be successful he would have to pay the costs out of his own pocket because the Treasury will not provide them.

1108. (Mr. Smith.) The witness comes and makes certain statements with regard to a particular case which he supports with the allegation that the Official Receiver agrees with him and that the Official Receiver has given him information that certain procedure is prevented by the Board of Trade.

1109. (Chairman.) You mean the Bankruptcy Department of the Board of Trade ?

1111. (Chairman.) Will you kindly ask him the question when your turn comes.

1112. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You say you feel certain that it would be useless amending the Bankruptcy Law unless the method of carrying them out is previously made more workable. You are here to-day to help us with your evidence as to your experience of the working of the Bankruptcy Acts. Have you any suggestions to make to us ?—Yes I have. My suggestion is that the Official Receivers who are a very competent body of men —I think they are nearly all professional men, men of large experience and placed in a position of responsibility —should be entitled to carry out the bankruptcy without continually going to the Board of Trade. The Official Receiver is a capable man and surely he is capable of carrying the thing through. The Department have always control afterwards and he can always be called over the coals.

1113. And you think that would make it more workable ?—Yes, distinctly more workable.

1114. At the end of paragraph 1 on page 3 of your proof you say: "It is very properly made one of the reasons for refusing or suspending the bankrupt's discharge." That is with regard to the conduct of the debtor. I was going to ask you, would you, from your experience, consider that the debtor looks upon the obtaining of his discharge as a matter of no importance ?—In many cases—I mean there are a very large number of cases where the debtor never applies for his discharge at all.

1115. In the next paragraph you say that the provisions as to discharge might be made more stringent. Now, in what way do you suggest that ? The suggestion I made previously was that the public examination should not be closed so that the Official Receiver should have the power to call the debtor up for examination again as to what he is doing up to the time that the discharge takes effect. I think if the Official Receiver had power to do that, and if it were found that the debtor was doing anything improper, then that the penal clauses might be amended so as to embrace that offence ?—The public examination can be adjourned sine die, cannot it ?

1116. Yes, but it is not as a rule, is it—it is usually closed.

1117. (Chairman.) He cannot apply for a discharge until it is closed.

1118. (Mr. Richardson.) I would like to know what would be the good, if any, to the creditors, supposing a debtor could be called up again before two years. What benefit would it be to anyone ?—Simply to meet the suggestion. It is suggested that a man goes and trades in the name of his wife immediately after he has been adjudicated. I would suggest that if he were subject to be called up by the Official Receiver and dealt with that it might prevent him doing that. A man files his petition and he says: "It does not matter—it is all right, I may start again in my wife's name."

1119. Yes; but supposing he did and he had to be examined by the Official Receiver and he said: "It is my wife's business ? "—But it would give an opportunity of finding out whether it was his wife's business.

1120. What would happen if it were found out that it was not ?—Then I should say that it should be made an offence.

1121. It would be very difficult to find out whether it was his wife's business or his own, would it not ?—It might be difficult.

1122. How would it be found out. I do not see how it could be ?—First of all, you could examine the man to ascertain whether he had any assets of his own and you could examine as to where his wife got her money from if she had any. If she could show that it was her own money, well and good, but if not, then it must be money that he must have smuggled through in some way.

1123. Would you not put it in this way, if a bankrupt started in business again should he not be compelled to register the name of the person from whom he has obtained his money, or if he has started in his wife's name should he not be compelled to prove that his wife had money of her own ?—Yes, he should be compelled to give to the Official Receiver full information as to what he was doing.

1124. With regard to bookkeeping, do you say you would not make it a penal offence for a debtor not to keep books ?—In the absence of fraud I think not.

1125. Have not you found in your experience that the bulk of firms that fail have been able to keep books well, and have kept them up to a certain period, and then they have ceased keeping books or have kept them in a rough sort of way, knowing at the time—probably twelve months or two years before they become bankrupt—that they were insolvent, but that they have allowed their books to get into a bad state for the purpose of mystifying the creditors ?—I rather think that there is a clause that deals with that now in the Debtors' Act.

1126. I do not know of any.

1127. (Chairman.) Yes, but it is only four months ?—It might be extended to twelve months, but there is a clause I know that covers that offence.

1128. (Mr. Richardson.) Do not you agree that traders carrying on business in that fashion ought to be punished ?—Yes, I should say that that is fraud, but what I say is that in the absence of fraud——

1129. With regard to the assignment of book debts, I understood that you agree that if book debts are assigned by a debtor they should appear in a register as from A to B, with the amount of the debt ?—Yes.

1130. You think that it is desirable that that should come about ?—Yes, at the present time if you register a bill of sale you have to deposit a copy of the document.

1131. And you would have it like a bill of sale in that respect ?—Yes.

1132. It is a bill of sale ?—Yes, I thoroughly agree with registration, except that in the case of an assignment of a business it would hardly do to assign the book debts.

1133. No, not if the business was sold ?—There would be an assignment of book debts, but hardly any separation. I rather think the idea is to prevent people borrowing money on them.

1134. (Mr. Barker.) On that point, supposing a trader finds that he is considerably involved, and he does not even count his cash takings during the day and gives up any regular system of entering his cash takings at night for perhaps three months before he fails, do you think that man ought to be punished for not even entering up his cash transactions ?—Yes, I think so, and my impression is that he can be punished at the present time, but I have not got the section before me.

1135. (Chairman.) The section does not exactly deal with that ?—Is there not one for wilfully omitting ?

1136. That I think is only within the four months ?—I know the limit is four months in all cases, but it is possible the section might be amended so as to extend the limit.

1137. (Mr. Peat.) A good many bankrupts do not come up to ask for their discharge at all—they do not think it worth while ?—A very large proportion of them.

1138. Do you consider it necessary, whether a bankrupt applies for his discharge or not, that the matter should be dealt with by the court and the term fixed ?—Yes, distinctly.

1139. On the subject of books, I quite understand your answer that if a person fraudulently omits to keep books he should be punished ?—Yes, certainly.

1140. But we will assume that the trader is not a person with a turnover of £300 or £400 or £500 or £600, but that he is a person with a turnover of from £10,000, £15,000 to £20,000, and that his business is one where it is absolutely impossible for him to know his position or his indebtedness without keeping books. Now, that man, we will say, deliberately does not keep books. Do you think he should be punished ?—I still think he can be within four months.

1141. There is no law to that effect at present, but still if there is none you think there should be ?—Yes, but I consider that that is fraud practically.

1142. It is that the man deliberately does not keep books ?—With an intention.

1143. I did not say "with an intention." I did not ask that question. I say that a man with a turnover of £10,000, £20,000 or £30,000 in a business which would make it impossible for him to know his position thoroughly without keeping books, who does not in fact keep books, and deliberately does not keep books, should be punished ?—That is a case where there is an intention to defraud.

1144. Where, in your opinion, there is an intention to defraud ?—Yes, in my opinion—I can only give you my opinion.

1145. Where the bankrupt fails a second time without getting a discharge from his first bankruptcy, do you think that that is an offence that should be punished in any way ?—Yes, that is the first time that that has been put. I think it ought to be.

13 June, 1906.

1146. You have referred to married women being made bankrupt. There are some curious things in connection with the law relating to married women, and one matter is that of a lady and her husband living together, the woman with money and the man without, where there are household and personal debts of the lady contracting, do you consider she ought to be responsible for those out of her personal estate ?—Household debts, being the general household debts you mean ?

1147. Yes ?—And her own personal debts as well ?

1148. Yes, assuming that the man has no money and that the woman has ?—Who ordered the goods.

1149. The woman ?—I think she ought to be liable.

1150. That is, for the joint account you think she ought to be liable ?—I think so, and she would be, I think, at present.

1151. Oh no, she is not ?—As far as her separate estate goes ?

1152. I think so, as far as household debts are concerned.

1153. (Chairman.) This is rather embarking on the law of agency.

1154. (Mr. Peat.) Yes, I think so. You indicated in answer that every married woman should be liable to bankruptcy the same as a man ?—If she has separate estate.

1155. Have you considered the position where a woman has income not liable to anticipation, should she be capable of being made bankrupt ?—Yes.

1156. You consider she should ?—Yes, in fact I should be rather in favour of modifying the law about restraint on anticipation.

1157. We are not discussing that, but if she has any separate property you think that she ought to be capable of being made bankrupt ?—Yes.

1158. On the subject of the assignment of book debts I understand the questions which have been asked have been chiefly directed to where a man assigns a block of book debts ?—Yes.

1159. Have you any experience of a debtor assigning one debt to his bankers, or to anybody—not necessarily his bankers ?—Yes, I have known such cases.

1160. Take a shipbuilder engaged in building a ship with £10,000 owing to him by way of instalment. He assigns that to his bankers and his bankers lend him £8,000 against it. Do you consider that such an assignment as that ought to be registered where there is one debt and one advance against it ?—It is rather different to the other case.

1161. Your answer given to the previous question applied to a case where there was a block of book debts assigned ?—Certainly.

1162. But not to such a case as I have mentioned ?—No, it does not, because, in a case such as that, you might do a man a very serious injury—you might ruin a man in such a case as you put.

1163. I mean a man in a large way of business, if you will permit me to say so; an assignment of a debt arising from work in progress is a frequent thing ?—I know, and I do not think it ought to apply to cases like these we have been discussing.

1164. That is your answer. In regard to private arrangements you said that you were in favour of no change in the existing practice. Is it your personal opinion on the subject; if so, I shall ask you no more questions ?—I do not think any particular change is required—I mean so far as the law is concerned—except this, that I think a great deal of harm is very often done by having to wait for three months to see if a petition is put on the file, and that I think very often leads to serious loss and delay.

1165. Do you consider that the period of three months should be reduced to one ?—Yes; I think it should.

1166. You think that one month is quite long enough ?—Yes

1167. Is there no other change you suggest ?—No; the only other change is the one mentioned by Mr. Dickinson: that a two-thirds majority should bind the rest. It is a very difficult thing to find the two-thirds majority, but I agree with the suggestion, I think, of Mr. Muir Mackenzie that the registrar should have power to dismiss a petition in cases where the assent of the creditor has been vexatiously withheld.

1168. (Chairman.) Where the creditor has stood out vexatiously ?—I mean it is common knowledge that where all the others have fallen in with the arrangement that one man sticks out and says, "If I stand out I shall be bought off." In fact I have done that myself very often and I know that it is done.

1169. And you do not think it is the right thing to do ?—I think the registrar ought to have discretion. I mean, your client very often comes to you and says: "Look here, you must threaten a petition unless we are paid in full."

1170. (Mr. Smith.) How would you give the registrar discretion to say whether a resolution of the majority should be binding or not ?—I would give him the discretion to refuse to make the receiving order.

1171. But that is hardly a discretion. I mean, in the case where a deed of assignment has been executed, would you give the registrar power to refuse to make the receiving order on the petition of a dissenting creditor ?—Yes. I mean, assuming the petition is presented and the petition is heard before the registrar, and the other creditors come and say: "We have all made an arrangement by which we are taking so much" (which may be provided by the debtor's friends), if one man simply threatens a petiton in order that he may get paid in full, the registrar I think should have discretion to refuse to make the receiving order.

1172. Supposing the dissenting creditor alleges before the registrar that there are facts in the case which require judicial investigation ?—Then I think the registrar should have the discretion to refuse to make the receiving order, if he is satisfied, of course.

1173. Would you give the court power to investigate any deed of arrangement under any circumstances on its own motion or on the motion of the Official Receiver or other authority, supposing a creditor is of opinion that fraud has been committed and has been hushed up under a private deed of arrangement ?—After two or three months have elapsed.

1174. After or before—would you give him power to go to the court ?—Yes.

1175. After three months to call for an investigation ?—I think so.

1176. And set aside the deed ?—Yes, if it was thought desirable.

1177. The only other point I wish to ask a question about is the one of procedure. I understand you to say that you regard the present procedure in bankruptcy, so far as regards inflicting penalties on discharge and as regards criminal procedure, to be on the whole satisfactory where the facts are reported to the court ?—I think so.

1178. But your suggestion is that there is some defect as regards the mode of placing the facts before the court ?—Yes; my suggestion is this—and it is very difficult for me to criticise a department, the inner working of which I do not know about——

1179. I think it is very difficult, and I am rather surprised that you have done it ?—I have done it, and I am doing it under difficulties.

1180. I am trying to help you ?—I am sure you will. What I am saying is—as I stated before—there is a little too much procedure.

1181. (Mr. Evans.) Red tape, you mean, I suppose ?—Yes; red tape.

1182. (Mr. Smith.) Do you express a personal opinion that there is too much red tape ?—Yes; I do.

1183. Founded on what—on the information of the Official Receivers ?—On my own knowledge.

1184. On what facts ?—I repeated them just now.

1185. You stated a case in which you said that a fraud had been committed, but where the consent of the department to prosecute had not been obtained ?—It might have been obtained under certain conditions—first of all on the condition of my client indemnifying the Official Receiver.

1186. Before he incurred costs ?—Before he incurred costs, and he had to provide a solicitor and pay his expenses.

1187. But what act involving expenses is required to be done by the Official Receiver ? Do you mean that he will not report the facts to the court ? In this particular case has he reported the facts to the court ?—Do you mean to the court itself ?

1188. Yes ?—No ; he has not. He has reported them to the Department.

1189. Has he refused to report them to the court ? Have you called upon him to report them ?—I have asked him to make an application to the judge and he tells me that he has to get the permission of the Board of Trade first. In addition to that we must guarantee counsel's expenses and take counsel's opinion at our own cost.

1190. Guarantee the expenses of what ?

1191. (Chairman.) You mean the expenses of a motion ?

1192. (Witness.) Yes.

1193. (Mr. Smith.) But there are no expenses of the Official Receiver on the motion ?—Supposing you get an order with costs against him.

1194. (Chairman.) This is not a criminal case—this is a civil case.

1195. (Mr. Smith.) This is a civil case—for what ?—To make a man file a receivership account.

1196. (Chairman.) A man who has been a receiver for debenture holders and has collected a lot of money.

1197. (Mr. Smith.) Then it is your suggestion that the Official Receiver is acting as trustee, I presume ?—Yes.

1198. And your suggestion is that where he thinks he could claim he should be allowed to go to the court to enforce that claim whether there are funds in the estate or not ?—Yes.

1199. Supposing that it is a difficult case and he has to employ a solicitor and counsel to present the case to the court, do you think that that should be paid out of public funds ?—I think so, and I do not think that the public would object to it.

1201. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not object to it. However, that is your suggestion that civil proceedings should be taken to recover assets for creditors on the authority of the Official Receiver alone ?—Yes.

1202. Very well, I am quite satisfied with that answer. Now I come to the question of fraud. Do you suggest that the Official Receiver fails to report fraud to the court very often ?—I think he reports it but nothing further is ever done.

1203. Though the court is seized of the fact that fraud has been committed ?—I think so.

1204. Do not you think that the court has power to report on the proceedings if he has reported fraud ?—Yes, but nothing happens. There are no prosecutions, or very few.

1205. I will not enter into that. There are statistics showing the exact number of prosecutions every year and the result of them. There is no doubt that there are a very considerable number of prosecutions, but what I am asking you is this : is there any ground for the suggestion which I understood you to put forward that the Official Receiver does not report the facts to the court under the instructions of the Board of Trade ?—I do not suggest he does not report.

1206. Then you suggest that he does not ask for an order to prosecute. On the instructions of the Board of Trade he reports the facts ?—Yes, and nothing further happens.

1207. And he makes no further application ?—In the case I am referring to there was actually a report of fraud. The Official Receiver bringing his report says "I am of opinion that fraud has been committed." Now nothing has been done except at the expense of my clients. Every step practically that has been taken since has been paid for by my clients.

1208. Has an application been made to the Board of Trade for authority for an order to prosecute ?—Application has been made to the Board of Trade because we want to get this receivership account.

13 June, 1906.

1209. I am dealing with the question of prosecution ?—It has not actually been made.

1210. The application has not been made to the Board of Trade for authority ?—Not there, we are not ripe for it.

1211. (Mr. Evans.) I thought you said the Official Receiver reported fraud ?—He reported fraud. He reported that, in his opinion, fraud had been committed.

1212. (Secretary.) That is a company case : it is not bankruptcy.

1213. (Witness.) It is in the same department.

1214. (Chairman.) Yes, but that is quite different ; he reports fraud in order to found a public examination ?—Yes, but I mean it is the same department.

1215. Yes, but it is under a different procedure entirely ; an absolutely different procedure.

1216. (Mr. Smith.) What I want to know is, is there any ground for the allegation that the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy fails to report the fact that fraud has been committed, and fails to apply for a prosecution ?—I think he reports.

1217. And applies for an order to prosecute ?—But I think as a general rule no prosecution takes place where there are no funds.

1218. Does he not, as a general rule, invariably where he reports that fraud has been committed apply for an order to prosecute ?—He may do it, I do not know.

1219. Then is it not a somewhat serious suggestion for you to come forward with and to furnish that evidence without having inquired into the fact ?—I do not think so. I said when I commenced that I cannot tell what goes on between the Official Receiver and the Board of Trade.

1220. But you are repeating something which you have heard ?—I am repeating something which I have heard and what I know, and that is that prosecutions do not take place in many cases where I think they ought to.

1221. (Mr. Evans.) Why do not the creditors come in ?—Because the creditors are asked to pay.

1222. (Mr. Evans.) The costs of the prosecution would be refunded.

1223. (Mr. Smith.) Will you give me a single case in which you have known of the Official Receiver being refused permission to report a criminal offence to the Court, and if not can you give me a single instance in which you have been informed that the Official Receiver having reported a criminal offence committed by the bankrupt has failed to apply for an order to prosecute ?—I do not know what the Official Receiver communicates to the Board of Trade but I know of cases where they do not prosecute.

1224. But you are now drawing conclusions as to the conduct of a Department and it seems to me that this memorandum of yours amounts to an attack on the Department itself. Do you know of a single case in support of the statement you make ?—I am speaking of the recent case I had and where I had a difficulty in regard to that.

1225. Do not you think that the Official Receiver might submit the facts to the Board of Trade ; that the Board of Trade might take the opinion in some cases of the law officers ; and that it might ascertain that there were no good grounds for a prosecution or no good grounds to expect that a conviction would be obtained and that on that ground it might instruct the Official Receiver in that particular case not to apply for an order to prosecute ?—They might do certainly.

1226. Then are you in a position to point to any case since the Bankruptcy Act commenced in which the Official Receiver neglected to apply for such an order ?—I did not use the word "neglect," I simply said that they refused.

1227. (Chairman.) You do not suggest that they refused because it was a question of funds. When the registrar or bankruptcy judge makes an order to prosecute it goes to the Public Prosecutor and it is prosecuted at the public expense ?—I know that, but I had in view a case some years ago when I referred to want of funds. I was thinking more particularly of the recovery of assets. That is a civil proceeding.

13 June, 1907.

1228. (Mr. Evans.) That is another matter.

1229. (Witness.) I had a case in Colchester some time ago where steps ought to have been taken. My client spent over £100 in the matter, but we could get nothing done.

1230. (Mr. Smith.) I shall ask that the note of instructions of the Board of Trade to the Official Receiver shall be produced to the Committee. In the meantime I will only put it that in your experience of twenty years no such case has occurred in which the Board of Trade have refused to permit the Official Receiver to report the facts or apply for an order to prosecute unless they were advised that there was no probability of conviction or for whatever other sufficient reason they were advised that prosecution should not take place. I suppose you are aware that the President of the Board of Trade is responsible for the action of every member of the Department?—I should think that he would be.

1231. He would be called over the coals in Parliament where questions are very readily put?—I am referring now to the recovery of assets more particularly.

1232. Yes, I have your answer and I am satisfied that it would be a most impracticable system to permit the Official Receivers in every part of the country to dip their hands into the public purse for the purpose of recovering assets for the creditors where the creditors were unable to recover them.

1233. (Mr. Evans.) Or attempt to recover assets for creditors.

1234. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, attempt to recover them. That is the suggestion.

1235. (Mr. Richardson.) Re the registration of book debts, Mr. Peat put before you the case where a man owes a bank, say, a debt of £10,000?—That was a very special case which he put to me.

1236. There are only a small number of such cases, and in such cases you are even then doing a serious injustice to other traders, because such a contractor has not one debt of £10,000 probably; he may possibly have ten debts of £10,000 and to permit him to give to one trader debts to cover him is on a par, in my opinion, with an assignment to any number?—The special case put to me was where a man was carrying out a contract.

1237. Yes, so it may be, but he owes not only one £10,000 but a good many similar sums?—The case that presented itself to my mind when he asked me that question was the case of a builder, say, who is doing some very large public work for a public authority. He is a little short of ready money and he has a perfectly good debt against the public authority. He goes to the bank and says: "I want £500 or £600 to carry my contract on until I get my next certificate."

1238. He can easily satisfy his creditors that he is all right?—Yes, but if he has to register that it would be rather an awkward matter sometimes.

1239. Yes, but there must be injustice to somebody. You have to legislate for the larger number of creditors, not for the few. You may do injustice to the few. The bulk of book debts are assigned by insolvent traders, are they not?—Yes, the bulk of them.

1240. Then we should legislate for the bulk of them—the few must suffer if any suffer, but I say in such a case where a man is a contractor and he assigns to a bank £10,000 of book debts his other creditors will understand the position and he will suffer no disability?—Like many of the suggested things they are bound to inflict hardship on somebody and that particular case put to me certainly looks like a hardship on that particular person. It is a question of who is to suffer and it must be the minority.

1241. (Chairman.) I am afraid that concrete case you put to us was that if there had been a private trustee either in the bankruptcy or deed of assignment you would not have got him to take the proceedings to get your receivership account unless there had been assets in the estate out of which he could be indemnified?—Probably what would have happened there would have been that he would have taken my client's guarantee and the thing would have been done.

MR. ARTHUR NEWMAN, called; and Examined.

20 June, 1906.

1242. (Chairman.) I think you are a member of the firm of Grundy, Kershaw, Samson & Co., Fountain Street, Manchester?—Yes.

1243. I think you have had a very large experience both in Manchester and London in the administration of the Bankruptcy Laws?—We have an office in London, and I have been acting solicitor to the Manchester Guardian Society for the last twenty-six years.

1244. That is one of the large trade protection societies?—It has a membership of over 6,000. I believe it is the largest in England.

1245. I think that you have been kind enough to study the Terms of Reference to this Committee?—Yes.

1246. And, if I may just take you through them seriatim, the first one is this, "Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor"—that means a man who has had a receiving order made against him, but not an adjudication—"and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended, or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not." I dare say you follow that?—Yes, I follow that. In the case of the insolvent debtor, of course, apart from the bankrupt he has not to apply for his discharge at all, because he comes to some arrangement sanctioned by the Court, but the Court has then to take into consideration his conduct before it will grant leave for that arrangement to go through; so that whether he applies for his discharge or not he comes before the Court in any case.

1247. As regards the present state of the law with regard to investigation—dealing first with the investigation of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent and the consideration by the Court of that conduct, have you any criticisms or suggestions to make for its improvement ?—It is a most difficult thing to obtain any conviction of a bankrupt for wrongful conduct in the method of carrying on his business which brings about his bankruptcy at the present time, and I certainly think that in the interests of the trading community some easier method might be adopted than the present one of making the bankrupt amenable to justice for what I consider should certainly be regarded as a criminal act. A man obtains credit recklessly; no punishment is awarded to him if he has no assets; nobody troubles. The most successful bankrupt is the man who has not got a pennyworth of assets; he is one of the worst of the lot, and there are no means by which you can easily get at him. A sort of public prosecutor attached to every Official Receiver s Court would be a means by which such men could be stopped. It would be the fear of the thing that would stop it, not what you have actually to do.

1248. Now at the present time the procedure is that a man against whom a receiving order is made is publicly examined. If he applies for approval of a scheme his conduct is reported upon, and if he applies for a discharge in bankruptcy his conduct is reported upon. If either the the Official Receiver or the trustee report and apply for a prosecution the Court can order a prosecution, which is then undertaken by the Public Prosecutor ?—Quite so.

1249. In what way would you strengthen that procedure or alter it ?—I would make it easier. My experience is that it is a most difficult thing to induce the Public Prosecutor to institute any proceedings. He wants to cross the T's and dot the I's before he will institute a prosecution, and there is not that ready method of procedure that there ought to be. A man who steals a loaf is prosecuted, but a man who steals a thousand pounds is let go free.

1250. Yes, of course, but under the Act if the County Court judge in the provinces, or the registrar in London orders a prosecution, then it is the duty of the Public Prosecutor to take it up ?—That is true, but will you tell me how often it ever happens that any judge in the provinces or any registrar in London ever does order a prosecution. It is remarkable how very few bankrupts think it worth their while to apply for an order of discharge. While they can trade in their wife's name or somebody else's name they do not care anything about bankruptcy. Once having gone through the ordeal and having become bankrupt they trouble no more.

1251. But in whom would you vest the sort of discretion to say whether a man ought to be prosecuted or not ?—In the Official Receiver.

1252. Do you mean that he should be the person to go before the magistrate ?—He or one of his clerks. I mean to say that if he thought from his investigation of the bankrupt's affairs that the bankrupt had done what was wrong he ought to be able to prosecute him straight away without going to the Public Prosecutor at all.

1253. Or the registrar should prosecute ?—I do not think the registrar knows nearly as much about it as the man who has investigated the bankrupt's affairs.

1254. If I may just borrow from one's experience, what has generally happened is that after the public examination the notes are submitted to a solicitor of experience, or perhaps a solicitor and counsel. In London generally the opinion of counsel is obtained. Then you go before the registrar, and he orders a prosecution if he thinks—at least that is what he says—that the jury would be likely to convict, and he refuses one if he thinks that the jury would not be likely to convict ?—Yes; but I do not think that the registrar, however able he may be, is as competent to judge of these matters as the man who actually had the bankrupt under his own examination. It is not only that he had that advantage during the public examination in bankruptcy, but he has had the bankrupt in his room and questioned him all through, and he ought to be able to know more than any one else whether the bankrupt has been guilty of something for which he ought to be punished.

1255. With regard to the latter part of this clause in the Order of Reference," whether the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not "—do you think that it ought ?—I do not quite understand what that means. Of course, if he applied for a composition arrangement it must come before the Court, although I have seen many instances where that has been granted where it ought never to have been granted, but the interests of the creditors have been taken into consideration against the interests of the public.

1256. The suggestions that have been made to some extent before this Committee have been that at the end, say, of every six months, whether a man applies for his discharge or not, the Official Receiver should file a report and that the registrar should consider it and deal with the debtor in some way or other by ordering a prosecution if it is thought desirable to do so, or that he should have power to inflict some punishment, as has been done in some countries ?—If a prosecution is to follow it ought to follow at once, and I do not think that any arrangement as to six months would do the slightest good. If a man has been guilty of anything he ought to be punished without delay, and I cannot see that bringing him up every six months would do any good. It is only postponing the thing which I want to bring about at once.

1258. Might I ask your attention to Clause 2—it has reference to the conditions on which a discharge ought to be granted, refused, or suspended and as to how improper and reckless trading and the neglect to keep proper books should be dealt with. In the views that have been hitherto, to some extent, placed before the Committee it has been suggested that as regards those particular matters they might be made punishable ?—That is really a question arising out of the first point.

1259. That is so ?—Because I say that the discharge of a bankrupt is, as far as our experience goes, in the opinion of the bankrupt a matter of very little moment. He does not care about it; he will not come for it, but the question is, ought he to be prosecuted for things that have brought about his bankruptcy—that is the point ?

1260. Would you make improper and reckless trading an offence for which he should be prosecuted ?—I would most certainly. Improper and reckless trading or living out of his creditors' moneys, I would make an offence which would be punishable by imprisonment, because you would find then that debtors with large liabilities and no assets would cease, and that a man would not go on trading until he had not got another penny piece before calling in the assistance of the court. I cannot understand how in England we allow such a state of things to go on every day such as we see going on, where a man fails with £100,000 liabilities and with assets £800 or probably something less.

1261. Is it, or is it not, the case that when you come to the question of prosecution that very often the debtor gets a good deal of sympathy from the jury ?—There is no doubt about that; there is no doubt whatever that a jury always think that they may be in the same position themselves some day, but if a prosecution were possible that would not happen. It is the impossibility of its happening that causes these men to do what they do. I know there would be a difficulty, when it comes to a question of prosecution, of getting a conviction, although I have had many. Still I know there is that difficulty, but we ought not to be frightened by that.

1262. Then would you make the neglect by traders to keep proper books of account an offence also ?—Yes, I do not see why the law that prevails in other countries should not prevail here. If a man goes into business he ought to be able to know how he stands at least at the end of every year. It is so in other countries. It is not a difficult matter to keep books of account. At the present time a man has only to destroy his books of account and he can get through his public examination with the greatest of ease.

1263. But he gets rather pitched into, does not he, if he does that ?—He gets pitched into and reported upon, but it ends there, whilst he has swindled everybody. The fault is that it stops at his getting pitched into—he wants to be pitched into prison.

1264. There was a clause which has come into a document which has been brought before the Committee taken from a form that is used in Scotland where, I think, it is a criminal offence if the bankrupt does not keep such books of account as would exhibit the true state of his business ?—I think if you refer to the answer to your question you will find that that is exactly what I said. I do not want him to be an accountant, but I do want him to take stock. They do not even take stock, and without taking stock no system of books in this world is worth anything.

1265. This Clause 2 only refers to particular classes of misconduct. Have you thought out at all whether you would add to the offences which are mentioned in the Debtors' Act anything in addition to those two—improper and reckless trading ?—The offences in the Debtors' Act are so numerous that it is almost impossible that any debtor could ever escape if the penalties in the Act were enforced, but one knows that they cannot be. The most serious offence of the whole lot is that of obtaining credit within three months of bankruptcy. That is an offence for which the man is punishable. One knows very well that you cannot enforce it, because a man could not stop and say, "I am going to be bankrupt this day three months." He would be bankrupt to-morrow in that case. You cannot stop trading and ordering goods, it is out of the question. The charges under the Debtors' Act are sufficient to cover everything that I know of.

1266. Excepting that they would not cover these ?—They would not cover these, but these are specifically dealt with here; but outside of those I know of none.

1267. The Committee have generally passed over Clause 3, because there is a Bill before Parliament about that; but if I may draw your attention to Clause 4, I have observed in your statement that you felt it a little difficult to see what that was directed to ?—I did not know to what you allude there.

1268. The matter has generally been considered to relate to a suggestion that there should be power immediately to realise the debtor's property, if possible, so that the delay which often occurs, leading to great depreciation and wastage, should be obviated ?—I should think that that would be a very dangerous provision, because, to start with, when a man fails the goodwill of the business is worth hardly anything. I can quite conceive a fish business deteriorating very considerably in this weather; but to take an all-round trading business, surely it is better to let the trustee have time to realise it. It might in one or two cases result profitably, but I do not think that it would as a rule.

1269. You would not give the Official Receiver power to realise before adjudication ?—If you gave him that power it would probably be an inducement to him to realise, and it would put him in a very awkward position as regards creditors. Having regard to the small towns —I do not allude to places like Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, or Leeds—I think it would place him in a very invidious position. Of course, if the stock was perishable I would say give him the power by all means.

1270. He has that at present ?—Yes.

1271. If I may take you to Clause 5. I think it rather speaks for itself. "Whether the law, so far as it enables the trustee of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after-acquired property, should be modified in any and what way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy, or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after-acquired property from the bankrupt." I daresay you know the case of Clark v. Beardmore very well ?—Is that the mortgage case ?

1273. Yes ?—I had a case myself in Cheltenham where a man afterwards had a school at Lancaster—Armstrong's case, I think it was.

1274. (Chairman.) No, Redgrave ?—Yes, that was the name. I remember that case very well.

1275. What are your views on that question ?—It is a most difficult thing to know how to deal evenly between these people. The question really resolves itself into a question of whether a man who is an undischarged bankrupt should not be compelled to notify the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt to everybody, so that the state of affairs which at present exists could no longer exist.

1276. Would not that be a rather difficult matter in practice ?—It would not be difficult. You make him tell you when he incurs a debt of £20. Why should not he tell you if he incurs a debt of £1 ? Why is it limited to £20 ? If he is a man who ought not to get credit for £20, why should he get credit for £19 or less ?

1277. I am afraid in these cases it is to a great extent the large creditors who have been let in. In Clark v. Beardmore the second lot of creditors were let in for thousands of pounds ?—It is very difficult to get at him now if he trades with a partner, because then he can get credit for thousands of pounds. I have before me an instance now in Manchester of a man having become bankrupt three times. He then joined another man, and made a combination of the two names, and traded in those combined names and got credit to the extent of thousands of pounds. He then failed and was prosecuted. He was committed for trial, and it was held that because he did it through his firm whose credit he pledged he could not be prosecuted successfully for obtaining credit to the extent of £20 or upwards, so that all he had to do was to join together with another man and get credit without any let or hindrance from anybody.

1279. The second branch of this question relates chiefly to real property and of the law under which the trustee in bankruptcy takes the real property. In that way persons who have lent an undischarged bankrupt money on the security of after-acquired real property lose the benefit of their security ?—Yes, but that is exactly the same question as the other; it is a question of morality, if one may say so, rather than of law. It seems most inequitable that such a thing should happen. A man buys a house and I innocently lend £1,000 on it, and then comes forward the first trustee and claims the house, and will not pay me my £1,000.

1280. Could not that be remedied by assimilating the law of real property to that which governs personal property by which persons who deal are protected—would not that be a remedy ?—I do not think that anybody would be injured by it, and I think it would only be just; but it is the same question as the other. I do not see any difference between lending £20 on mortgage and giving a man £20 credit as far as equity is concerned, because it is all money lent, and as far as your pocket is concerned it is the same thing.

1281. Clause 6 is aimed at the present provision of the law as to a married woman who can only be made a bankrupt if she is trading separately and has separate estate—the two things being combined. One knows that the matter of married women trading has become a very common thing. Do you think that the Bankruptcy Laws should be extended so as to render all classes of married women who incur debts on their own account subject to the Bankruptcy Laws?—I can see no reason why they should not, if they seek to trade, be subjected to the risks and liabilities that any other trader is subjected to. Besides, how often we see a married woman trading in the husband's name when he has not got a discharge. It is his name and trade, but can anybody suggest a reason why a married woman should not be made amenable to the same laws as apply to trading if carried on by a man.

1283. (Chairman.) Clause 7, if I may draw your attention to it again, relates to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, and the question is whether covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt should be extended so as to prevent the trustee in person claiming under such settlements and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt. There are two branches of the question; one is as to the way in which these people in their capacity of creditors can compete with the trade creditors; and the other is as to the protection of bona fide purchasers and encumbrancers under dispositions of that kind. Have you thought out that question?—So far as my experience goes there is not any great trouble arising out of this question of settlement. Of course, the marriage settlement is a thing that one could hardly hope to do away with, because it is an ante-nuptial settlement. You cannot put the parties back in the position they were in before marriage took place, and I do not believe that any legislation would help us there, and as regards the others I think the provisions which at present exist are sufficient.

1284. Perhaps I may put to you one or two cases that have lately come under consideration, where a man without very much capital for the purposes of his trade has nevertheless entered into a provision with the trustees of his wife's marriage settlement to pay the wife £20,000 within a certain time, with the result that when he becomes bankrupt the trustees prove for £20,000, and not only do they get control over the whole of the bankruptcy proceedings, but they sweep up perhaps nine-tenths of the dividend?—I never knew in Manchester or anywhere else outside of Manchester of any case of that sort. It must be an exceptional one. I have never had any experience other than that in connection with an ordinary settlement in regard to furniture and money. Of course they settle money on their intended wives, and that is handed over at the time.

1285. You have no experience of a covenant to pay a large sum of money in that manner?—No, but I should say that that was a direct swindle if a man had not got it—an absolute swindle. I mean that that is an attempt to defeat and delay creditors. The very object of the thing is that.

1287. You have not considered whether such a class of creditors should not be postponed to the trade creditors?—If that thing was attempted, the case that you put of a man settling £20,000 on his wife when he had not any assets, and he was going into business, I should say without any hesitation that it ought to be postponed to all his trade creditors, but I have never heard of such a case before. It must be exceptional.

1290. Then Clause 8, which I think you have given a great deal of consideration to, relates to the provision of the law with regard to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors. The exact terms of the reference are whether they should be amended so as to place the debtor and trustee under the arrangement or composition more under control; and provide for an official audit of the trustee's accounts and for official control over the assets in his hands?—Yes. This Clause 8, if I may say so, seems to me to be the most important one of all the questions we have to consider as witnesses. Of course you have to start with this. The 1869 Act so far as I understand was a failure. I had not many years' experience of it. I had some six years' experience of it after I became a solicitor. Costs were out of all proportion to the benefit accruing to the creditors, and it was so complicated that in London anyone well up in the law came down and upset the arrangements which the creditors had assented to. Now, in place of that have arisen deeds of assignment, and that state of things has prevailed ever since the Bankruptcy Act came into operation, and has been sanctioned by the Act of 1887 for the registration of deeds. It seems to me what you have to do in this question is first of all to decide, Is the present system worth perpetuating, or ought it to be abolished? That is the question. 20 June, 1906.

1291. The Act of 1887 only says that deeds are to be void if they are not registered; it does not validate them in any way?—I did not say that it did validate them. I said it recognised the system. One of the principal objects of the Bankruptcy Law was to bring a man to his creditors at the earliest possible moment when he is insolvent. That seems to me to be the foundation of the whole system of Bankruptcy Law, and a man is more likely to come to his creditors if he can get through without the stigma of bankruptcy than he is if he has to come to his creditors with a fear of being made a bankrupt. It is that fear that holds him off. You see that plainly in the amount of assets that are recovered for creditors under deeds of assignment as compared with what are recovered under bankruptcy. That clearly shows that the general public and the debtors like the system of deeds of assignment, but there are many ways in which it might be very considerably amended.

1292. Could you indicate to us the ways in which you think it might be amended?—Yes, I will indicate to you ways in which I think it might be amended, though they might not be satisfactory to you. First of all I have always been under the impression, and I think solicitors generally and accountants have been under the same impression, that the Board of Trade desire to have some of the advantage of this big stream which is flowing past them without touching their office at all. I should like to say this, that so far as deeds of arrangement are concerned I do not think officialism is desirable unless it is a necessary thing. I mean I would not bring in the Board of Trade into these deeds of arrangement unless it was necessary, because I do not believe that the public like it. They would rather be left to themselves. But if on the other hand the creditors are being "done" in any way, then it is quite time that somebody should step in. I made a few notes of amendments which I should like to see adopted with regard to these deeds of assignment. I must assume for one moment that we retain the system of deeds. Of course if it is going, then it is going and there is an end of it, but one of the greatest evils is this. At the present time a man finds himself in difficulties. He goes to his solicitor and tells him so, and the solicitor at once appoints a trustee—not the creditors or the debtor, but the solicitor goes to a friend—an accountant or anybody else—and he makes him the trustee under the deed without the creditors having a single voice or vote in the matter. Now, I say if a man finds himself in that position he ought not to execute a deed with the trustee, but he ought to execute a deed with nobody, leaving it to the creditors afterwards to appoint their own trustee and their own solicitor. The solicitor and the trustee are both interested in getting as much out of the thing as they can, and they are neither of them the nominee of the creditors, who ought to have the chief voice in the appointment, and I say that it ought not to be open to anybody to appoint his own trustee. I quite recognise the fact that it is necessary when an execution is in or threatened, or something of that sort is about to take place, to take immediate steps to protect the estate for the creditors. That ought to be able to be done without nominating over the heads of the creditors the debtor's nominee as trustee.

1293. Have you considered in reference to that suggestion the fact that a deed of this kind takes its validity at law from the actual assignment by the debtor. Supposing that he selects a person as his assignee ?—Yes, but why should he select him ? Why am I to have you appointed trustee when the creditors might wish someone else ? If a man wishes to have someone appointed he can suggest a name, but why should the creditors have to assent to that or go into bankruptcy ? That is the only alternative, you must either go into bankruptcy or assent to that man's nominee who, for aught we know, might be a most disreputable man, as, in fact, in many cases one knows that he is.

1294. Have you other suggestions that you desire to put before the Committee ?—Yes, there is another thing I have a note of, and that is that all solicitors' costs should be taxed under every deed of assignment. The amount of costs that are sent in is outrageous. This is part and parcel of the prior observation that I made that it is owing to the solicitor nominating the trustee and the trustee being in the hands of the solicitor, that the trustee is unable to say " nay." It is abominable the amount of costs that are charged in some instances for the mere preparation of a deed that they go and buy at a law stationer's. There is no check on it, it is passed and paid 1295. I was thinking how would you practically provide for it ?—I would make them go to the County Court and let them tax the costs the same as if the man had been a bankrupt. I would let the Registrar deal with the question. I do not see why a solicitor should object to the Registrar seeing what his costs are the same as if it was in bankruptcy. If a man is in bankruptcy the Registrar sees what the solicitor is entitled to by way of costs. Does he want more than he is entitled to ?

1296. That would mean bringing the deed more under the control of the Court ?—I thought of that ; but you are not advertising anything. A solicitor merely carries in his bill of costs and gets it checked. You have advertised the deed in every paper in the United Kingdom before that happens.

1297. Then I think you had some other suggestions to make ?—Yes, in every deed of assignment or composition—the composition is slightly different, because in that case you generally wait until the creditors have met—but in a deed of assignment the discharge is always granted. Now I do not think any deed should be drawn in such a way that the discharge is granted by the deed. The deed ought to be a deed of assignment pure and simple, without any condition attached to it. Let the creditors decide afterwards whether the offer made or the suggestion made by the deed or at the meeting is sufficient to justify them in offering the man his discharge.

1298. But deeds sometimes provide that the creditors are hereafter to decide ?—That is only in the case of a composition—not in the case of a deed of assignment, because in the case of deeds of assignment it is a condition which I never saw omitted.

1300. Not to a covenant not to sue ?—That would follow as a matter of fact if he assented, but it ought not to be a condition which he imposes upon me. I am a creditor, I say that I have a right to the unconditional handing over to somebody of your estate, if you are insolvent. You ought not to impose any terms upon me until I and the other creditors have met and considered it. He seems to be dictating to us as though he were the master of the situation, at present.

1301. I think you have something further to say ?—I also thought that any creditor, whatever the amount is, ought to have power to bring the conduct of the debtor before the court, if he thought the debtor had been doing something that was wrong.

1303. But not deal with him in relation to the realisation ?—No, I dealt with that in another matter. This is the question on which most controversy is likely to arise. There has always been on this question of deed of assignment the point as to whether the minority is to be bound by the majority. That is the difficulty and crux of the whole position. I would not allow the majority to bind the minority. On the other hand, if four-fifths of the creditors assented to the deed I would not allow any man to present a bankruptcy petition, unless he had satisfied the court that his proceeding in that way was a justifiable proceeding.

1305. Because it originated with the court, and there was the power to reject or admit proofs ; but when a debtor calls his creditors together under a deed of assignment, there is nobody, unless you take proceedings under an originating summons, to say whether a person is a creditor or not ?—No, there is not, but that is a difficulty that never arises in practice. In all the years that I have known deeds of assignment that very point has never arisen, but as far as that goes it rests with the contending parties to show whether four-fifths have or have not assented. One could not in a room like this dispose of that point. If I allege that four-fifths have assented, the obligation is on me to prove it, and if the other man says he is going to present a bankruptcy petition, the obligation is on him to show that such a proceeding is justifiable ; that is to say, there are reasons why bankruptcy is a preferable course to a deed of assignment, but I would not bind anybody. I would leave them to their rights, and if they chose to stand on them and say they would not assent, I would leave them outside.

1306. (Mr. Evans.) Without regard to the majority, whatever it might be ?—Oh no. Of course, if there was a large minority nobody would go on with it. I mean to say that if the majority in favour of the deed is a small one no trustee would venture to go on with it until the three months were up. It is only a point for the three months.

1307. (Chairman.) A creditor who could not present a bankruptcy petition and did not come under the deed would be rather out in the cold ?—To this extent, that he must come in under the deed or he must wait until he can get something out of the debtor afterwards. He can wait and see if he can get his 20s., but small things like that I do not think are worth considering. The real question is, is the thing a practicable thing.

1308. Have you any other suggestions on this paragraph ?—I wish to suggest this, that the Court ought to have power to stop a man getting any discharge if it thought fit in a bad case, that is to say that if one creditor felt, whatever his debt was, that it was a bad case, he might go to the Court and ask that the discharge might be suspended or delayed.

1309. Then what would become of his debt ?—It would not make any difference to his debt.

1310. Would he be able to sue the debtor then ?—If he was an assenting creditor he could not sue him—he would simply say that his discharge should not operate.

1311. The only effect of a discharge not operating is that the creditor can sue for his debt ; is it not ?—Yes, but that is not exactly the point ; the point would be that the man would not get off scot free, and if he had any property afterwards it would belong to his creditors.

1312. Under a deed of assignment ?—Yes, I do not see why not.

1313. That depends on the terms of the deed ?—I quite agree ; that brings in the first thing that I do not think he ought to have his discharge right away. Of course, if he does not get it under the deed he would not get it until it was given to him.

1314. As I gather from you, you do not consider as a matter of general provision that there should be an official audit of the debtor's accounts ?—There is one point I should like to mention. I think that every trustee under a deed of assignment ought to give security the same as in bankruptcy.

1315. To the Board of Trade ?—Yes, and beyond that I do not think that it is necessary. I suppose we have all had great experience of one particular man who has been about the country getting deeds of assignment wholesale, but except in that instance I have not had any cases or many cases where it was necessary to interfere with the trustee. I think that the provisions of the law at present which enable you to go to the County Court if a man does not distribute an estate promptly and properly are quite sufficient to bring that man back.

1316. But he could not go to the County Court if the assets were over £50 ?—No, I do not suppose he could, but he can go to the High Court. The remedy is the same, although, as far as I am concerned, the only cases I have had have been in the County Court and I have never failed yet to obtain the assistance of the Court.

1317. Other members of the Committee will have matters to put to you, but as far as I am concerned I think that exhausts Clause 8, and the only other question is in relation to Clause 9, and that relates to general assignments of book debts and hiring agreements and similar forms of security. The suggestion is that they ought to be registered like bills of sale ?—Yes.

1318. First of all, as regards general assignments of book debts ?—That is to say, all his book debts.

1319. Or the majority, not merely one ?—A security, in fact, giving preference to one creditor ?

1320. Yes ?—Well, if it is an assignment of book debts to give one creditor a preference I should say register it, give the greatest possible publicity to the fact that the man is not able to pay his debts as he goes along.

1321. Would you make it void if it was not registered ?—Certainly, registration would be no good if it was not void for not being registered.

1323. Then as regards hiring agreements, it has been suggested that judgment creditors and people like them are swindled in this way, that when they come to levy execution they find that the goods are all under hiring agreements of which they know nothing ?—Yes, but I think they might inquire, the system of hiring goods is so widespread now. Bibles, prayer books, hymn books, and dictionaries are hired nowadays. You pay so much down and pay the rest in instalments by the month. It would be a serious interference with trade, especially with the furniture trade, if you were to interfere with that. Every safeguard ought to be given to traders, but, on the other hand, they ought to be put upon inquiry where they know that that system exists.

1324. (Mr. Evans.) Have you had large experience of cases where there have been deeds of assignment but where there has been no actual insolvency ?—No, I never had one.

1325. But there are cases where a trustee might develop his estate so as to get 20s. in the £ ?—Yes.

1327. I gather that you would make it a misdemeanour for any undischarged bankrupt to obtain anything on credit at all without disclosing the fact that he was undischarged ?—Yes, I would.

1328. Punishable by a fine or imprisonment—in fact that it should be an offence in addition to those under the Debtors' Act of 1869 ?—Yes.

1329. Have you found it a great evil that people are able to go on trading after their bankruptcy before they get their discharge ?—No, it is not done. If they do it they do it in some other town, in some other name.

1330. Have you considered whether or not it would be possible to make the undischarged bankrupt disclose to the trustee or the Official Receiver or the registrar, say once a year, what he is doing and whether he is trading, and, if so, under what name?—Yes, that poin twas raised by the Chairman.

1331. Before I came in—I am sorry?—Yes, it was raised by the Chairman, and the reply I made was that if he was to be punished you ought to punish him for what he had done at once.

1332. (Chairman.) Mr. Evans was referring to a different thing. I was asking whether during the bankruptcy the Official Receiver should from time to time report. I think that what Mr. Evans is asking is whether the bankrupt should be made to report himself.

1333. (Mr. Evans.) Yes, to report himself in fact whilst he is an undischarged bankrupt, and say where he is trading and under what name ?—Yes, I see.

1334. We are told that there is a great evil arising from the fact that people who are undischarged bankrupts are trading either in some other name for themselves or possibly compelling their wives to trade for them ?—Yes that is how it is done generally.

1335. In that case it is always a question whether the business carried on in the name of the wife is in fact the business of the husband ?—Yes, that you can easily test by an examination, and as regards the examination of the bankrupt whilst he is undischarged, he is always amenable to the Court under Section 27.

1336. Do you think it would be any check on the undischarged bankrupt at all if he had to report himself to the Official Receiver or the Registrar in Bankruptcy of his district say once every six months ?—Yes, I do think it would be a good thing.

1337. And it would follow, would it not, to that extent it would also protect possible creditors with whom he might deal ?—Yes.

1339. I follow what you say. Then about the non-keeping of books being constituted a statutory offence, is it your experience that sometimes in the Court of Bankruptcy traders do not keep such things as invoices, receipts, and so on ?—In Manchester there are plenty of cases where it has been utterly impossible to trace the transactions by any written documents existing in the man's warehouse or counting house.

1340. Then would you make it also an offence—it seems almost to follow—in addition to the offence of not keeping proper books, if the trader for a specified time before the Bankruptcy petition or the receiving order failed to preserve all the invoices of goods sent to him and all his receipts ?—I say that he ought to preserve invoices, or keep books sufficient to show with the stocktaking what his position was at any time that he liked to ascertain it. The man without any assets and without any books gets off scot free, because you cannot prove anything, and it is simply nonsense to allow the law to remain as it is at present.

1341. With regard to after-acquired property, would you suggest any alteration in the law, which would enable creditors to obtain some portion of the earnings—after-acquired earnings of a bankrupt in order to liquidate his debts say up to 10s. in the £ ?—You mean where the man does not apply for his discharge ?

1342. Yes ?—If he does apply you can make an order.

1343. The assets of an undischarged bankrupt can be attached at the present moment ?—No, except the judge entered up a judgment against him conditional on his getting a discharge.

1344. But supposing he does not apply ?—I should give power to the trustee or Official Receiver to bring the matter before the court.

20 June, 1906.

1345. And allow the court to say how much he ought to pay ?—How much he ought to pay just the same as if he was brought up on a judgment debtor's summons. Why should not he ? He is earning it.

1346. Have you had much experience in your district of administration orders—small bankruptcies ?—Yes.

1348. If he finds the £10 he can get off scot free instead of applying to the court ?—He does not do it. I never knew a case at Manchester of such a thing in my life.

1349. You do not think that an alteration is necessary in the present law in regard to administration orders ?—I think the present law is most unjust—that is all. Sitting there day after day you see a man fail for £50,000. He has got no assets books or memory and he gets off scot free, while another man who owes £50 has to pay 10s. in the £ by so many shillings per month and he may have a wife and family to support.

1350. That bears on the point of giving some right to attack some portion of his subsequent earnings ?—I think that ought to be the case. The judge would then say you must pay so much a month to these judgment creditors.

1351. And you would allow the judge to say up to what proportion—that is to say, whether it should be the full 20s. in the £ or 15s. in the £ ?—Exactly, he ought to say how much the man ought to pay.

1352. Dependent on the size of his family and how much he is able to earn. Do you think that a great deal of evil has arisen from the fact that a man who has not very much to lose does get off scot free immediately the receiving order is made, from all the debts he has incurred ?—When you talk about getting off scot free I should like to see the man who has done something wrong in incurring debts put in prison.

1353. That is a question of prosecuting. You appear to think that in most cases the law under the Debtor's Act is sufficiently strong if it is put into play ?—In most cases it is. If it was put into force by some local authority without going to London for it, it would be an improvement. It is the red-tape business that causes the trouble.

1355. Still the criminal jurisdiction of the inferior courts has been very much increased ?—You mean a trial before a magistrate or a stipendiary ?

1357. Or even giving the county court judge power ?—If you were to give the county court judge the power you would have the same man trying the prisoner as the man who ordered the prosecution, and practically I do not think that that would work. It ought to go to some other county court; it ought not to go before the same judge who directed the prosecution, because you would have one man in two positions.

1358. And you would maintain the position, which makes it necessary to obtain the sanction of the county court judge before the prosecution can be instituted ?—No, the county court judge must have knowledge of all that is done, or his registrar, and I rather favour the idea of the Official Receiver being the person to institute the prosecution.

1359. I follow that—without going to the county court judge first to get his sanction ?—The county court judge is not the best judge. If you have got a good Official Receiver he knows more about it than any county court judge, or if he does not he ought to be removed.

1360. In such a case would you give the county court judge limited power to deal with offences ?—Of course, he can now imprison for six weeks under a judgment summons. He can put you in prison for not paying. That has nothing to do with the Bankruptcy Act. That is contempt. Of course, he would have no power under the Bankruptcy Act.

1362. Do you think that if that were done more frequently than it is done at the present time it would prevent failures ?—I do not think it would prevent them, but it would enable us to find out what has been the cause of them, which we cannot do now; and if we find out what was the cause, punishment would ensue; and you would find that failures would not happen so frequently.

1363. Do not you think that there are a great many men, honest men, who fail simply through not keeping a correct account of their trading ?—No, I do not think any man fails from not keeping accounts, but I think a great number fail at a date much later than they ought to fail if they had kept them, and they had known where they were. It is not that they fail because they do not keep them, but because they go on trading long after they ought to have stopped.

1365. And that might prevent failure ?—If they had had their books of account they would have known their position.

1366. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Under a voluntary arrangement you told us that a creditor goes to his solicitor to appoint a trustee ?—Yes.

1367. Now is that often done ?—Almost invariably. It is the thing about which I have grumbled for the past twenty years. What happens is that the debtor goes to his solicitor and says : "I want to consult you this morning ; I am in a bad way, I have got 30s. in the pound, but still I cannot pay; what can I do ?" The solicitor says : "Go round to so and so, accountants, in such and such a street, and they will look into your accounts, and then if you are unable to carry on we must execute a deed to them." That is what happens. The creditors are never asked to appoint a trustee or to have a voice in his appointment.

1368. Is it not the practice in your district that when a creditor goes to his solicitor and tells him he is unable to continue, that he calls his creditors together ?—Yes, but not until the deed is executed. He executes the deed first and calls the creditors together afterwards.

1369. That is your experience ?—That is my daily experience.

1370. As regards your remark that the solicitors' costs to a deed of arrangement should be taxed, is there any means of doing that now ?—No, none at all.

1371. Do you tell me that a trustee would pass a solicitor's charges without having them taxed at all ?—I do not know what he would do, but I know what he does. He does pass them, and seeing that he is the nominee of the solicitor it is only likely that he will, and that puts him in an exceedingly difficult position. My own experience tells me of these things. Where I have been acting for a trustee one man has executed a deed through the solicitor. The costs of the preparation of that deed have come to more than £30, although it was a matter merely of going to a law stationer's and filling in a few figures, the question of a few minutes' work. Then comes the question, "What are you to do ?" You can do nothing. He has put in his trustee, and what can you do ? If, on the other hand, the Bill had to be taxed, why should a solicitor object to receive what was due to him, and no more, unless he is dishonest ?

1372. If you tell us that that is your experience we will accept it, but my experience is totally different. The usual course—I am sorry to say I have had a great deal of experience in these matters—which the debtor takes who finds himself unable to carry on his business, is first of all to consult his solicitor and the solicitor calls the creditors together, and the creditors, in my experience, appoint a trustee, and it is not the solicitor himself who appoints a trustee ?—It is extraordinary how the practice varies between the north and east of London. If you asked Mr. Price, when he is called as a witness, he will say what I have said. He has been a trustee in more cases than most people in the North of England, and he will tell you that the first intimation we get is—"We have been consulted by Mr. So-and-so, who finds himself unable to meet his liabilities, and for the protection of his creditors he has executed a deed of assignment to Mr. Blank. Will you kindly send by return of post a statement of account." That is the usual thing that occurs in nineteen out of twenty cases. You do not get any notice or have any voice in the appointment of a trustee.

1373. And the practice in your district is for the accountant to be nominated as the trustee ?—Speaking generally.

1374. It is not the rule then that the principal creditor is appointed ?—No. In the home trade of Manchester, people like Rylands & Watts, if they are creditors predominating, the rule is for them to oust the man whoever he is. They will have their own trustee, that does not get over the fact that the man is installed as a rule, before the creditors are consulted.

1375. The trustee who is appointed, you say, does not get the solicitor's costs taxed ?—If the solicitor goes to an accountant round the corner and says to him, "I am going to put you into this job," and then he sends in a bill of costs which is absolutely unreasonable, the trustee cannot say anything because he is afraid of quarrelling with the solicitor, because if he does, he will not get another job.

1376. Then I suppose you consider that a very undesirable state of things ?—I do. I say the solicitor's bill of costs ought to be taxed in every case.

1377. (Mr. Richardson.) You say that the Official Receiver should order a prosecution ?—Yes.

1378. You also agree that the creditors should have the right to call the attention of the Official Receiver to the conduct of the bankrupt ?—They have that right now. They have the right to go to the court to examine the deed, and they can call attention to his conduct best by examination. In fact they often appoint a solicitor outside the Official Receiver to examine the bankrupt.

1379. The registration of book debts you have alluded to ?—Yes, if it is done as a preference to creditors they should be registered, but what is to be done if a business is turned into a limited liability company ?

1381. As a rule the assignment of book debts means the insolvency of the debtor, does it not ?—Yes, it means that, or that the thing is being turned into a limited liability company. Of course you have to consider that. If you are going to register everyone, every limited liability company that is formed will have to register all those book debts that have been transferred to it, although it might be perfectly solvent. But I do not think that the harm that might result in a few isolated cases would be sufficient to stop one from doing it. I think that the good it would do would be far greater than the harm.

1382. With reference to delay in realisation, do you agree that the creditors should have the right to go to the court and, if they think that the realisation is being delayed, open an inquiry ?—I should think—I never had a case that I can recall—that there is a right existing to-day to do that.

1383. I do not think there is ?—If I had a creditor who complained to me that an estate was not being realised I should take the trustee before the court on a motion whether I failed or not, but I think I should succeed, and if I could show Judge Parry, at Manchester, that that man was not realising the estate, I think he would interfere very promptly. At any rate I would take the risk.

1385. (Mr. Richardson.) Under a voluntary deed what would happen ?—Under a voluntary deed, unquestionably, you have the right if a man is not doing his duty to go to the court. I do not think it could be suggested that I had not a remedy if a man did not realise his estate.

1386. (Mr. Addison.) I understand that you think that offenders should be promptly punished ?—Yes, if they are proved to have offended.

1387. And that the suspension of discharges is a very valueless thing ?—Yes.

1388. Do you approve of some alteration in the clauses of the Act of 1890, under which the court cannot give a discharge under certain circumstances, unless at least 10s. in the £ is paid; do you think that there should be some discretion in the court where a man has perhaps unwisely invested money, or through no act amounting to a criminal act could not pay 10s. in the £ ?—Yes. I do not see the good of withholding the discharge. It only places a man in a position in which he cannot earn his own living. I would rather punish the criminal at the start, and let the other man go scot free to earn his living where he has done nothing wrong.

1389. Do you take my view that a great number of undischarged bankrupts in the country is a dangerous thing ?—Yes I do, because they are hampered and they are trading under difficulties.

1390. And that they place those with whom they are brought into connection under great difficulties ?—Yes, because they may be getting credit from anyone without knowing that they are undischarged bankrupts.

1392. This question about which Court should punish him is a difficult one, is it not ?—Yes.

1394. I quite agree that where the Court directs a prosecution it ought not to be the Court to decide the question at issue, but where it is the Court administering the bankruptcy why should that Court not have power to punish on the application of the Official Receiver or trustee ?—You see it has dealt with the matter all the way through: that is the only reason. You would be going to the same judge as the one who had made the order directing the prosecution, and it would seem to me that it would be two to one on the prosecuting judge punishing 1395. I was anxious to get your view, because I know that the question of expense is a serious difficulty ?—It is.

1396. The question of expense and the uncertainty of the results ?—Yes, that is with a jury. No doubt it would be more certain without a jury.

1397. As to keeping books, I quite appreciate what you said, but one is a little anxious to be definite ?—Yes, I quite understand, but I am not an accountant.

1398. The Bankruptcy Act now applies both to traders and non-traders ?—Yes.

1399. And contains no definition of traders ?—No.

1400. What class of people should you say ought to keep books ?—I would make it for all. If they wish to have creditors they should keep books.

1401. Do you mean anybody should—barristers, for instance ?—Yes, or doctors. I do not see why if a man is seeking credit he should not conduct his business properly. If he wants credit he ought to conduct his business properly.

1402. I only want your view ?—Yes.

1404. As to making deeds of arrangement binding, do you ever find as we do in London that someone not a trading creditor objects to a deed which the trading creditors approve—perhaps a moneylender ?—Yes.

1405. And puts a stop to what the creditors wish to have carried out ?—Yes.

20 June, 1906.

1406. I quite followed what your objections were. Would your difficulties be got over if there was power to apply to the Court and that the Court should have the right to make that deed binding on being satisfied with the majority who approve of it?—I rather think my suggestion is the better one of the two. Let that man who dissents go to the Court and satisfy the Court that it is an improper thing. I would not put that estate to the expense of going to the Court. I would say, "You go to the Court, and if you can satisfy Judge Parry that you are justified in standing out because you are a money lender, although all the other trade creditors have assented, you can do so. You must satisfy him, but you must bear the expense, and I am not going to run the risk."

1407. Under the present law it is three months?—That is so. He must come within three months, or he is shut out. I should throw the onus of going to the Court on the dissenting creditor, and not put the estate to the expense. I would not make him assent, but I would not put any pressure upon him.

1408. So that whenever the petitioning creditor alleged a deed as an act of bankruptcy——?—He would have to satisfy the Court that notwithstanding the fact that four-fifths of the creditors had assented it was a reasonable and proper course for the Court to make a receiving order.

1409. Have you in your experience had a case where the undischarged bankrupt had afterwards acquired a mortgage on property and the mortgagee had suffered?—No. I know that the case exists, but not in my own experience. I know that there is such a case, but I have had no experience of that. It is a most unjust thing.

1410. Do you consider that there is difficulty in getting adjudication now—that there is undue delay, and that the debtor tries to keep the creditor at arm's length in getting an adjudication. Is that so in your district?—I suppose you mean a receiving order?

1411. Yes?—I do not see how he can. In my experience he never has done, and I do not see how he can. What could he do?

1412. I am glad to know it does not affect your district?—It will not affect me, because for one thing the Registrar of our Court will never allow the adjournment of a bankruptcy petition except for good cause shown, and the system which prevails in London of allowing things to be adjourned week after week does not prevail there and it ought not to prevail here.

1413. (Mr. Addison.) You have expressed my views on the subject.

1414. (Chairman.) Mr. Newman has not heard of people like the debtor in a case in which I was counsel who keep the thing going on between petition and the receiving order for two years and a half?— I know a case where there were thirty-eight petitions against an alderman in Salford.

1415. (Mr. Addison.) Do you think the expenses are too high—the £5 for the stamp and so on?—Yes, I think so. It seems to me a large sum to inflict on a creditor who is only doing his duty. I think that the fees ought somehow to come from the Treasury rather than be imposed on a creditor in the first instance.

1416. You find that these heavy payments prevent creditors taking any steps?—I have found many creditors say, "What is it going to cost?" And when you tell them they go away and say, "It is no use throwing good money after bad." I have had many cases where I have had men adjudicated under the Bankruptcy Act where they were brought up under a judgment summons of £5 and the creditors have found the money.

1418. Do you think it desirable that any pressure should be brought to bear so as to force an application for discharge?—I do not think that it would be of any good. I think you ought to punish the man or you ought to allow him to go. He has either done something which is wrong or he has not, and if he has not he ought to be able to trade again and earn his own living. It is nonsense this suspension of discharge. It is hawking about the country a lot of derelicts. You label them as undischarged bankrupts and you will not allow them to earn their livelihood.

1419. But at present there is no odium attached to the fact of a man being an undischarged bankrupt. It does not imply that that man has been guilty of any offence?—When you say there is no odium, I should think there is a great deal. To start with, you are not allowed to take credit for £20 without informing your creditors of the fact that you are undischarged.

1420. There is that odium?—Undoubtedly, and there is the social effect that you are an undischarged bankrupt, at all events it is not an honour.

1421. But he is not in the same position as if the discharge had been refused?—Not quite, but the question of the discharge being refused is a very small one. If a man makes an application it is seldom refused. It would have to be a very bad case for it to be refused.

1422. Do you attach importance to the report of the Official Receiver on the conduct of the debtor?—When he applies for his discharge.

1423. Yes?—Oh yes, I do.

1424. Do you think that a report of that kind ought to be presented in every case to the court whether he applies for discharge or not?—Yes, it would have to be if you adopted the suggestion that the man would have to be punished and that prosecution should ensue. That is what would happen when a man had done something that was wrong. It ought to be reported on, whether he applied for his discharge or not. This discharge business is a bad method.

1425. And then you would give the court power to adjudicate on that report?—I would give the Official Receiver power to institute a prosecution on his own report.

1426. Do not you think in many cases power might be given to the county court judge to deal with the matter from time to time. He has the facts before him?—You are transferring the right of a man to be tried by jury to a county court judge. It is a question whether the public would endure that.

1427. Do not you think that it would be very likely to effect the object which you have in view to bring about the punishment of debtors who were guilty of offences, instead of leaving it to the uncertainty of the public prosecutor taking action?—I quite agree, but the question of whether it is a fair way of dealing with the matter is another thing. I do not say that it is not a certain way of dealing with it, but I should not think it a fair thing.

1428. The report of the Official Receiver is merely prima facie evidence, and the debtor may rebut it?—That is quite true, but the judge is to some extent prejudiced beforehand. Why not go to the stipendiary who has not had anything to do with it. If you want to get a man tried by somebody instead of a judge there is no more expense in having it tried by a stipendiary.

1429. That is your suggestion?—Yes. I say let a lawyer try it, but not the man who has had the thing in hand. I should not like it if I were the bankrupt, and I do not think I should get what I would consider fair treatment.

1430. (Mr. Smith.) Are you satisfied with the working of the bankruptcy system at present as regards the public examinations of bankrupts?—Yes.

1431. You think the facts are generally brought out where there are irregularities and fraud?—I think so.

1432. And what you complain of is the defect in dealing with those?—Yes; when they are shown to exist nothing happens.

1433. With regard to the question of discharge, would you abolish that altogether?—I do not think it is worth anything.

1434. You have the alternative, under Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, of coming to the court to ask it to grant an order of discharge subject to any conditions with regard to any earnings or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt. As a matter of fact, I suppose you are familiar with the Board of Trade statistics?—I have got a lot of them here.

1435. As a matter of fact, taking the year 1903, which is the one in which there is the last report, out of 791 applications for discharge there were 554 suspended for two years and over, and there were only 108 suspended with money conditions ?—Yes.

1436. Is that not due to the action of the court largely ?—It is largely in the discretion of the judge.

1437. The tendency of the county court judges and of the High Court judges is to suspend the discharge instead of attaching money conditions ?—Yes.

1438. Would you extend the discretion of the court in suspending the discharge ?—That involves the whole question of discharge. I would rather be in favour of empowering the county court judge to impose a condition that the man should appropriate certain portions of his earnings, whether he applied for his discharge or not.

1439. Assuming that you bring up every man for his discharge, or at any rate that his conduct is reported upon, and the court is asked to adjudicate upon it would you omit from the statute as a useless provision that the court may suspend the operation of the order ?—That involves a different point. I would not trouble about the suspension of his discharge. I would give the court power.

1440. If the court wishes to exercise its discretion to impose conditions as to future earnings or income, it can exercise it now; and there is the alternative of suspension. Would you take that alternative away ?—No, I would not mix the two things together at all.

1441. But they are here now ?—Yes, I know, but I would not have them mixed up.

1442. Would you take away the power ?—I would simply give power to the Registrar or Official Receiver to apply to the judge for an order to appropriate part of a man's income to pay his existing debts.

1443. That exists already ?—No, that is only if he applies for his discharge.

1444. I think it is you who are mixing up two questions which I am prepared to deal with separately—the question whether the bankrupt applies for his discharge is one thing, and the question how it is to be dealt with is another. Suppose every bankrupt is required to come up for his discharge, then how is it to be dealt with ? Should you leave it in the power of the court to suspend the discharge ?—I see your point. First of all I would not make every bankrupt come up for his discharge. I would empower the Official Receiver or trustee to apply, in any case he thought fit, to the judge for an order appropriating part of his income towards paying his debts, but the discharge I regard as a myth. It is not worth having.

1445. I need not press the point, but I may take it that you consider it of no value ?—No, I do not consider that the discharge is of any value.

1446. And if it were omitted from that clause ?—I would rather have direct power given to the Official Receiver or trustee to come and ask for an order.

1447. To ask is not effective without getting what you ask. Would you not want to limit the powers of the judge in order to carry out your suggestion ?—I should like to know how you are to do it. He comes up for suspension. Take away the suspension for two years and let the judge consider the question of appropriating part of his income as a condition of his discharge.

1448. How are you to make the judge do that ?—I cannot make him do it further than that it is the only remedy he has got. I would not trouble about the suspension. The suspension assumes that the discharge is something worth having, but as far as bankruptcy law goes I cannot see any advantage whatever in this question of discharge.

1449. Can you see any advantage in retaining the words "or suspend the operation of the order" ?—I would abolish the operation of the suspension altogether.

1450. That is exactly what I ask ?—I would not have a discharge.

1451. With regard to prosecutions, you do not say that there are no prosecutions under the Act ?—No, I do not, but I say that more fail than otherwise.

1452. The number of prosecutions ordered in 1903 was forty-five over the whole country ?—Out of 4,500 bankruptcies.

1453. And the number convicted was twenty-eight. You think that there ought to be a larger number of prosecutions ?—I certainly do.

1454. What is the cause of non-prosecution, do you think ?—The expense for one thing—nobody comes forward to undertake them and there is the trouble as well.

1455. But the Official Receiver, if he reports the facts and satisfies the court that fraud has been committed, would be able to obtain an order for prosecution ?—He does not. I have reported many and many a case where I am certain that a prosecution ought to have resulted, but nothing happened. What I would call facts, and what the Board of Trade call facts, are two very different things. They want so much more than any reasonable human being would want to induce them to prosecute.

1456. I want to understand what are your specific allegations—that the Board of Trade interfere, do you say ?—Perhaps I made a mistake there. Perhaps it has to go to the public prosecutor, but what I say is, they want so much in the way of proof in the dotting of the "i's" and the crossing of the "t's" that in the prosecutions that are applied for very few ever come to anything.

1457. Do you say that there are a sufficient number of applications by the Official Receiver on reports to the court ?—It has to filter through him first, and he will not do it at the public expense, unless he thinks that there is absolutely a certain case.

1458. Do you know any case where he has refused to prosecute after an order has been made by the county court judge ?—Not where an order has been made by the county court judge, but I know of cases where the Board of Trade have refused to prosecute where no order has been made.

1459. Why was no order made ?—If you apply for an order you very often send the man out of the country.

1460. You do not get him ?—No, you do not get him.

1461. The county court judge does not grant the order ?—No, no.

1462. I do not think you follow my question ?—Yes, I do.

1463. Is it your allegation that the Official Receiver does not report the facts ?—Yes.

1464. Or that the county court judge does not grant the order upon the report ?—No.

1465. Or that the public prosecutor does not carry out the order of the court when made. Which of them is it ?—No, I say that it is so difficult to collect evidence which will induce the Official Receiver and the public prosecutor to take action.

1466. The procedure is that the report is to be made to the court absolutely independently of the public prosecutor ?—Yes, I know that, and when the report has been made and if the order is made to prosecute, they are bound to prosecute.

1467. Then where is the failure ?—It is in the difficulty of satisfying them that the evidence will support a prosecution.

1469. (Chairman.) That is not what the Act says. The Act says that it shall be the duty of the public prosecutor.

1470. (Witness.) I know it says that, but we have had cases where they wrote back to us and said that there was some missing link here or some missing link there, and that they did not think that a conviction would ensue. Why should we have to go to the Board of Trade at all ? If the Official Receiver at Manchester, having had all the facts before him, is satisfied, I do not want the public prosecutor or anybody else to interfere. Let the Official Receiver go and start the prosecution. They do not understand the things as well in London as they do in the country, who have had all the facts before them.

1471. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, but do you say there are a large number of orders for prosecution made by the county court judges in Manchester which are not carried out?—No, there are not a large number made unfortunately.

1472. Does it not lie with the County Court in Manchester to order the prosecution?—No, it lies more, of course, with the Official Receiver to report.

1473. And he does not do it?—He does it where he is satisfied that the conviction will follow.

1474. And do you suggest that he could do it where he is not satisfied?—No, I do not suggest that he should, but if he is satisfied that a prosecution should follow he ought to start it and not go to someone else.

1475. That is what I say he does?—I say he ought not to have to go to the judge at all. Having conducted the public examination of the bankrupt and having all the facts before him—he is a solicitor—a barrister, or a man of standing—he ought to be able to start the prosecution at once.

1476-8. Have you a personal acquaintance with a large number of the Official Receivers?—No, I have not. I have a personal acquaintance with everyone who has been at Manchester—a very personal acquaintance.

1479. But you are quite satisfied, without knowing every Official Receiver throughout the country, that they ought to be entrusted with the duty of exercising that discretion?—I think that if the Board of Trade appoints Official Receivers they ought to appoint men of discretion.

1480. But the Board of Trade appoints them knowing that they have not to exercise discretion at the present time?—Then if they have not got sufficient discretion they ought not to be Official Receivers.

1481. Now then with regard to voluntary deeds I have one or two questions to ask you. Would not your view be met by bringing voluntary deeds within the purview of the Bankruptcy Act to this extent, that certain provisions of the bankruptcy procedure would apply to them and others would not?—You could do that, but I do not see the advantage of it.

1482. Except that it would unify the procedure?—It would.

1483. There are several provisions of the Bankruptcy Act which you wish to apply to voluntary deeds?—Which are those.

1484. First of all that the trustee should be appointed by the creditors?—Yes.

1485. That the trustee should give security to the Board of Trade?—Yes, but those have both nothing to do with the Bankruptcy Act.

1486. Those are provisions of the Bankruptcy Act?—They are similar to what happens in bankruptcy.

1487. Then you would apply the taxation of solicitor's costs?—Yes.

1488. You would say that the deed should not have power to discharge the debtor in itself?—Not until the creditors had assented.

1489. And you would give any creditor power to bring him before the court?—To say that this was not a case where the deed ought to be executed.

1490. There are several provisions of the bankruptcy law that do not apply to interim management of the estate. Until the trustee is appointed you would not allow the intervention of the Official Receiver?—No.

1491. Who is to manage the estate during that time?—There is no management. There is only an interval of about four days.

1492. Is that about the usual time?—Yes, it has to be registered, and the meeting must be held within seven days' or else you cannot do any good at all.

1493. It is very often registered, is it not, before——?—Before the meeting?

1494. Not before the meeting but it is registered without the assent of the majority of the creditors?—Yes, because it has to be.

1495. You would leave that as at present?—Yes.

1496. Would you have it registered after the assent of the majority?—I would not have any binding by the majority.

1497. Would you have any fixed date for calling the meeting of creditors?—I do not think so.

1499. You would not have anyone else?—I do not think it is necessary.

1500. Would you allow any opportunity to dissenting creditors under the deed to take an examination of the debtor publicly?—That comes to the same thing really. If a man thought that a debtor's conduct was such as to call for some remedy at the hands of the court he could apply to the court to set it right.

1501. But I am asking whether you would allow an examination. Would you allow the dissenting creditor to apply to the court for an order for an examination as to the debtor's affairs?—I think that that would be the same thing.

1502. What is your answer to that?—My answer to that is if it means the same thing, Yes; if it does not mean the same thing, No.

1503. Cannot you answer me directly. Would you not allow the creditors to apply to the court?—I would not, if you ask me baldly like that. I say I would allow a creditor to go to the court if he thought the debtor's conduct was such as would justify the court interfering with and stopping the progre s of the deed.

1504. I am asking you if you would allow the creditor to apply to the court for an order for a debtor's examination?—Although the circumstances were absolutely normal?

1505. Because he wants the inquiry?—If he only wants to inquire, I should not let him. That would stop all deeds, but if you mean an opportunity of investigation where the circumstances are sufficient to warrant it——

1506. I do not mean that?—Then I would not allow it, because I say that it would upset all deeds, and nobody would trouble about them.

1507. I take your answer to be that you would not allow an opportunity of investigation by a dissenting creditor unless he was ready to allege that there were grounds for charging fraud or irregularity which required the court to deal with it?—Quite so.

1508. In the majority of cases would not that lead to this that it would be impossible for the creditor to satisfy himself as to the facts?—I do not think so. At every meeting of creditors the first thing that is done is the calling in of the bankrupt.

1509. But there is no power to call in the bankrupt?—Then they would not assent to the deed, and they would walk out of the place.

1510. Would you make the deed invalid until it had been submitted to the meeting of creditors?—That is one of the propositions I did make, that no discharge is to be granted.

1511. That is not the question—would the deed be invalid?—If you did not accept it there would be no discharge.

1512. Can you answer the question? Would you make the deed invalid until a meeting of creditors had been held?—I would make the deed inoperative until a meeting of creditors had been held.

1513. Then at the meeting of creditors a certain majority would bind the minority?—Not according to my proposition.

1514. Your suggestion is that it would not bind the dissenting creditor, and that the dissenting creditor would not be debarred of his right of applying to the court?—In bankruptcy. Unless there was some good ground for doing it, I would not deprive him.

1515. With regard to unclaimed funds, how would you deal with those?—I never had the question put to me.

1516. You have it now?—I never thought about it, and I would not give an answer until I had thought about it.

1517. (Chairman.) If I might ask one question on an answer which I am not quite sure I followed when you said: "I would not have a discharge at all in bankruptcy." How would you in a perfectly honest case provide for a debtor getting free of his debts?—I mean to say this: that in a perfectly honest case he should be allowed to go scot free. I did not use the word "discharge" in its technical sense, I meant that he ought to be allowed to go and earn his own living, if he has not done anything wrong, and it is absurd to keep him locked up in a cage and labelled.

1518. You observed that you would make the order appropriating income?—Yes.

1519. Under the present Bankruptcy Act if a man has an income in the sense of a salary, an order can be made upon it now?—Yes.

1520. And then his personal earnings, subject to a sufficient allowance for maintenance, go to the trustee?—Yes.

1521. Would any order be necessary?—But will you tell me where there is any instance of it. When he applies for a discharge that is just what happens, but if he does not apply for a discharge nobody ever makes that application or order so far as my experience goes, and since 1883 I have never heard of it.

1522. I am afraid I have made so many applications myself that it would be impossible for me to say what the number of them has been?—Have you got them?

1523. Yes I have got the orders and sometimes I have got the money. With regard to the answer you gave to Mr. Addison would it meet your view about a dissenting creditor if the law were altered—if it were shewn that on the hearing of a petition that the debtor had assigned the whole of his property to trustees with the assent of a large majority—that that should be within the discretion of the registrar a sufficient cause for refusing to make the receiving order?—I suppose the "registrar" there means the registrar in London?

1524. Or the county court judge in the country. It was held you know at the beginning of this Act in the case of ex parte Dixon that it was not a sufficient cause. Would you alter the law so as to make it a sufficient cause?—No, I would not say that it was to be a sufficient cause that four-fifths had assented. I would say that he must satisfy the court that there was some reason for bankruptcy as against the deed of assignment—that is to say that he had done something that was wrong.

1525. (Mr. Smith.) There was something further that I wanted to ask. I should like your opinion on the question whether it would be possible to give any inducement to a debtor to go into court at an early stage, by giving him some allowance out of his estate for the purpose of starting in business in the event of his assets amounting to a certain percentage—you have not considered that?—Not from that standpoint, but the chairman has a letter from me dealing with this question of coming into court earlier, which I think goes to the whole root of the bankruptcy laws.

1526. (Chairman.) I was going to ask you about that?—And it deals with that very point, but it is not raised in these questions.

1527. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think it would be desirable to encourage a bankrupt by that means?—It is offering him a bribe.

1528. It is offering him an inducement?—It is something to which he is not entitled. First of all, I say he ought to know when he is insolvent, and he ought to come as soon as he is insolvent.

1530. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would favour the Committee with your view. I have got your letter?—If you please. What I say, is this—here we find in these reports of the Inspector-General published every year that men came to the court for relief, not when they have got any assets to distribute, but when they have denuded themselves of every sixpence in the world, practically speaking. There are bankruptcies in these reports to the extent of £50,000, £60,000, £70,000, or £80,000 with assets amounting to only £800 or less. Men in that position ought at any rate to have known long before, and they ought to have come to the court. It is simply a matter of bewilderment to me how they could have kept on all those years without anybody knowing what their position is. Now, I say that if you register every High Court judgment at the end of fourteen days unless in the meantime it is satisfied, you would inform the whole world of the position of these people who go on living from hand to mouth and living on the creditors' money. If a tobacconist or a greengrocer or a butcher incurs a debt of £10 it is registered, and we know all about it, and we can trace him if we like; but the big scoundrel, who is in for hundreds of pounds, and who has got scores of judgments against him, nobody knows a word about. I say that if a man cannot pay his judgment debt in fourteen days it ought to be registered, and then you know the position in which that man stands, and he will not be able to go on incurring all these enormous liabilities. You are only applying the law of the poor small trader to the huge trader. If that man cannot pay he ought not to get credit. Here you have the case of a bankruptcy petition—a bankruptcy notice time after time served on the same man. What is happening? he is paying all the costs of that, and if he were solvent it would never be issued against him. It is because he is insolvent that it is issued, but no one knows a word about it.

1531. On whom would you impose the obligation to register?—I would impose it on the creditor

1532. Supposing he did not do it?—He would have to suffer the consequence of that, that he could not enforce it.

1533-5. You would extend the provision to judgments by consent?—Why should not the High Court judgment be registered. It should, unless it is a farce. Of course we know that it is not a farce in practice, and from a trading point of view we know that it is a most efficient safeguard, but it is not applied outside the small trader. These big people get off scot free. It is a disgrace to our system that men should be able to accumulate liabilities of from £70,000, £80,000 to £100,000 and only come for relief when they have absolutely nothing left. That is the root of all the evil, and it is not until you have got at that root that you will stop this question of bankruptcy on a large scale. I desire to add that in my opinion the period of three months after the commission of an act of bankruptcy within which a creditor can present a petition in bankruptcy might be usefully reduced to one month. Especially where a debtor has executed a deed is this alteration desirable. The trustee cannot safely realise so long as there are creditors holding aloof. Consequently the estate suffers in value, and the outstanding creditors have a great power placed in their hands for a much too lengthy period, and it is utilised by them to extort a preference over, and against the interests of, the assenting creditors. I also think the Statute of Limitations might be reduced from six years to two years, and thus put difficulties in the way of bogus and manufactured relatives' claims.

Mr. A. O. JENNINGS called; and Examined.

27 June, 1906.

1536. (Chairman.) We all know you have been a long time—I think for more than twenty years—Registrar of the Brighton County Court?—Yes.

1537. And are you a member of the Committee of the Association of County Court Registrars?—Yes.

1538. And I think you have had the terms of reference to this Committee placed before you?—Yes.

1539. If it is convenient I will just take them in order?—Yes.

1540. The first of the questions—I need not weary you by reading it—relates to the investigation and consideration of the conduct of a bankrupt or a man against whom a receiving order has been made, and the two things on which we are asked to report are, first of all, whether the present provisions of the law requires strengthening; and, secondly, whether a debtor should be brought before the Court to have his discharge considered whether he applies or not for it. Perhaps you could give us your views on those subjects?—I think the present regulations involve the fact that a very great number of debtors never apply for their discharges at all. I have some figures here from which I see that since 1884 in my court there have been 1,275 adjudications, and during that time only 329 of the debtors have applied for their discharge up to the present time—that is to say about three-fourths of the debtors have not up to this moment applied for their discharge at all, and out of that number many have only applied quite recently; that is to say, although they were bankrupt in 1884 they have waited for years and years, until everybody who knew about them is dead and gone, and then have applied for a discharge. Taking the last five years, I find that out of 310 bankrupts only fifty-seven have applied for their discharge up to the present time, and I suggest, therefore, that the proceeding which involves the fact that the majority of bankrupts remain undischarged and never come before the Court must fail in what I assume to be part of the object for which the machinery was established. The difficulty is to ensure an application for a discharge. If you are desirous of increasing the strength of the conditions attending the discharge, such strengthening, of course, tends to prevent the bankrupts from voluntarily applying, and I would suggest, as I mention in my memorandum, that it should be a matter of course in the procedure that after the last public examination there should be a sitting for the purpose of considering the bankrupt's discharge, so that the Court should pronounce its opinion at the time when the whole of the facts are fresh and when even creditors take a little interest in what is going on, because such interest fails almost directly; that the Court should pronounce its opinion on the conduct of the bankrupt with a view to his discharge as under the Acts of 1849 and 1861. That system was done away with after 1861, when the whole tendency of legislation was to make things easy for the bankrupt. The Act of 1869 threw the whole of the power into the hands of the creditors, and therefore those conditions were hardly applicable. Up to that time it was a matter of course that the discharge should be considered after the man had been publicly examined, and at the time when the facts in connection with his trading were fresh in the mind of the Court.

1542. It has often occurred to me—I do not know whether it has occurred to you—that the judge has not at present sufficient cognizance of the public examination. He has the report of the Official Receiver, but he very seldom sees much of the questions and answers?—That is quite true, and I have not the least doubt that the person who is most seized of the facts is the registrar. I am only diffident about making any suggestion with regard to giving him jurisdiction because I know the profession think there ought not to be any attempt to pile jurisdiction on to the registrars. Very often the judges consult the registrars as to what their opinion of the bankrupt is, having regard to the fact that they have held the public examination, but that is hardly a thing you could direct to be done.

1543. In your memorandum which you have favoured us with you have referred to the case of In re Kemp?—Yes. That is merely an instance, and I thought I would refer to that. He was a bankrupt who applied for his discharge. The creditors were then all awake and a large number of them attended and opposed; but it was rather a bad case, I thought, having listened to his examination, and the judge, without any hesitation, refused his discharge absolutely. The man had been guilty of fraudulent conduct, and his discharge was refused. He waited six years. At the end of that time another Official Receiver had come along and another judge had been appointed. The principal creditor had died, and two others who had opposed had moved out of the district. The result was that he came before the Court apologising, and suggesting that he had purged whatever offence he had been guilty of, and no one opposed; the Official Receiver knew nothing of it, except for the records in the office, and the man got his discharge within six months exactly under the same circumstances as before. That shows how easy it is for a man to get entirely free by waiting, and sometimes he has only to wait a short time. That does not add anything to what I have previously said; it is merely an illustration which I had in my mind.

1544. And a very good illustration too. Passing on to the second clause, that you see relates first of all to the provision with regard to the conditions on which a discharge is granted, and also whether further punishment should be inflicted for such offences as improper and reckless trading, and failure to keep proper books. Will you kindly favour us with your experience on that?—I think that the present rules do not hit grossly incompetent bankrupts at all hardly. That is the feeling. I think prosecutions are extremely rare, and it appears to me that the failure to keep books, certainly on a second occasion, after a man has already been bankrupt, and it has been found that the failure to keep books has led to bankruptcy, is a criminal offence, and criminal in the sense that we usually understand the word,—that the man is so reckless that his conduct ought to be punished as a criminal offence. In regard to the failure to keep proper books the second time, I feel that the process by which prosecutions are instituted does lead to the escape of very many thoroughly criminal bankrupts. First of all there is to be a Report, as you know, to the judge as to whether on the whole, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, and the official receiver, there have been criminal offences, and the judge has to be satisfied that he thinks there is a prima facie case, and in that case he makes an order and sends it to the Treasury. Then the Treasury again consider it, and if they think fit, there is a prosecution, when, of course, it goes before a jury. It appears to me that one of the objects of the criminal law is to ensure certainty and promptness in carrying it into effect. That appears to me to be lost by the present method of procedure. But apart from that there is a great tendency on the part of jurics not to convict, which perhaps is not hard to understand. In a recent prosecution in Brighton, which failed, I was informed that there were one or two undischarged bankrupts on the jury, and I am told that that is very generally the case. Under the Act of 1861 there was power in the court itself in considering the question of discharge to award punishment, at any rate in some cases. There may be a question as to the amount of punishment that the court will inflict on the facts before it, but I think that any punishment that is inflicted should be imposed when the whole of the facts are fresh in the mind of the court. I think if the bankrupt were given the right to be tried by a jury no objection could be raised on his behalf; the procedure would tend to speed and certainty, and I do not think that it would lead to any unnecessary severity. I think that county court judges are not inclined to impose very hard sentences; they are civil judges, and I think it would add to the certainty of the procedure if that were done. That was dropped in the 1869 Act, because it may be that the Committee who sat at that time to take evidence had testimony showing why that system did not work; otherwise I should have thought it would have led to good results. The only thing I had to say about the keeping of books was as to whether it would be possible to make a definition about what books should be kept. At present I think it would be likely to be observed if the Committee gave any kind of indication, or the Bill or Act did so, as to the kind of books which the trader should keep. At present he is required to keep such books as will sufficiently disclose his financial relations, but if a large number of small debtors were told that they would be expected to keep certain kinds of books, one book showing the receipts and payments, another their indebtedness, and another their credits and stock, that, I think, would be helpful. I make that suggestion with diffidence, because accountants will know much more about how far that would be practicable than I know.

1545. It would certainly seem very difficult to get a jury to convict a man unless he had some guide as to what books he was to keep?—I think so. Debtors when examined often say that they do not know what books they ought to have kept. A debtor will say "I kept what I thought was usual, but I did not know what was to be done, or what books I had to keep," and in many cases men in a large way of business I have known to produce some little memorandum book in which they have put down only such payments or receipts as they happened apparently to recollect.

1546. Do you find that the fact of failure to keep proper books is very prevalent?—Very—I should think in almost half the cases of traders at any rate it occurs—I am not referring to the obligation of non-traders at present.

1547. As regards paragraph 4 I note that you make some reference to Section 122. That is not within our reference. I do not think any of the Committee know very much about it, and I do not know anybody who does, except the registrars of county courts?—I am sorry to have troubled you about it, but I thought the point was being considered.

1548. The point we are rather considering with reference to that is whether there should be a more speedy system of realisation without waiting for the certificate of the trustee in cases where it would be more advantageous to creditors for the realisation to take place?—By the Official Receiver before the adjudication do you mean?

1549. Yes, if necessary?—Yes; that I do not pretend to have any special cognisance of. The realisation is entirely out of the hands of the court, and it is entirely in the hands of the Official Receiver. I know nothing about it until the estate has been realised, and I cannot pretend to make any suggestion about it.

1550. Passing to paragraph 6, that refers to married women, and whether the law should be altered so as to make them subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as men are. What are your views upon that?—It has become the practice as of course for a man who is a bankrupt and who does not think he can get his discharge, being conscious of guilt, and who does not apply for it, to put his wife into his business, and to trade as her manager. That is a matter that is carried on with comparative regularity. If a man has got a wife he does that, or if not he will generally make use of his sister for that purpose, so that he can go on trading in her name. Of course she is under no responsibility with regard to the husband or the brother's previous conduct. As a rule she knows nothing about the business. I have sometimes had a woman made bankrupt for a second trading, and I have found that, as a rule, she knows nothing about the business. That is a thing that is extremely prevalent, and for that reason I think the whole law with regard to married women should be altered. Some time ago in my court I had a bankrupt before me who explained to me what he considered to be the admirable provisions of the English Bankruptcy Law which enabled debtors to protect themselves from their creditors. He said to me, "I had an income of £1,300, which I settled on my wife, and the result is quite beautiful. She cannot be sued, or if she is sued the estate cannot be touched, because she is protected by the law. She cannot be made bankrupt, because she is a married woman, and she cannot be committed because she is a married woman. I can be sued, but if I am harassed I of course immediately become bankrupt." He explained to me himself in court how the law worked in that way, and it is a fact that the income can be enjoyed without the least possibility of the creditor touching it in the way I have illustrated. That of course would be hit at if the same laws were applied to married women as to other human beings. It is mere accident, I take it, that a married woman enjoys that privilege. It is based on the fact that the old law would permit of no personal judgment being entered against a married woman, and to the fact that under the old law she could not be made bankrupt, but I have never heard that there was any difference in her constitution which would afford a reason why she should not be under the same disability that a woman, who is not married, is under. I am strongly of opinion that married women should be put in exactly the same position as any other woman so far as liability to pay, and so far as being made a bankrupt, or being committed, is concerned. The case that I have referred to is that of Mr. Betts.

1551. There was a very remarkable case in the London Court in which a bankruptcy petition was presented against a lady. She came in person, and asked for it to be adjourned for a week in order that she might settle, and during the week she married?—I did not know of that case.

1552. I do not think you offer us any suggestions upon paragraph 7?—No.

1553. But on paragraph 8, which relates to deeds of arrangement and compositions outside the Court, perhaps you would kindly favour the Committee with your views?—Where under the present law some dissatisfaction is expressed is that you cannot have a deed of arrangement to bind the minority, but I am bound to say to give general power to creditors under a deed of arrangement for the majority to bind the minority, is, to my mind, full of dangers; for this reason, that the creditors only think, and perfectly and properly only think, of themselves, and if any man makes an offer which they concur in, they accept the deed of arrangement just as they will accept any other composition. But it is against the policy of the law that any debtor or anybody else should be able to buy immunity from inquiry, and I am satisfied that when a creditor agrees he only agrees when he thinks that he will get an amount which he otherwise would not get. I do not think that deeds of arrangement ought to go through without some kind of investigation, any more than compositions can go through without investigation. Under proposals for composition certain formalities have to be complied with. You know there has to be an investigation, and there has to be a report, and the Court has to be satisfied that no offence has been committed, and when that has been done the composition goes through, and I cannot see why, just because it is a deed of arrangement it should be exempted from the ordinary provisions which prevail in reference to other compositions. I may say with regard to one or two cases that have come under my observation as registrar, where deeds of arrangement have been accepted by the creditors, and one creditor has stood out, as it was suggested, from malice or spite, that the result has been as I have said, that the man has paid a larger composition than the estate showed he could pay, with the view of getting out of some inquiry. In one case—it was an outrageous case—the trader paid over 20s. in the pound. When it came into bankruptcy it turned out that the estate had been sold and parted with, and I think the statement of affairs on which the creditors accepted the deed gave no true account of the man's actual position, while an investigation in bankruptcy showed that the man had other estate which he had sold. I suggest that that is likely to be the case where there is no kind of investigation before the creditors are called upon to accept or refuse an offer which they get under the deed. Apart from that the deed very often conceals some sort of fraudulent conduct. When I was in practice I was strongly in favour of private deeds, because they seemed to me to be simpler and quicker. At that time my interests were those of the creditors and the debtors—sometimes I was acting for the creditor and sometimes I was acting for the debtor, but I am satisfied now that the general interests of public morality are against anything which tends to slur over the causes which lead to men's failure. It may sometimes diminish the amount which the creditors get in a particular case, but I am sure that it is a valuable protection for the tone and standard—the honour in trading generally, and I think that everyone should know that he cannot simply get through or obtain immunity by any kind of offer. I ought to say at once I think I shall be looked upon as a blackleg by the bulk of the profession, whose opinion in some sense is more valuable than mine, because they are in continual touch with creditors and debtors, but I suggest on the other hand that that very fact may serve to take out of their view the wider aspect of the question and the matters of public policy which are involved in the protection of creditors under such arrangements as are suggested. I am not sure whether I have answered what you were putting to me, sir.

1554. Quite. May I put one question to you entirely on my own account. You, of course, recollect that in the very first year of this Act it was suggested that the registrar had a discretion to refuse to make a receiving order, if it turned out that a large majority of the debtors' creditors had accepted a deed and it was held that the registrar had no such discretion. Would you give a discretion to enable the registrar if he thought that it was a clean case and that a deed was more desirable and that the petitioning creditor was simply standing out to try to get better terms for himself—would you give the registrar discretion in such a case to refuse to make a receiving order?—Such discretion would be of no use unless it was after inquiry and investigation, because on such an application the registrar has no means of knowing any more than he is told. My point is that there should be an investigation by somebody who is independent before anything goes through. In my old practice one did not expect to hear anything more of an estate after the first meeting—it all vanished. When the new Act came into force I think two or three of the Brighton accountants, who were regular accountants, ran away because they could not face inquiry which the Board of Trade had power to order as to past accounts. One accountant I recollect coming to my partner in such a case—my partner told me of it—just before the new Act, and while we were under the old Act. That particular accountant said. "I find from this estate I have only got £42 left after paying expenses and that amount would yield a farthing in the pound. That would be quite useless to the creditors, and I would suggest as the easiest way that we divide that sum between us." My partner kicked him out of the office, but the fact that he should dare to make such a suggestion to a solicitor shows what was done at the time. You cannot trust the class of accountant who touts for business and gets it. Creditors, like anybody else will often give proxies to anybody who chooses to ask for them, and if the lower class of accountant choose to come and ask for proxies, the creditor will give them because it saves him trouble and the result is that these private arrangements get into the hands of inferior accountants. I am particularly anxious to say that I am not suggesting any charges against accountants as a body, because we all value them very much, and when we get the better class of accountants they are very helpful and extremely valuable, but it is those who come and tout for business that I am speaking of. I am speaking from my experience of what used to occur in Brighton under these old deeds of arrangement.

1555. Assuming that matters stand as they are, or that there was an alteration in the respect that you have been speaking of, would you put the accounts of trustees and their administration of the estate at all under official control?—I think there should be an official audit, but I am anxious to avoid getting the inelastic administration which results when you have the actual disposal of the estate in the hands of an official. No official can be very free in his dealings with an estate; he will not take responsibility; but I should make provision for the fullest public examination and investigation by some official, although I do not desire to increase official administration in the sense of making officials responsible as regards the disposing or realising of estates. I think there should be the fullest power for creditors to take that over if they thought fit or to entrust it to someone, but I think there should always be the fullest examination of all that has been done in the shape of accounts and audit.

1556. Assuming that it is necessary for creditors who do not get their dividends in time or for any other reason to apply for redress to some court or other, would you give it to the Bankruptcy Court—to use a convenient expression—or, as it is now, would you go to the equity side of the High Court or county court, as the case may be?—Under a deed of arrangement?

1557. Yes?—I think the Bankruptcy Court is quicker and cheaper. That is my experience—equity administration is expensive.

1558. Yes. Passing to the last subject, which is the one on which I think you have what politicians call a "mandate"?—Yes.

1559. That is in relation, first of all, to assignments of book debts, and whether they should be registered, and secondly, the hiring agreements and other forms of securities—which means things of the same kind—and whether they ought to be registered, we have had very little information before this Committee at present on that subject. Therefore we shall be very glad of any suggestions that you may be able to offer us?—Perhaps I may refer to the question of hiring agreements in the first place, because it is only on that point that I speak as the mouthpiece of the county court registrars. We have all been hit hard by what has taken place. As high bailiffs we are bound to enforce the judgment of the creditor by seizing the debtor's goods. If we do not the creditor brings an action for negligence against us, but if we seize the goods of the defendant or the person in apparent possession, and sell them up and pay the money into court, or pay it over to the creditor, during all that time the true owner, under the hire-purchase agreement, may be perfectly conscious of all that is going on, and may choose to wait until the whole thing is realised and then sue the high bailiff for damages. I feel that that is such an injustice that it is only to be mentioned for any person to appreciate clearly the injustice of it. The high bailiff is merely an officer of the court who is called upon to enforce the law. He has not the slightest interest in the matter, and if he does not perform his duty and seize the goods the creditor sues him for negligence and he has no protection because the owner keeps quiet. If the creditor sues him for not seizing the goods, of course the owner does not come forward and say that no loss has been sustained and the result is that he has to pay damages to the creditor. If he does seize the goods then the true owner of the goods comes forward and sues him for seizing his goods even although he may have known all the time that all these proceedings were going on. That state of things is so obviously unjust that I suggest that if the attention of the Legislature is once called to it, it cannot but remedy it, by first of all protecting high bailiffs and sheriffs. For that purpose I would suggest that there should be a simple clause saying that a high bailiff or a sheriff, who has seized and sold goods, after due inquiry, of a person in apparent possession should not be liable to damages except under the ordinary interpleader procedure; that is to say, he must give notice within a reasonable time before the money is actually paid over and then the high bailiff, if he has parted with the goods, may be liable in damages. But that would not help or protect the traders, who are largely interested in this matter. Traders are largely interested because they give credit to people on the faith of their being in possession of furniture. When I say "traders" I mean shopkeepers in the place where the person, whose goods are seized, lives. I think the Committee would be astonished at the prevalence of the custom by means of which goods in the apparent possession of a person, particularly furniture, do not belong to him. I should suppose that in almost half the cases of men living in houses the furniture which they have in them does not belong to them, but has been hired under the hire purchasing system. A man may have paid more than half the amount due in respect of the goods so hired and then the hirer, if the instalments continue to be imposed, comes in and seizes the whole lot, and in that case creditors are hit very frequently. A man often gets credit by reason of the fact that he has furniture in the house, which presumably belongs to him, but when the furniture is seized under hiring agreements, it turns out that he has got no assets to satisfy creditors with. It was mentioned to me this morning by the sheriff's officer at Brighton that he had experience of a case of this sort during the present week. A family in Brighton, living in a very large house, the rent of which was between £150 and £200 a year, had had an execution levied upon their goods at Brighton. They had obtained very large credit in Brighton, but when the sheriff's officer went in to take possession he found that the day before Messrs. Whiteley had removed every stick there was in the place, and that the whole family were laying on heaps of straw in the rooms. That is one instance I quote, because it occurred this week. It is exactly the same case as there was in regard to bills of sale. If you remember, the Act of 1854 was passed for precisely the same reason. The preamble to that Act is very short, and possibly I may be allowed to read it. It says: "Whereas frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the grantees or holders of such bills of sale, have the power of taking possession of the property of such persons, to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors. For remedy thereof be it enacted." The position is exactly that which applied under the old bills of sale before they were registered. The remedy the Legislature applied there was to enact that all bills of sale should be registered so that every person should know whether a man was in possession of his own goods or not. I say that the prevalence of hiring agreements is a serious matter for shop people, who suffer very much from them. I have had several shop keepers complaining to me that they are unable to realise anything on their executions because of the goods being under hiring agreements. That is the result of these documents coming into force under which goods in the apparent possession of one man belong to another. That is a system which does serious damage to the creditors, and not only do hiring firms take advantage of those agreements, but debtors take advantage of them. They take hiring agreements from their brothers and cousins so as to avoid giving bills of sale, and instead of resorting to bills of sale now they resort to hire-purchase agreements, which require no registration and which are equally effective for their purposes. I would suggest that there should be legislation for utilising the machinery of the Bills of Sale Act both centrally and locally or of the Deeds of Arrangement Act for purposes of hiring agreements. I think that the Bills of Sale Act is less expensive because the Deeds of Arrangement Act involves sending a complete copy of the deed to the local office, whereas under the Bills of Sale Act you only send a summary to the local office, and therefore there is some expense saved. All the registrars, practically all over the country, were quite unanimous on this point. We could hardly get through our business at our meeting, because we were all so anxious to express the harm that these hire-purchase agreements were doing in our respective localities, and therefore there are two remedies I would suggest.

1560. What is it that you would suggest?—I should suggest that a very short clause would protect sheriffs and high bailiffs. It is so obviously just that a man should not be allowed to manufacture a case against a high sheriff or a bailiff that there ought to be no difficulty in inserting such a clause in an Act, and the other suggestion would be legislation for the protection of traders and the general public.

1561. It has been suggested—in fact it comes into the sequence of your ideas on the subject—that the registration staff would have to be a very large one, because these things are now so numerous?—That is quite possible, but the very fact that they are so numerous shows how large is the evil that has to be met. If it were not for the fact that they were so numerous one would perhaps not complain so much. I think it quite likely that there would have to be a large increase in the registration staff. Why I divide my suggestion into two parts is because I thought there might be opposition with regard to registration from the very fact of this system having developed into such a large business. I thought it would be unfair to couple registration with what is not a controversial matter. But quite apart from that I think that registration would not entirely protect the officers of the law, because there would be great difficulty in making that retrospective, and so, for years to come, sheriffs and high bailiffs would be shot at.

1562. Have you faced at all the question of the possible difficulty of defining what a hiring agreement is. They vary, I think, from the most informal language in a letter to a signed and sealed document with clauses settled by counsel?—I must admit that I have not applied myself to drafting a clause, but what I have in my mind is the bailment of goods for reward in which the bailor parts with the goods to the bailee, but I should be sorry to bind myself to a definition which would be expressed rather hastily.

1563. Passing on generally to assignments of book debts, do you think that those ought to be registered like assignments of chattels?—They are very numerous, but I have not personally come into contact with any cases of evil resulting from them at present, except the fact that debtors complain very much that somebody else is suing them who has not got the bowels of compassion of the person with whom they dealt. But I do not think that registration would be of any assistance on that point. I have not come across any gross evil such as that of the case of a person in apparent possession of goods, as to which any one would agree that that was a matter which required legislation. Mr. Marshall, the president of our association, who is to attend before you next week, will propose the extension of the order and disposition clause in bankruptcy. That represents the alternative suggestion, but the suggestions I am expressing to-day are those of the majority of my committee.

1564. (Mr. Evans.) In the evidence you gave and the recommendations you made with reference to book-keeping, do you intend that evidence and those recommendations to be restricted to traders?—Yes; I did not mean that improper book-keeping led to any grave evils on the part of other people, although I do not doubt that private persons are unaware of their position owing to the fact of their not keeping books. But I do not think that anyone ought to be bound by law to keep books relating to his private dealings. A great many of us are unable to keep account of our private dealings from the very fact of our being so busily engaged in other matters. I remember the point was raised in the case of re Mutton, as to whether the clause as to book-keeping affected private dealings, and the judge said he would be guilty himself if it did—because he did not keep accounts of his own private dealings.

1565. With regard to married women, have you considered the question of interfering at all with property settled under marriage settlements, in the event of the bankruptcy of the married woman ?—Yes, but I could not see my way to make any suggestion as to putting an end to marriage settlements entered into before marriage, apart from the general rule existing at the present time they can only be set aside if the Court holds that they were entered into for the fraudulent purpose of defeating creditors. I am not prepared to make any suggestion as to setting them aside in any other way than they can be set aside at present, such as intended fraud upon the creditors.

1566. Supposing that a married woman with an income of £1,300, which was the case that you mentioned to us yourself during your evidence to-day, retained the benefit of that income under a settlement, without being touched by the Bankruptcy Law, so far as getting the whole of the property is concerned, no doubt the publicity of adjudication in bankruptcy would be disagreeable, but perhaps it would have some deterrent effect in such a case as that ?—At any rate it would lead to full investigation, which you cannot have at present, and I think that frequently would be very helpful.

1567. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it that you say that in your opinion applications for discharge of a bankrupt should be made compulsory ?—Yes, as a matter of course.

1568. You think that a man who has been made a bankrupt should have another chance to start in life, free from all encumbrances ?—The application should be made compulsory.

1569. No, I mean to say that where a man has been made bankrupt it is naturally a drawback to that man that he remains an undischarged bankrupt. If he is an honest man who has got into difficulties through unfortunate circumstances, in such a case do you think that that stigma should be removed from him ; that is to say, unless there was something glaringly bad against a man he should have his discharge ?—Yes, I think it would be very dangerous to refuse a man the opportunity to go and get a discharge in his bankruptcy. As far as I remember under any bankruptcy law, it has never been suggested that a man should be absolutely bound never to trade again in his own name if he has once been a bankrupt.

1570. We have had it before from more than one witness that it is against public policy that there should be a number of undischarged bankrupts who have got this stigma against them, and that they should be relieved from the past, and have a chance of starting again. Would you go so far as to say that the obtaining the advantage of a discharge should be made easier than it is now ?—No, I do not think discharges ought to be made easier than they are now, but whether the penalty ought to be in all cases what it is now, namely, suspension—is another question. Generally the penalty applied is that of suspension, and you get bankrupts remaining undischarged, because their period of suspension has not run out. The number of cases in which discharge is refused is very rare—I am speaking of my own court. I have not looked at the statistics, but certainly not once a year is a discharge refused altogether—not once in three years. It is only suspended, or some kind of condition annexed—a judgment, or something of that kind.

1571. From your experience do you consider that a man thinks it a disgrace to be an undischarged bankrupt ?—I do not know that a man considers it a disgrace. He is a little susceptible to public opinion because that is rather a term of abuse—I mean people talk about a man being an undischarged bankrupt—which shows how it is regarded, and I have known actions to be brought by reason of a man thinking that he has been libelled by being spoken of as an undischarged bankrupt. The fact that it has become a term of abuse shows that public opinion does look on a man with suspicion who is an undischarged bankrupt ; but I do not think that that is a case that occurs very often, because the worse he is the less he cares for the name.

1572. In connection with making it compulsory for a man to apply for his discharge what penalty or sanction would you impose ?—For what ?

1574. Do you think it would be helpful to the administration of the Bankruptcy Law if something more drastic were enforced than simply the penalty of undischarge for a bankrupt ?—I have already suggested that I think not keeping books properly in the case of second bankruptcy should be made a criminal offence.

1575. A criminal offence ?—Yes, I think there should be power of imprisonment. I think that is the case in Germany.

1576. (Mr. Richardson.) And also in France.

1577. (Witness.) Mr. Smith will remember that in the evidence which was published before the Act of 1883 that was gone into. I do not think that there is anything unjust in that. I do not mean that there should be five years' penal servitude, but I think that liability to a short term of imprisonment would be a great deterrent to a man twice daring to trade without keeping proper books.

1578. (Mr. Evans.) You say that in your opinion at least 50 per cent. of traders do not keep proper books of account ?—I do not think I said that 50 per cent. of the traders do not keep proper books of account, but 50 per cent. of bankrupts do not. Those are cases where the official receiver reports that the bankrupt has kept books which are imperfect. In a very large proportion of cases the official receiver reports that the traders do not keep proper books of account.

1579. There are a large number of people who are not competent to keep what you and I might call a proper set of books ?—Yes, that is why I am suggesting that some definition should be given as to what books they are to keep. I think such definition would be very helpful. I am afraid of being too loquacious, and I hope the Committee will stop me if they think I am, but in school at present no importance is paid to book-keeping. I am Chairman of the Higher Schools Sub-Committee at Brighton, and I have been struck with the fact of how few of the pupils care to learn book-keeping. If you made it an offence for a man to trade without knowing the elements of book-keeping I think you would create a desire in the public to be taught something about book-keeping.

1580. What is the tribunal to which you would give jurisdiction to inflict punishment ?—I am suggesting that the court which considers the question of the man's discharge should also have the power of considering the question of any criminal offence and impose a punishment adequate to the case.

1581. (Chairman.) By the Act of 1861 it is provided, "That if the court should be of opinion that the bankrupt has carried on trade by means of fictitious capital, or that he could not have had at the time when any of his debts were contracted any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same, or that, if a trader, he has, with intent to conceal the true state of affairs, wilfully omitted to keep proper books of account, or, whether trader or not, that his insolvency is attributable to rash and hazardous speculation, or unjustifiable extravagance in living, or that he has put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense by frivolous or vexatious defence to any action or suit to recover any debt or money due from him, the court may either refuse an order of discharge, or may suspend the same from taking effect for such time as the court may think fit, or may grant an order of discharge subject to any condition or conditions touching any salary, pay, emolument, profits, wages, earnings or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt, and touching after-acquired property of the bankrupt, or may sentence the bankrupt to be imprisoned for any period of time not exceeding one year from the date of such sentence."

1582. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You speak in your district of accountants of low type touting about for proofs and for proxies. Is it not also your experience in great numbers of cases that the principal creditors themselves take some interest in the administration of the bankrupt's estate?—In rare cases. They take a certain amount of interest now, but very little—it is the exception for them to attend the public examination, though they generally go to the first meeting. In the old days under the old Act they hardly ever troubled to go there. I have been to many meetings where there has been no one present except the accountant, who held sufficient proxies to make a quorum, and who appointed himself as trustee and appointed me his solicitor.

1583. One fully appreciates all that you have said in connection with the hire purchasing system, which is very much in vogue at the present time; but is it not worthy of consideration whether the registration of hire purchase agreements would not be very detrimental to the carrying on of trade as regards seven-tenths of the people who do not buy merely furniture on hire, but people who buy motor cars by deferred payments, or people who buy jewellery or watches by deferred payments. If everybody who buys a thing and does not pay for it on the nail —to use a vulgarism—has to register the transaction, would not it be detrimental in your opinion to the carrying on of trading generally?—I have not the least doubt that it would make the present system rather difficult, and the conflict is between the interest of the traders generally and the interest of the particular persons who are engaged in the present system of hire purchase. It appears to me that the attention of the legislature should be directed to the subject, and that whatever safeguards are necessary in any such Bill as might be introduced should be inserted; but I think that in general some protection should be given to traders from what is admittedly an evil—that of one person being in apparent possession of goods which do not belong to him. I can see the difficulty, and I indicated that I did so when I first spoke.

1584. You appreciate my point—I mean to say a man buys a motor car for £1,000. He pays for it by twelve payments. He may be a man in a perfectly good position, although he does not want to find £1,000 for that purpose at the moment. You would not care to have it registered that you had brought a motor car under such circumstances?—No, I do not think I should. I do follow what you say, and it presses me and always has done so, but I think that something ought to be done to meet an evil which is so widespread.

1585. What are your views as to the registration of any transfer of book debts?—I have no views—I have not personally come in contact with any grave evil in connection with it.

1586. (Mr. Richardson.) Still on hiring agreements, of course we know that railway waggons, engines, threshing machines and so on are sold under hiring agreements. Now I suppose you would agree that they should be registered?—Yes.

1587. Of course the hire agreement system has come up of late years. It was not in existence when I was a young man. In those days you bought your furniture and the dealer had sufficient confidence in you to give you credit and you paid for it as you could. Do not you think that that was a better system, and that under that system traders looked after their debtors better than by allowing hiring agreements, which is a system that is going I do not know where. I have a friend of mine in the jewellery trade in the West End who told me recently that I would be astonished if I knew the class of people who buy expensive jewellery under the hire agreement system. The hire agreement system does open up trade undoubtedly to immense—what shall I say—opportunities for fraud. Do you agree that the old system of purchasing was better than the present system of hire agreements by which traders give their customers great credit but in which the customer has not a proprietary claim on the goods until they are all paid for?—My suggestion pointed to that, that instead of saying that no person shall enter into a hiring agreement, I would suggest that it shall be registered so that people shall know of it. I think that would stop most of the evils resulting from it. They would be much fewer than they are, and I think it would be a very good thing, apart from the evils I have mentioned. I have not the slightest doubt that the hire agreement system tempts people to purchase goods for credit which they cannot pay for. Young married couples can get goods in that way, and I have had a great many of them coming into my court to defend actions brought against them by the persons from whom they have obtained goods under hire purchase agreements for not having paid up their instalments, and then because they have fallen into arrear and not been able to pay the balance the owner under the hiring agreement has seized the whole lot and taken possession. The evils under that system in some cases I think are shocking. The instances that Mr. Chamberlin has adduced, although they point out the difficulty, do not affect the suggestions I have made that those agreements ought to be registered, because it is shocking how poor people are made to suffer under them.

1588. Yes, I know from experience. I have known people who have had goods under hire agreements from disreputable tradesmen. The tradesman loses his book, and gets a new book in which he makes it appear that the customer owes nine or twelve months more payments than if he kept the proper books he would be shewn to be owing. I think that the system which has come into vogue of hiring agreements ought to be checked. With regard to book-keeping, you say that on a second failure the trader not having properly kept his books you would not make him liable to imprisonment. In a great number of good businesses where proper books have been kept, and then failure looms in the distance, the trader has been known to cease to keep books. The debtor's books get into a bad way for the purpose of getting through conveniently in the bankruptcy proceedings. Would you not also include a man trading in that way and make him liable?—Certainly, he would be included. Failure to keep books means failure to keep books continuously during the period preceding his bankruptcy. I do not mean that keeping books for a certain period should exempt him, because he should continue to keep books.

1590. You find it frequently happens that in the first failure books have been well kept for seven, eight or ten years, and then in the last year or eighteen months before the failure has come about, the books have not been kept at all?—It is quite true, and it often shocks one, but if you made the law too drastic there would be a reaction against it. I quite agree that in many cases the man deserves to be criminally punished, but I do not think the community would stand it, that one failure to keep books should be made a criminal offence.

1591. With regard to the registration of debts, you have not quite made up your mind that that is desirable?—I have not any opinion.

1592. Do you not agree that in most cases the assignment of book debts means that the person assigning the book debts is insolvent at the time he assigns them?—It is often the case.

1593. In the majority of cases?—Perhaps in the majority, although not by any means universally. There are a certain number of men who live by buying book debts and they buy from traders who are not in any way insolvent. There are several persons whose business it is to buy up book debts for the sake of the very large discount which they get. They pay not more than 2s.6d. in the £ for the debts, and then they go through the county court harrassing the debtors and get 10s. in the £ for themselves. The owners of the book debts do not sell them because they are themselves insolvent, but because they want to avoid the trouble, the expense and the invidiousness of having to collect the debts through the court. There is a very large number of such cases. I do not admire the system, but I do not think that registration would be the remedy for it, and I doubt whether it would cure the evil.

1594. That is a different method of disposing of book debts to any that has been presented to us before by previous witnesses?—Have you not had it? I had a man before me the other day who told me he had got

27 June, 1906.

£12,000 which he had invested in the purchase of book debts. He had put out his money in that way believing that he would get a larger return upon it than by any other form of investment. On paper he told me that his investment showed a very large profit of hundreds per cent., but he also informed me that in actual practice he had lost money and that the creditors—the persons who originally owned the book debts—were far more shrewd in passing them off on the persons who purchased them than he had given them credit for, and I think he said that a person who had paid some hundreds of pounds for book debts had only realised upon them quite a few pounds.

1595. (Mr. Peat.) Your observation with regard to the registration of hiring agreements—does it chiefly refer to furniture?—Yes.

1596. Your view of business probably does not extend to the large manufacturing centres where many hundreds and thousands of pounds are involved?—My view of business does not extend so far—I mean my opportunities do not extend so far.

1597. So that you really could not tell what would be suitable in a large business of that character, but I conclude that you feel that for a small concern and for a small person to have his house full of furniture and nobody to know that it is not his is objectionable?—I think that as far as furniture is concerned (my opinion is very general) it is not right for any person to get credit on the strength of furniture which is not his: but the large transactions to which you are referring with regard to the purchase on the hire system of colliery trucks and things of that kind I have had no experience of at all.

1598. Large machinery paid for by instalments?—I have no experience of that at all.

1599. Even ships paid for by instalments—all that makes a difference to your view?—I have no experience of that.

1600. Have you any views to express about it?—No, I do not think I have.

1601. Then I want you to consider an observation which you made a little time ago that, in your early experience, only in a small proportion of cases did one ever hear of any estate after a preliminary meeting; I conclude that would be liquidation by arrangement under the Act of 1869?—Yes.

1602. And that is the foundation of your statement that creditors cannot be trusted to look after themselves?—That is not the only foundation for that statement.

1603. But it is one amongst other foundations?—Yes.

1604. Did you make that observation with the view of influencing the opinion of the Committee in regard to deeds of assignment under the present Act of 1869?—Yes; I thought it affected the whole question how far creditors by deeds, or by any other means, should be able to make their own arrangements without investigation of the debtor's conduct.

1605. In making that suggestion, did you look at any statistics of the Board of Trade or consider any statistics?—Not recently, but I have had them before me. When the Act of 1883 was in contemplation I then had a large amount of evidence before me which I had to consider on the point, but I have not recently looked up the statistics.

1606. I think it would be just that you should look up those statistics before binding yourself to a statement of that character?—Yes.

1607. For instance, in the report of the Board of Trade for the year 1904, which is before me, under deeds of assignment the number of cases went up to 2,710. You would not be aware of that?—The report of the Board of Trade is sent to me every year, and I have looked at it but I have not studied it.

1608. Your observation was not made, I conclude, with a knowledge of the facts?—I have a knowledge of the facts, but I cannot pretend that I have closely studied the particular figures you are putting before me.

1609. I am not taking particular figures; you may take the facts over a series of years, and for any of those years I can give you the figures with regard to deeds of assignment where the Board of Trade had no control and where in a particular year the gross assets were £1,200,000. The debtors' estimate was £1,700,000—that is to say, that under a deed of assignment the realised proportion of the debtors' estimate was 69·7. I will not go into comparisons between that and what the results were under other systems of administration, but clearly I would ask you if in view of those facts you would adhere to the opinion that in the majority of cases after the first meeting nothing more was heard of the transaction?—I certainly adhere to that statement, which represents my experience at the time, and I would suggest, with great respect, that the figures you have quoted do not bear on the point at all. What those figures show is that in those few cases in which every creditor was willing to sign the deed of assignment there was a realisation in excess of what had been obtained by official administration under the Act. I should say that that is a matter of course; the cases must be the cream of the cases—cases where all the creditors knew all the circumstances and were willing to sign such a deed. But those would be the cream of the cases, and I have no doubt that you would get a much larger proportion of realisation in those cases than in the cases that come before the Official Receivers in bankruptcy. When I said a small proportion I agree that it was likely to be misleading, because the bulk of the cases that one got under the Act of 1869 were those of small debtors who wanted to get whitewashed and where there were probably very few assets; but it is the fact that only in the small proportion did one hear of them again.

1610. I do not wish to influence your judgment?—No, I am very glad that you put it to me, because it is a very important point, and I did consider those figures. You remember that the Inspector-General makes a report each year, and in the first two or three years after the Act of 1883 was passed he dealt with that point. I read the figures with considerable care, and I noticed the point that you are calling attention to now. It was so.

1611. It was so marked?—It was so marked.

1612. Then I would just like to correct you when you say that in this one year—I could take any one year—that all the creditors had assented. In that particular case the Board of Trade returns show that the payments in full to creditors not entitled to preference in bankruptcy was £19,487. That is to say, the assenting creditors had to buy up non-assenting creditors in order that the deed should go through. That possibly was not in your mind, because you said that in those cases I mentioned all the creditors had assented?—Whether they were brought up or not in some way their assent was procured.

1613. At some cost?—Possibly at some cost.

1614. Is it your view that under no circumstances should a deed of assignment go through, even if all the creditors assented?—I do not want to alter the present law. Under the present law if all the creditors assent no one can say anything at all if the creditors choose to do so, and I do not think you should go behind that.

1615. You are not in favour of a majority of any amount binding a minority?—Not till after investigation. I say that there should be investigation by an independent authority.

1616. I am sorry I misunderstood your previous remark then?—I perhaps did not say that, but I intended to say it.

1617. With regard to books, that is a very vexed question, but I would ask you whether in any legislation a clause might not be incorporated that every trader at least should keep an account of his receipts and payments?—Yes.

1618. You think that that would be reasonable?—Perfectly reasonable.

1619. And not difficult?—Not at all difficult.

1620. Have you found in your experience that traders fail to keep an account of their receipts and payments?—Yes, they nearly all of them make a pretence of doing that, but over and over again they get weary of doing it, and do not continue them. The book produced is generally a book which contains partial receipts and partial payments, in which the debtor very rarely puts down borrowed money, and makes but a very imperfect compliance with even such a modified dem nd as you are suggesting.

1621. In the case of a small trader with a minimum of education he could at any rate keep an account of his receipts and payments if he chose to do so ?—I have no doubt of it.

1622. I understood you to say that you would not make it compulsory, in the first case at any rate, for a man to keep ledgers and journals, but you would require him to keep receipts and payments at least as the minimum of what he should do ?—Yes, as a minimum, and I should make it criminal if he did not do it on the second occasion. On the first occasion I should make it a matter for the court to observe upon, and possibly to make it a subject for suspending his discharge.

1623. And you would have a clause inserted that it would be a serious offence if they did not keep these, although not a criminal offence ?—Quite so.

1625. Would you think it prudent that the act of bankruptcy in respect of a deed only should be limited to a less period than three months ?—I understand the difficulty, and I frequently come across it, but I am not prepared to make a recommendation for lessening the period. It is not a very long time in which the parties may get notice of what is going on and make up their minds. Although during those three months everything is held up, I think on the whole it is the lesser evil of the two. There are some very strong arguments in favour of lessening the period, but on the whole I am not satisfied that it ought to be lessened.

1626. (Mr. Addison.) With regard to discharge, do you think it desirable that the Court should have a wider discretion in the granting of discharge than it has under the present Act ? It is now fettered by some very strict rules ?—I should not have the slightest doubt that the court ought to have the widest discretion if one had not seen how they acted ; but the difficulty is that judges are very merciful ; as you know, for instance, in the matter of suspension at one time they could suspend for such time as they thought fit, and suspensions were so absurdly short—six months, I think, was the usual average time of a suspension—and the penalty was so slight that I should not be in favour of that wider discretion. In theory I entirely agree with what you say, and I cannot imagine why the courts should not have that discretion, except that they will not exercise it in the direction desired.

1627. Of course you know where an offence has been committed under the Debtors' Act of 1869 the discharge must be absolutely refused ?—Yes.

1628. I understand you do not like the large number of undischarged bankrupts who are let loose in the world ? —I do not.

1629. I see by some figures that I have before me that not down to quite the latest date, but in the 22nd Report of the Inspector-General, there were 89,583 adjudications, and only 19,136 applications for discharge ?—Yes.

1630. That means at least 70,000 undischarged bankrupts who have been described by previous witnesses as a danger ?—Yes.

1631. Do you agree, as some of us do, that men in that condition are a danger to society and to other business men in their relation to property, and in the arrangements which they make, and in relation to the difficulties they may cause ?—Quite.

1632. That of course brings one to the other point, whether in lieu of this number of undischarged bankrupts any other scheme adequately dealing with wrongdoers or defaulting bankrupts can be suggested. In the case of a criminal you punish him, and at the end of his punishment—long or short—he is a free man ?—Yes.

1633. The undischarged bankrupt may remain all his days an undischarged bankrupt ?—Yes.

1634. There are two ways in which you might deal with an offender, as you may call him, the one would be to touch his pocket and the other his person ?—Yes.

1635. Money cannot be got immediately out of him, but if he has none would you approve of giving him his discharge as a rule, subject to his setting aside a certain portion of his future earnings ?—I think that is a very valuable provision. The reason at present why there are 70,000 undischarged bankrupts is because they have not applied for their discharge. If the suggestion I made were adopted, and a decision were given as to discharge in every case, that number would be very much diminished, because no one can suggest that the other three-fourths who do not apply for their discharges would have them refused outright. They would get their discharge subject to certain punishments, and that in itself would much lessen the number. That was an interruption on my part, but I agree that the provision which enables the court to declare that a certain proportion of future earnings shall be set aside is a very valuable one. The judges have rather gone against that, saying that that should not be imposed unless there is a reasonable ground for supposing that a man is going to get something ?

1636. I quite realise the difficulty about the delay and the expense in the proceedings that have to be taken ?—Yes.

1637. Some of the witnesses and some of the public bodies think that for a man to be sentenced by the court which is investigating and has the conduct of his affairs is undesirable, and might lead to the impression that he did not get justice done to him. That is to say, under the Bankruptcy Act the court might have to order a prosecution and it would be a little difficult for the court that ordered the prosecution to be the court to try the offender ?—My suggestion is not that the court should order the prosecution, but that when the sitting was held at which the conduct of the bankrupt was considered with a view to his discharge the Court should consider any conduct of his also with a view to a criminal charge, and should have an opportunity of dealing with the matter with a jury if the debtor so desired. I think that where an allegation dealing with a criminal offence was made the court whose registrar had listened to the public examination should have power to entertain the prosecution. I do not think that because the examination had taken place in his court that that should be a reason for any suggestion that justice as dispensed by the judge should be thought to be tainted.

1638. Have you seen the report of the Law Society on that point ?—No.

1639. Let me read it to you : "The Council are unable to agree that the court exercising jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Acts should have power to inflict punishment or to impose disabilities. In the case of crimes or offences against the existing bankrupt law (i.e., against the Debtors Act, 1869) in all of which fraud is an ingredient, the council think it desirable that the trial of a person accused of such offences should, as at present, take place before a tribunal independent of and distinct from a court having bankruptcy jurisdiction " ?—I do not quite follow and I do not quite understand why. However, I do not want to ask you questions, and I beg your pardon.

1640. On the same principle that the trial of persons for a criminal offence should as far as possible be separated from anyone possibly concerned or interested in the matter ?—I understand that it would be very unfair that the Official Receiver should try a man, because it is his interest to find an offence ; but the court has no interest at all in the matter and no bias, and very often, I should think, would do the man more justice because the man who had been before the court in his bankruptcy would be more likely to give a less bad impression than a man brought up on a purely criminal charge. You are always biassed against a man brought up on a purely criminal charge.

1641. The suggestion made is that the Official Receiver is a person who is always about the court and in close contact with the court and more or less accredited to the court, and that where he reports conduct of a kind liable to punishment against a debtor that would have an influence on the mind of the court ?—I see what you mean, and I have not seen before how the court was likely to be biassed. You think that the prosecution would be in a position of inequality and of preference in such a case.

1642. That is what is suggested. I am not making any suggestion against Official Receivers?—That should be considered, because obviously the Official Receiver has great weight with the court, but I do not think when the court was considering the question of imposing a criminal penalty against a man that it would have any undue weight against the debtor.

1643. Would it not be a more speedy and a cheaper form of punishment provided that it be not unfair ?—Yes, provided that it be not unfair.

1644. About hire-purchase agreements, the preamble to the Bills of Sale Act to which you refer, I take it, applies to a man out of his own goods preferring one creditor to others. I think that is how I read it. It did not apply to goods which were not the man's own. I think if you read it you will find that it talks about a man preferring one man to his other creditors. "Whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the grantees or holders of such Bills of Sale have the power of taking possession of the property of such persons, to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors." There it is presumed that the grantee was a creditor ?—Yes.

1645. Do you think that really applies to the case of a person selling goods ?—It does not seem to me that it makes any difference whether the goods were originally in possession of the owner who lets them on hire or were originally in the position of the debtor who gives a bill of sale to someone else.

1646. I must ask you one or two more questions—do you agree that the doctrine of order and disposition or reputed ownership has in the course of years past been gradually restricted and cut down ?—Yes.

1647. By judicial decision and otherwise by statutory enactment ?—Yes.

1648. You are proposing, I think, very much to extend it ?—No, Mr. Marshall, the president of our association, will come and propose it next week.

1649. Pardon me, if these hiring agreements are registered you do extend order and disposition to them ?—We have always taken a distinction between order and disposition which is applied in case of bankruptcy and apparent possession which is applied in bills of sale. It is the apparent possession doctrine that I am desirous to extend, and not the order and disposition doctrine.

1650. My point is that you would make other people', goods which are in the bankrupt's possession under these hiring agreements divisible among his creditors ?—Yes, bue not under the order and disposition clause, because under that clause you have no power of avoiding its operationr and making the document good by registration as you can under the apparent possession clause in the Bills of Sale Act where registration gives perfect protection.

1651. Your point is not in connection with the large trading class ?—I quite agree.

1652. Are you aware that it is the custom now for goods to be supplied on credit on an immensely large scale ?—Yes.

1653. As has been suggested by Mr. Peat, under all kinds of agreements with regard to waggons, agricultural implements, and so forth ?—Yes, I am aware of it, but I am not aware of it in cases that have actually come before me.

1654. And taking even the furniture in a house, do you really think that a man gets credit because he lives in a furnished house ?—I am quite sure of it.

1655. Ought not anybody who is so foolish as to trust a man because he lives in a furnished house to suffer the penalty of his folly. It may be the man's grandmother's furniture, or it may be furniture which he has hired—it may be a furnished house, or there may be fifty other reasons why the furniture is not his ?—Directly a bill of sale is registered every creditor sends in his bill at once and insists on payment, and every tradesman is careful about giving credit to a man who has negotiated a bill of sale. Even a marriage settlement I have had registered, and in that case everyone sent in his claim.

1656. I should have thought that the number of people who lived in furnished houses now was almost as great as those who lived in unfurnished houses ?—Tradesmen inquire wherever they can. Brighton is a place where that does apply, and whether a man is living in his own house or not the traders make all kinds of inquiries. There is a certain Trade Protection Society called Stubbs", and frequently I have had cases in which there has been a report by Stubbs' agent as to what occurs. In those reports he says that the man is living in such and such a house ; it is not a furnished house, and apparently he has got furniture there of his own, and that is an important consideration with the tradesman as to whether he will trust persons with credit or not. It may be foolish on their part to do so, but it is an extensive practice.

1657. In Brighton ?—I have no experience outside Brighton, except that which I have gained by reading.

1658. Then I must pass that by. With regard to deeds of arrangement do you approve the making deeds of arrangement assented to by a certain majority—no matter what, but I mean a sufficient majority—being made binding on a minority with the sanction of the court, and upon such investigation and inquiry as the court thought fit ?—Yes.

1659. Mr. Smith, I know, suggests after notice to the Official Receiver of the application ?—I think the inquiry should be made by some independent person and the Official Receiver is supposed to be independent.

1660. Do you find that it is sometimes the case where the trade creditors are desirous that a deed should be carried out, it is put in jeopardy by some person standing out and causing trouble—some one creditor ?—Yes, that frequently happens.

1661. And therefore the wishes of the majority of trade and other creditors are frustrated by the one man or by two men ?—That is often the case, but I suggest that that is in the interests of public morality.

1662. Your difficulty on the ground of public morality would be obviated if the matter was brought before the Court to inquire into the circumstances, and to do what was right ?—Quite, I have nothing to say against that at all.

1663. Have you anything to say on the subject of proxies—do you think that the present restriction of proxies might safely be modified ?—I think they are troublesome, but I have never been brought into contact with them—I never see a proxy now.

1664. (Sir E. W. Fithian.) With regard to hiring agreements, I take it that you are strongly in favour of their registration ?—Yes.

1665. On account of your experience at Brighton ?—Yes.

1666. If it can be shown, as has been intimated to-day, that hiring agreements are dealt with largely in regard to machinery and other operations of trade, would not that rather increase the necessity, in the interest of traders generally for registration ?—What my opinion on that point is, would not be worth more than anybody else's, because I have had no personal experience, but I should think it was a great evil, and before giving an opinion I should like to know how far really desirable trade would be upset by such an arrangement with regard to this big machinery question.

1667. I might for instance, just mention one case—a case of this kind. It is not unusual now for almost the whole of the machinery of a mill—of a large mill—to be got upon a hiring agreement. Would you not think in a case like that that it would be rather important that the traders should be aware of that fact ?—It seems to me that that would be just a similar case to that of furniture on the strength of having which the man had got credit.

1668. Only increased in importance by the fact of it representing large trade interests ?—It seems so as you put it.

1669. Now with regard to the matter of an undischarged bankrupt, the large number is due to the fact that the bankrupt himself never applies for his discharge ?—Certainly.

1670. I suppose that if the bankrupt were anxious to obtain his discharge, he could always apply ?—Yes.

1671. The presumption is that he is not very anxious for it ?—Apparently.

1672. Or that he has committed offences which might probably result in his being punished under the Debtors'

Act ?—Yes, or at any rate his discharge being suspended, or his being brought into some notoriety by a public application.

1673. Your view, I take it, would be in favour of a suggestion which was made by the Associated Chambers of Commerce that it is desirable to supplement the present system of application for discharge in bankruptcy by providing that the Official Receiver in England and the Accountant in Bankruptcy in Scotland shall within six months, or within such extended time as the Court shall allow after the public examination, present a Report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and that if after such Report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court shall be empowered to inflict such punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient ?—It is not quite the machinery I was suggesting, but in substance it is that there should be the necessary pronouncement by the Court on the bankrupt's conduct as incidental to the consideration of his discharge.

1674. And that the Court should have summary powers to deal with it ?—Certainly.

1675. In order to ensure certainty and promptitude in regard to punishment ?—Certainly.

1676. You think that that would have a deterrent influence on the action of debtors ?—I think so.

1677. It is not the amount of punishment that you consider important so much as the question of certainty ?—Certainly.

1678. The penalty following on the pronouncement of the Court ?—Yes, I should not consider so much the question of penalty or the question of increasing it, but the question of making it more certain.

1679A. Then as to the assignment of book debts, the practice has grown up very largely in manufacturing centres, that debtors assign, generally to a banker, the whole of their ordinary trade debts, with the result that the trade creditors in the event of bankruptcy are deprived of the advantage which they have naturally anticipated of being able to call upon the book debts as part of the assets of the concern. Do you think that in those cases there should be a registration of assignments ?—I do not like to say. The practice is quite new to me—I had not even heard of it before. I was speaking of Brighton, and I would rather not give an opinion about it.

1680. (Mr. Smith.) Would you approve of a provision somewhat to the effect of the clause in the Debtors' Act of Scotland—you are not familiar with it probably, and I shall read it to you: "A debtor who, at the date of a presentation of a petition for sequestration or cessio is indebted to an amount exceeding £200, and has not for three years next before such date kept such books or accounts as according to the usual course of any trade or business in which he may have been engaged are necessary to exhibit or explain his transactions, is deemed guilty of a crime and an offence unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he had no intent to defraud, and on conviction before the Court of Justiciary, or before the sheriff and a jury, may be imprisoned for two years, or by the sheriff without a jury for sixty days." Do you think that that would meet the difficulty which is suggested with regard to the kind of books that a debtor should keep, and that definition should be substituted for the one in the Act ?—Yes, I do not think it goes far enough. It should be more specific. I think it would really help not merely the court and the creditors but the small debtors who want to know what books they ought to keep.

1681. I think there is a provision in the French law—I am not quite sure about it—by which a debtor is obliged to make out an annual statement of his assets and liabilities ?—Yes.

1682. Do you think that a statement of that sort would be sufficient ?—It has been held that keeping books involves an annual or a periodical account.

1683. It involves keeping a record of transactions, but it is so difficult to define what should be the set of books which a bankrupt should keep, and which would be applicable to all trades, that it is scarcely possible to find a definition which would be satisfactory in general ?—I am suggesting that a minimum should be prescribed.

1684. For instance, that he should be obliged every year to make out an accurate statement of his property ?—No, that is not sufficient. He could not do that unless he was aware, by keeping accounts from day to day, of what his receipts and payments were.

1685. He would find it necessary to do that ?—Yes, but I think you ought to tell him that, because the more explicit you are the better.

1686. I wish to ask you about the matter of public examinations. Are you satisfied with the manner in which public examinations generally are conducted at present ?—As far as my experience goes.

1687. That they tend to elicit all the important facts in bankruptcy ?—Yes.

1688. Do you think that they ever or frequently elicit frauds which were previously unknown to the Official Receiver who has been investigating ? Are there frequent cases where frauds are brought to light in the course of the public examination which had not previously been found out by the Official Receiver ?—They are not frequent, but they have occasionally occurred. All creditors have the right of publicly examining, and not unfrequently, certainly occasionally, someone comes forward with a question which puts the Official Receiver on a track which he did not know of before.

1689. I am thinking of what you say with regard to deeds of arrangements, and the fact of frauds occurring. After the deed has been entered into would a preliminary examination by the Official Receiver, for instance, into the debtor's circumstances where he proposed a deed of arrangement, be a sufficient security that gross frauds at least would be brought to light ?—I have no doubt that it would be some protection. On the other hand I have no doubt that a public examination elicits some frauds that were unknown before. The bankrupt hesitates to say in public, where anyone can hear the lie, that which he has told the Official Receiver in his own room, where there was no chance of detecting it ; and that has occurred more than once in my own experience.

1690. You would not be in favour of allowing a dispensing power as regards public examinations in cases where the Official Receiver did not think it was necessary for the purpose of eliciting evidence as to frauds ?—Yes, I am in favour of a dispensing power if you ask me ; though as to whether it is equally effective I do not think it is.

1691. Complaints are made that in a large number of instances a debtor has to undergo the so-called stigma of a bankruptcy examination. Do you think that that could be avoided by giving the Official Receiver and the creditors power at an earlier stage of the proceedings by private investigation to satisfy themselves that there was no advantage to be gained by a public examination ?—Yes, I think that that might very fairly be introduced, but I would suggest—possibly with the desire of magnifying my office—that the examination should take place in the presence of someone who is allowed to decide what questions should be put if the majority of the creditors and the Official Receiver should so desire, and that the examination, instead of being a public examination, should be a private examination.

27 June, 1906.

1692. Then with regard to the discharge, I gather from what you have said that you would practically be in favour of four courses being adopted—that every debtor should come up, and that the question of his discharge should be considered in every case, and that four courses should be open to the court—(1) Either to grant a free discharge right away, or (2) to grant it subject to conditions as at present. You would not disturb those ?—No.

1693. And (3) to order prosecution by the Public Prosecutor as at present ?—Yes, as an alternative.

1694. And (4) to provide a summary method by which the bankruptcy judge could deal with comparatively minor criminal offences ?—Yes.

1695. I should like to ask this question. You said the Court makes the order for a prosecution of a bankrupt who has committed fraud, and that is carried out by the Public Prosecutor ?—Yes.

1696. Do you know of any cases in which he does not carry it out where an order has been made—have you had any experience of such cases ?—I am afraid of giving evidence. I have in my own mind an impression that we have been told once or twice afterwards that the Public Prosecutor has refused to prosecute, but I should not know it officially. I know nothing of what happens after the judge has made his order for prosecution. I am only going on what someone has told me, that the order was not acted on.

1697. You do not know, I suppose, whether any considerable delay takes place in the Public Prosecutor making up his mind ?—I have heard of complaints.

1698. Have you heard of many complaints about delay ?—I cannot say of many complaints. Prosecutions are not frequent, you know, and the complaints would be still less frequent.

1699. But if there were considerable difficulties in carrying out prosecutions that would lead to fewer prosecutions ?—Certainly.

1700. You have had experience extending back to the Act of 1869. Can you express any opinion as to whether the number of large commercial bankruptcies has diminished under the present Act ?—Brighton is not a commercial town, but the impression on my mind is that it has diminished.

1701. So that even in cases where a criminal offence has not been committed, but where irregularity has led to bankruptcy, it would still be desirable to retain the power of suspending, and of exercising the power of suspending, the debtors' discharge ?—I think so.

1702. It has been suggested before this Committee that it would be better to get rid of the large number of undischarged bankrupts by granting a discharge in every case without fixing any criminal offence. You think that would not meet the case ?—No, I sympathise with the desire that has been expressed, but still think that there is some virtue in suspension though I do not think it goes so far as it ought to do.

1703. With regard to deeds of arrangement, I understand your remark about small estates being practically squandered away to refer rather to your experience under the Act of 1869 ?—Entirely.

1704. You were not speaking of your experience under the present Act ?—Not in the slightest degree. I was not practising at all under the present Act. I have been registrar all the time under the present Act.

1706. That is the reason why estates wound up under deeds of arrangement are of a superior character than those which are dealt with under the liquidation clause ?—I think that is a very plausible explanation.

1708. With regard to the question of the act of bankruptcy committed in executing a deed of arrangement for a period of three months, supposing a shorter period were suggested, and it was accompanied by a proviso that notice should be given to every person in the debtors' list, if such notice were given to all the creditors intimating to them that it would be binding on all creditors unless they took proceedings within a certain date, do you think that that would facilitate the shortening of the period to a month or two months or six weeks ?—Yes, I think it would.

1709. It would enable everyone to have an opportunity of forming his judgment and compelling him to do it quickly and so shorten the proceedings ?—Yes, I agree with what Mr. Addison said as to the inconvenience of the present system.

1710. One question with regard to prosecutions. You suggested that the debtor might ask for a jury. Would not that be inconvenient and expensive ?—It would be rather inconvenient but not very expensive. It would, however, meet the difficulty which might arise from a man being imprisoned without the right of being tried by a jury.

1711. Have you considered the matter of assessors sitting with a judge ?—I have not considered it, but I do not think it would be a good thing.

1712. Reference has been made to the not quite independent position of the judge in dealing with a matter of that kind. Is it not a fact that all the preliminary proceedings are before the registrar, so that the judge comes to it with a fresh mind ?—Yes.

1713. And you see no objection to the judge dealing with matters of the kind provided he is limited to imposing a short term of imprisonment ?—Not the slightest.

1714. You do not deal with the question of competing claims in successive bankruptcies. Have you formed any opinion as to the right of the first trustee to the assets where a second bankruptcy has occurred ?—No, it is a most troublesome question, but I have not put it down as one of the matters on which I am prepared to give evidence.

1715. (Chairman.) Mr. Smith has referred to the provisions of the Scotch Act of Parliament about defining what is meant by keeping proper books of account. We have had a memorandum from one large Scotch body suggesting that these words might do—"If he has not kept such books of account as are necessary to exhibit and explain the whole transaction of his trading or business"—that that should make it a criminal offence. I gather you think one ought to tell him what he ought to do ?—Yes, it seems absurd, but I think so. That is slightly simpler than the English form, but I still think it would be misunderstood by some small traders.

1716. I gather you would rather propose for the purposes of practical legislation that after the bankrupt had passed his final examination, the Court should appoint a sitting for the purpose of considering the question of his discharge ?—Yes.

1717. And the Report of the Official Receiver should be before it ?—Yes.

1718. Mr. Addison pointed out to you that the Court are under the Act of 1883 bound to refuse the application for discharge if the debtor has committed any misdemeanour punishable under the Debtors' Act, but I daresay you remember the case of re Solomons, decided about eighteen months ago, in which the Court practically drove a coach and six through that Act, and said for special reasons, including the good conduct of the debtor since his bankruptcy, they might grant a discharge none the less.

1719. (Witness.) Might I add one word on one point ?

1720. (Chairman.) I think I forgot to ask you with regard to the last part of your memorandum; but perhaps you could tell us what you were going to say ?—I was only going to say that I thought pains ought to be taken to make it clear to trustees when they are paid by commission that they have got to do all the work that a trustee ought to do. I have noticed that whatever they can save themselves from doing in their own behalf, being human, they do, and the result is that very often they make the solicitor call the meeting of the creditors and do the whole collection of the book debts, and things that I think ought to be fairly covered by the trustee. Any remuneration he receives, you see, is by way of commission, and the tendency for everyone when paid by commission is to do as little as he can, and I think it should be made perfectly clear that it is the trustee's duty to do everything that falls within the ordinary work of realising the estate.

1721. (Mr. Addison.) Is not that part of his duty at present ?—The trustee takes a general sanction from the Committee of Inspection to employ a solicitor to do several things which it is found by experience it is convenient to throw on the solicitor. Therefore, he takes explicit sanction that he should be at liberty to employ a solicitor to do various things, and it has become the form to do that, but I suggest that it should be made clear that things the trustee should reasonably do he should be called upon to do. Two other Registrars beg me to point that out to the Committee—Registrars of large Courts—so that I am partly discharging their wishes as well as giving my experience in mentioning that.

1722. (Mr. Smith.) I am under the impression that the Board of Trade invariably disallow charges incurred for employing solicitors for doing work which it is the trustee's duty to do ?—I have taxed a great many bills of solicitors in which they have called meetings and drawn affidavits, and written to all the creditors, all of which I think are things which the trustee ought to do. I cannot tell what happens afterwards, but certainly I have done that very frequently.

Mr. A. O. Jennings. 27 June, 1906

1723. It is part of the routine of the audit department of the Board of Trade to look into that question. The Official Receivers are now deprived of the power of attending on taxation which was at one time the practice, and they have, of course, no remedy ?—I would suggest that, and I think if that is being considered the whole question of costs—which are very inelastic—is also worthy of consideration, and the Law Society might consider it. For instance, I may refer to the question of collection of debts, that the only scale of costs known to the Court is the scale for attendances and letters, which is most inappropriate to the work that the solicitor does. In collecting debts the solicitor does not charge his private client so much for every attendance on the debtor, or for every letter, but it is usually by way of commission or something of that kind, but when I have to tax a Bill in bankruptcy, I have to use that form of charging for attendances and letters which is sometimes hard on the solicitor, and in any event does not represent the work that is done in collecting debts.

1724. Would you suggest that the Official Receiver should attend on taxation, and that the law as it at present stands, should be altered ?—Yes.

JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. THOMAS MARSHALL, called; and Examined.

1725. (Chairman.) I think you have been for a very long time the registrar of the Leeds County Court ?—Yes, I have been registrar for over forty years I am sorry to say.

1726. I think you are President of the County Court Registrars' Association ?—I am.

1727. I think you have considered the terms of our Order of Reference ?—Yes, I have.

1728. And in reference to the first of them whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment—with regard to the first branch of that question, the question is whether in your opinion those laws should be amended so as to make them more stringent; and the second branch of the question is whether the conduct of a debtor should in every case be brought before the court for consideration as was the case under the Act of 1861 ?—Yes.

Mr. Thomas Marshall. 4 July, 1906.

1729. What are your views upon that ?—I make a distinction between the investigation by the court of a debtor's conduct and the consideration of it. I gather that what is meant by those two words is that the Committee wish to know whether the debtor's conduct is sufficiently investigated at the public examination, when it is gone into as we all know by the Official Receiver; and what I understand is meant by the consideration of his conduct is the consideration of it by the Judge on his application for a discharge. I therefore distinguish between those two branches, and with regard to the first, I think that the debtor's conduct is sufficiently investigated by the Official Receivers on the public examination. The Official Receivers, so far as my experience of them goes, go into the matter pretty thoroughly, and I think it is one of the very best parts of the present Act that that has to be done in all cases, and it is done on the whole very efficiently under the present system, I do not think, therefore, that any alteration of the law with regard to the investigation of his conduct is necessary. With regard to the consideration of it, that is a very different matter, because where there is no adjudication the bankrupt does not apply for a discharge. I do not see what could be gained by requiring his conduct to be considered in that case. Supposing his conduct outside Clause 3 of the 8th Section of the Act of 1890 were unsatisfactory. Supposing, for example, that he had not attended the official receiver, or the trustee, or had not taken trouble to give them the information which the Act requires him to do, that would be a case of unsatisfactory conduct. Unless the man applies for a discharge how is it to be visited? The court could, of course, read him a lecture, which, I conceive, he would pay very little attention to, and unless the Committee is prepared to recommend some punishment outside the Bankruptcy Act, unless they are prepared to make it a misdemeanour, I do not quite see what would be gained by requiring a bankrupt, who does not want a discharge, and who does not care for one, to come up to be lectured by the court upon his conduct.

1730. It has been suggested to us that it is a great evil that about 80 per cent. of the bankrupts are undischarged and never apply, and that it would be useful if every bankrupt, after a certain period, had to have his conduct with reference to discharge considered, and dealt with, whether he pleased or not?—Yes, but what is the use of considering a man's conduct unless you can give effect to that consideration by doing something? You cannot suspend his discharge, because he does not ask for it, and what is the use of considering it unless you can make your consideration effective? It is just like going to church and hearing a sermon. You hear the sermon, but nothing is done and nothing comes of it.

1731. But under the Act of 1861 the court appointed a sitting for considering the bankrupt's conduct, and then suspended his discharge: or refused it and so on, if it thought necessary. It was a certificate, and in those days, whether he had applied for it or not, the court adjudicated upon it?—Yes, but with what result?

1732. With the result that every bankrupt's position was the subject of adjudication by the court without reference to his applying for discharge?—Under the Act of 1849 I think I am right in saying the Public Examination of a bankrupt, which included, of course, a consideration of his conduct, was done by the judge. At present it is done by the registrar and not by the judge. What is in the mind of the Committee, as far as I gather, is leaving the examination into the man's conduct as at present to be conducted by the Official Receiver under the presidency and in the presence of the registrar, and then you suggest that whether he wants a discharge or not he shall be brought up before the judge, his public examination having been concluded. In the first place, supposing he does not come up, are you prepared to arrest him? If he does come and the judge says, "Your conduct has been very bad. I see you have been living extravagantly, you have not been giving the assistance which you ought to give to the Official Receiver," and so on, what is to be done? It would be like reading a man a lecture or preaching him a sermon which he would not care one straw about, unless, indeed, you are prepared to make it a misdemeanour. Then you are landed in this difficulty, that I doubt very much, and think everybody doubts very much, whether Parliament would consent to make that a misdemeanour in the case of a man who does not ask for his discharge, which is not a misdemeanour if he does; and if he has been living extravagantly and his conduct has been bad, all the judge can do is to refuse or suspend discharge or attach conditions to his discharge; but you cannot say that if a man does not ask for his discharge you can put him in prison, and if he does ask for it he can only be punished civilly—at least I suggest so for your better judgment.

1733. I am only putting what other people have put here. Would it commend itself to you that the court should have power to pronounce upon a man's discharge, namely, as to whether he was to have it or be suspended, or to have a money order made against him, whether he applied or not?—No, certainly not. I think it would be perfectly useless. I do not see how any good could come of it at all, unless you are prepared to enforce it. A man does not mind being lectured.

1734. Then, rather akin to that question, but in a different branch of it, is the second question—whether the provisions of the law relating to the discharge and the conditions on which it should be granted, refused, or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as to check recklessness, improper trading, and neglect of traders to keep proper books and accounts?—I think at present, as far as my knowledge and experience go, that the provisions with regard to discharge, on paper, are stringent enough, but I do not think that county court judges give all the effect which they might to the offences mentioned in sub-section 3 of section 8. If they could be tuned up to the point of giving the effect which I personally think ought to be given to that sub-section. I do not think anything farther would be required. I take the common case of a man keeping no books at all or keeping imperfect books. That is, in my view, the most serious offence against the Bankruptcy law which a man can commit, because he withdraws from the consideration of his creditors the whole of his conduct. He can lay nest eggs, and he does lay nest eggs, with impunity. Nobody can trace anything if a man keeps no books. Now, if I were a county court judge, in the case of a trader, other than a perfectly ignorant trader, I would visit that in the severest way. As probably every member of the Committee knows, by the law of France, and I think by the law of all countries which is derived from the Roman Civil law, it is an offence in a citizen, if he trades and does not keep books, and he is bound by law to do so, and I think an Englishman ought to be in exactly the same position. Many judges look upon it as a very venial offence. They say: "This man is an ignorant man, he has not kept his books," and they pay little or no attention to it. If a man chooses to trade, then I think he ought to be obliged to keep such books as will enable his transactions to be followed. He may keep his accounts in his head as long as he pays 20s. in the pound, but directly he is in the position of a bankrupt he ought to be punished for doing that, and I think it might well be made a misdemeanour.

1735. Have you anything to say on the offence also of trading with knowledge of insolvency. Do you think that that also is sufficiently dealt with under the present Act?—If you will allow me, I will put that afterwards. The next important offence is extravagant living, and that is, next to, and perhaps equal with the offence of not keeping books, a most common offence. Now I have just taken out for the information of the Committee at haphazard some figures, as follows:—

* For one year only. † For three years. ‡ For seventeen months.

This day week I was sitting taking the public examination of bankrupts at Leeds, and there were fifteen bankrupts before me, and of those fifteen ten made no profit at all. There were some who began with estimated net assets, the estimated net assets being scarcely ever realised; but I deduct them. Deducting those sums from what appears by the bankrupt's statement to be his net profit—I shall leave the paper with you if you will allow me. In ten cases the man makes absolutely nothing; in seven of those ten cases he makes a loss which varies from £19 to £1,200, and yet in all these cases the debtor manages to live by his business. He says, "I estimate my property when I began doing business of this kind to have been so much, and my trade losses at so much," and I say that out of fifteen cases which I examined this day week, in ten cases the man had no profits at all, and was living at the expense of his creditors, and in seven out of the ten, not only had he made no profits, but he had made losses averaging from £19 in the lowest case to £1,200 in the highest case. In one case, which is marked in this list as No. 50, although the debtor made nothing at all he spent £208 on his living; in another case noted in my list as No. 63 he lost £101, and yet he spent £416; in another case noted as No. 45 he made £30 and he spent no less than £421.

1736. (Mr. Smith.) Was that for a year?—For two years. I have taken those cases at haphazard. I sit twice a month, and it is half a months' work in one court, and those are the results, and yet if we look at the official returns we shall find that the cases in which that is visited with the punishment the Act permits are comparatively small in number. At page 14 of the Board of Trade's Report for last year you find that of 3,522 cases which are dealt with, and which were wound up by the Official Receiver in the year 1904, only 134 cases were reported as cases of extravagant living. The figures are perfectly incomprehensible to me. My experience would lead me to suppose that they ought to be very greatly augmented and that effect is not given to the Act. It may not be the fault of the Official Receiver. In the other case—the case of not keeping accounts—out of the same number of 3,522 cases wound up in 1904 by the Official Receiver there were 434 cases reported. Those figures may be all right. I will only say that they surprise me and they lead me to what I originally said——

1737. (Mr. Smith.) That is out of the total number of cases in which application is made for discharge, not the total number of receiving orders?—It is quite true.

1738. The proportion you might see is very much larger?—But the observation that nobody does attend to apply for his discharge still holds good.

1739. Do you put forward the figures as the percentage of the total number of cases?—Yes. I should say that in cases where the man does not apply for a discharge it is an a fortiori case if those were examined from the point of view of the bankruptcy law.

1740. It would be worse?—Very much worse.

1741. But the suggestion involved the possibility of its being the Official Receiver's fault?—No; I did not make that suggestion at all; I think it is just as likely to be the judge's fault.

1742. It is the fault of the Act; this paragraph only deals with a limited number of cases—634 cases, it does not touch others?—It does not touch others. So far as the Act only provides this as a punishment in cases where a man comes up for his discharge it is the fault of the Act

1743. (Mr. Smith.) I beg your pardon for interrupting you?—No, it was a very material interruption indeed.

1744. (Chairman.) That brings us to this. Would you make the not keeping of proper books and the extravagance of living contributing to bankruptcy, and the trading with knowledge of insolvency, punishable?—I say nothing about trading with knowledge, but as to the other two, if you could screw Parliament up to do it, I think it would be a very good thing, but I am afraid you will not be able to screw Parliament up to do it.

1745. If you punish would you make it a punishment by the Bankruptcy Court as under the Act of 1861?—No; I think it would be almost impossible to get Parliament to give to the county court sitting in bankruptcy the power of imprisonment, and that of course makes the suggestion rather an ideal one. I do not for a moment think that anything can be done. There would be the question of expense for one thing. Parliament would say: "What an enormous amount of expense you will throw upon the public." However, if it could be done it would be a good thing, but I think it is hopeless. I think it would be still more hopeless to propose that the courts of bankruptcy should have the jurisdiction.

1746. (Chairman.) They have it in Scotland?—They have not got it now—they used to have it.

1747. I think they have it still in Scotland.—I beg your pardon, in Scotland?

1748. I mean that it should be given by Parliament?—That may be; I do not know.

1749. But should you think it a good thing supposing one could screw Parliament up to give it?—I think those two offences which I have mentioned, which are exceedingly common, and which can scarcely be committed, I think, without a fraudulent intent, are cases which ought to be punished as misdemeanour. Of course the punishment would be small, but still a man might have three months in the second division, or something of that kind, and I think it would be a deterrent. A suggestion has been made which, I confess, I do not agree to, that that should be done on the second time of bankruptcy. I do not see why a man should have one free bite at his creditors like a dog. I would make it for the first time. To say, "We will only make it punishable the second time" encourages him to do it once, and puts him exactly in the same position as a dog who has one free bite at the public.

1750. I think it was put on this view, that the first time he might say that he did not know what books to keep, but that he could not say that on the second time?—He might easily say it, but I do not think anybody would believe him.

1751. Do you think that a definition of what books should be kept should be given?—I do not think you can define it better than by saying that there must be such books as will enable a man of ordinary intelligence to trace the bankruptcy transactions. Of course we know these small shopkeepers keep a ledger which they make to act as a cash book. An accountant laughs at that, but in the case of small traders, if I were a county court judge administering the Act, I should not take the accountant's view. I should say "This is not proper accountancy, but we can fairly make out who your creditors are and what you have done. You have put everything in one book but still it enables us to see what you have been doing." But the mischief is that they do not keep books at all or they keep a set of books that are so badly kept as to be worth nothing. If I may say so, I think there are very few men who cease to keep books honestly. So long as a man's business is going on well, he is only too glad to keep books, because he likes to see how his affairs stand, but directly he begins to go wrong he ceases. That depends on a principle of human nature, and it is a mark, I think, of a man knowing he is becoming insolvent, if, having kept books before, he ceases to keep them. I think that is evidence of knowledge of insolvency which can almost always be relied upon. As to the plea that a man does not know what books to keep, I should pay little attention to that, or none.

1752. Passing to the fourth question relating to the realisation and administration of property, it is chiefly directed to a point as to which there has been, from time to time, complaints, namely, that the realisation of a bankrupt's estate is deferred too long?—As to the existing provisions relating to the realisation and administration, I distinguish between them. The existing provisions so far as regards promptness are enough and more than enough. What you want is not a more immediate realisation—you want a more profitable realisation?—At present the official receiver is in this position; that directly there is a petition he can get appointed receiver and then he is virtually controlling the estate. Directly there is an adjudication he may sell the next day. In one or two cases which were a good deal commented on at the time—for instance, Parker's case—the Official Receiver sold the bankrupt's property, his personal estate, household furniture for a large amount—to an amount, I think, of £20,000 or £30,000. The creditors objected to that, and the matter came before Mr. Justice Cave, who thought it was wrong, but the Court of Appeal took a different view, and held that the Official Receiver was justified in selling at once. You cannot have anything more prompt than that, but that is not what is wanted. You do not want promptness; you want efficiency. On the question of efficiency, will you allow me to give some facts which seem to me to be important?

1753. Yes, if you please?—I invite the attention of the Committee to the following figures which I have taken out of the last Report of the Board of Trade for the year 1904. In that year there were 3,522 estates wound up by Official Receivers. All of those estates except 135 were cases of small bankruptcies under Section 121 of the Act. That is to say, cases of bankruptcies where the assets were estimated as being £300 and less. That leaves 3,387 cases of small bankruptcies administered by official receivers in 1904, the proofs in which as admitted by the Official Receiver amounted to £1,468,781. The dividends realised by the Official Receiver in those cases were £80,730, working out, if my figures are right, at something like 3·89 per cent. I must go one step further. Of the 3,387 cases which I have just mentioned, 2,226 were cases where the gross assets were under £50. The proofs admitted in those—the very smallest class of cases—were £698,025, and the dividends were £5,641, working out at something a very little over ½ per cent. I want the Committee specially to take note of that. In the case where the gross assets were under £50 the administration in bankruptcy gave to the creditors very little over ½ per cent. I want them to compare those figures with figures with a precisely similar class of cases wound up under the next section, under Section 122 in the year 1904. In that year 6,095 administration orders under Section 122 were made. The debts admitted, that is to say, the precise equivalent to the proofs admitted, amounted to £160,488, and the dividends, £34,427. Those figures are taken from the Returns. The dividends therefore, in cases administered under Section 121 work out at something barely over ½ per cent., whereas the dividends, in the administration under Section 122, work out at 21·45 per cent. The reason of that is obvious. In the county court administration we make a man pay for what he gets. He gets protection for his property and for his person, but we make them pay for it. In bankruptcy he pays nothing at all. If I were a working man, or a man working on weekly wages, I would take care always to owe £50. Then I should feel perfectly safe. If my creditors bothered me, I should beg, borrow or steal £7 10s., and I should file my petition. Then I should be in this position, that the law would put a wet sponge over all my liabilities and I should pay not a farthing, my only assets being as a man in that position, my household furniture, but that is taken by the wife always, or practically always, and it is not worth the while of the Official Receiver to have a case in the county court to determine it, there being no books, I may remind you, and no evidence to determine whether the furniture would belong to the wife or not. It costs more than it is worth. With regard to his after-acquired property, he is perfectly safe for the very same reason. In bankruptcy the man's after-acquired property consists practically of two kinds—of that which is acquired by his own personal exertions, and of that which comes to him by windfalls, such as legacies, and so on. As to the first of those, it is available in the hands of his trustee if he is undischarged, which, in most cases, he is, but the trustee does not intervene and pursue it, because it costs him more to do that than it is worth. You have to go every time to the court to obtain a certain proportion of the man's weekly wages. Of course, you have to make an allowance out of those weekly wages for that which is necessary to keep him, because a man cannot be expected to work unless he is allowed to live. As regards a man's after-acquired property in small bankruptcies, it is practically his own, it is never touched. As to windfalls, there are, no doubt, a few, but the trustee probably never gets to know of them and I never heard of anyone in these cases being touched. Therefore, the small bankrupt is the petted child of the law. He used to be a criminal but now he is a spoiled child. He gets everything and he gives nothing.

1754. Under Section 122 there can be an order against his earnings, cannot there be?—Yes. I may say I was one of those who protested against that section when it was introduced into the Bankruptcy Act, but experience has convinced me that it does work. What we do is this. A man says: "I owe £50 and I ask for an administration order"; we make an administration order and we carefully examine what his income is, writing to his employer for that purpose, and we find, say, that he is getting 30s. a week. The judge says "now then, we will consider how many children he has, and what rent he pays," and things of that kind, and then an order is made, and on that he pays so much—probably in that case it would be about 3s. per week. If he pays, no one can touch him except by leave of the court. If the person having the conduct of the administration order complains, and says "this man has not been keeping up his instalments," the man is called upon, and if he can give a reason, such as illness, or a strike, or anything of that kind, well and good. If not, the judge makes an order, and if he does not comply with it he is imprisoned. If at any time it appears that his furniture or personal effects are over £10, then by leave of the registrar an execution may issue. The result is that the man generally pays up sooner or later. In other words the difference between bankruptcy and the county court, or the difference between Section 121 and Section 122 is just this. In bankruptcy you make a man free, and then you trust to what you can get. In the county court we do not make the man free until he has complied with the order, and if at any time he does not comply, then the hand of the law is upon him, and he is put into prison. I do not know whether I am troubling the Committee too much, but I consider it most essential. I have before me the case of a man—it is just a concrete case where this happened. The man owed somewhere about £15. He had 30s. a week clear from his employer. We had his employer's certificate to that effect. He was a casual payer and he was arrested six times. He only went to prison one time and eventually he paid everything. He had four children. A man with four children on 30s. a week can easily spare 3s. a week to his creditors.

1755. Is not there this essential difference that Section 122 applies where a man's debts are £50, or under, and Section 121 applies where his assets are under £300, because many of these cases of small assets in bankruptcy, are cases in which the debts may amount to £100,000?—There is that difference, no doubt, but on the point on which I am, namely, of the two modes of making a bankrupt pay his creditors, whether Section 122 is the more effective, I do not think that is material. Now, in bankruptcy—in taking two cases in bankruptcy under £50, you have to make the calculation which I have done.

1756. (Chairman.) You mean assets under £50?—Yes, net available assets.

1757. You could not have a bankruptcy in which the debts were under £50?—No, I take the assets in this report—the net available assets in cases in bankruptcy under £50 which numbered 2,226. There were 2,226 cases in bankruptcy wound up by the Official Receiver in which the net available assets were about £37,000—it roughly comes out at that. I have got it exactly—it is £36,924. Those were the net available assets in those cases. The dividends were £5,641. Now, taking the same class of case under Section 122—under £50—the amount paid into court, which represents net available assets, was £52,366, and the amount paid to creditors which represents dividend, £34,427. So you see how very much larger the proportion is. I have taken out the figures in my own court—the Leeds court, for four years from 1901 to 1905, in order to average it rather more. In those years we had 5321 administration orders, making an average of £242 a year. The amount paid into court was £48,482. The amount paid to creditors was £39,461. In other words about 81 per cent. of the available assets were paid to creditors, and the costs were about 18 per cent.

1758. (Chairman.) Does not that almost follow if the debts are under £50 that the man has no assets at all?—I am comparing cases with assets under £50, under the two systems.

1759. Not debts under £50. You cannot have bankruptcy with debts under £50. There must be an indebtedness of at least £50?—Yes.

1760. Because some of the bankruptcies in which the assets are under £50 are bankruptcies in which the debts are perhaps £200,000, at least in London?—They all appear here by this report.

1761. (Mr. Peat.) Mr. Marshall puts it that you have net available assets in those cases of £36,000, of which £5,000 goes to creditors. That is his point. He says, net available assets in the county court under Section 122 yields instead of a trifle like this, something substantial.

1762. (Mr. Smith.) I would like to raise a point of order upon this. I do not know whether the witness is putting forward these figures as the result of his own investigation, or whether he is relying on figures in the report himself. I do not know whether Mr. Marshall professes to be an expert in this matter, but it will lead to a great deal of cross-examination if we are to have these figures in the way that the witness is giving them, because I am prepared to say that they are absolutely misleading.

1763. (Chairman.) Of course we have a difficulty about this—I do not like to stop the matter——

1765. (Chairman.) Because Section 122 has been expressly excluded from the consideration of this Committee.

1766. (Mr. Smith.) There is no analogy between the two cases.

1767. (Chairman.) It was suggested—I think it is probably an open secret—that it should be within our consideration, but it was expressly excluded from the Committee, and it would be a pity to embark on such a controversy.

1768. (Mr. Smith.) I think it would be a pity to embark on a discussion of it, but I should like the witness to give us an expression of his opinion as to the differences between official and non-official costs?—I have not said anything about the difference between official and non-official.

1769. I am referring to the proof you have been good enough to send in?—That point I have not come to yet.

1770. (Mr. Smith.) No, but the point I wish to raise is this. Is it desirable that we should go into figures which will occupy an immense amount of time in cross-examining too, in order to put things clear which are not included in our reference.

1771. (Witness.) I venture to say, with all due respect, that if the consideration of estates under Section 122 of the Act is not included in your order of reference, then the order of reference is imperfect, and ought to be extended. It seems to me to be perfectly idle to report upon the efficiency of administration in bankruptcy, and to exclude the consideration of estates wound up under Section 122. To say, "We will not compare precisely similar estates under Sections 121 and 122," does not commend itself to me as being at all logical?—I should like to record my very respectful dissent from that view. I should like to say that I think that an examination into the administration in bankruptcy here, which puts it upon one particular section of the Bankruptcy Act, on the technical ground that the administration in one case is county court, and the administration in the other case is the Board of Trade, is excluding the point of comparison which it is most material in the interest of everybody concerned should be gone into.

1772. (Mr. Smith.) I hope the witness will be allowed to go on, Mr. Chairman.

1773. (Witness.) Although I am not an expert I shall be perfectly willing to undergo any cross-examination. Whether these figures are correct or not, I do not know. I go upon the figures. I have taken out these results from the Official Receiver's returns before me. I am not responsible for the returns. All that I am responsible for are the returns of my own court, and you may cross-examine me if you wish upon those.

1774. (Mr Smith.) It is the interpretation of the returns that is the point. If you are not an expert, I do not think that you can deal with that?—I do not want to occupy any unnecessary time.

4 July, 1906.

1775. Those are figures which require the consideration of an expert ?—You will correct me if I am wrong, but I venture to think I am right.

1776. (Mr. Peat.) These are figures which he has quoted from the report.

1777. (Mr. Smith.) It is the witness's impression of a comparison of what he considers to be similar cases, but they are not what an accountant would consider similar cases.

1778. (Chairman.) I think I had better pass on to the next paragraph.

1779. (Witness.) Pardon me, before you go to the next paragraph, I should like to compare what, I suppose, is strictly within your reference, namely, the results under the Bankruptcy Act and under deeds of arrangement. In Bankruptcy there were 3,522 estates wound up by Official Receivers in 1904. The net available assets were £246,720. The dividends were £144,445, working out the percentage of dividends to assets at 58·54 per cent. Under the deeds of arrangement, of which there were 2,710 —page 56 of the Bankruptcy Report—in which final accounts were rendered in the year 1904, the net available assets were £1,127,539. The dividends were £848,109, working out at a percentage of 75·21 as against 58·54. Of course in that number there were a certain number of small ones. The conclusion which I venture to draw from those figures is, first, that the large estates are at the desire of creditors mainly wound up under deeds of arrangement. And even taking the large estates in which the administration is more profitably done—but throwing into the pot the small estates, of which there are a good many—the realisation is very much more profitable under deeds of arrangement than it is under the Official Receiver's administration, and it would be very much more profitable if the deeds of arrangement Act were as I think it ought to be. At present as we all know, you must get unanimity. There is no power in the Act for a majority to bind a minority and I think that that power ought to be given. If it were given, a good many more estates would be wound up under deeds of arrangement, and with much more profit to the creditors, but I think, and I should rather like strongly to insist upon it, that it is essential if that act is to be amended at all, that provision should be made for some official audit and some official control of the trustee. That was the rock on which liquidation by arrangement under the Act of 1869 split. There was no official control. The trustee got hold of the estate and played ducks and drakes with it. If the creditors could proceed as they did under Section 125 and under 126 of the Act of 1869, and if there were added to that that which the legislature subsequently did add—but it shut the door when the horse was stolen—a provision for holding official control over the trustee—then I think that a very great improvement in administration from the point of view of the creditors would be effected.

1780. In your comparison, are not, so to speak, the administrations in bankruptcy overweighted by the fact that they comprise estates that are so small that it is not worth the while of the creditors to wind them up under a trustee. I mean there are estates in which the assets are £10 and the liabilities £100,000 ?—The return enables that comparison to be made (page 56). In the number of 2,700 cases are small cases under £50. I have not taken out the figures, but the figures compare precisely, and that deduction can be made by anyone who will take the trouble to make it, by reference to page 56 in comparison with page 40. There are less, I admit, small cases under the Deeds of Arrangement Act than there are under the Bankruptcy Act proper, but there are a good many, and what you say, Mr. Chairman, is perfectly correct; however, I only put the broad results.

1781. I think I may pass to paragraph 6 of the order of reference as regards married women. Is it your opinion that a married woman should be dealt with in the same way as either a femme sole or a man ?—I think a married woman should be dealt with in exactly the same way as a man. At present she is in a favoured, and in an unduly favoured, position. She cannot be arrested, she does not pay with her skin, nor does she pay as a man does in regard to her separate estate. Take the case of separate estate held by a woman. That may be divided roughly into two classes, those cases in which separate estate is constituted by a will or a settlement, and those cases in which it is the result of her personal earnings in trade, washing or whatever it may be. In regard to the first case, a man, in bankruptcy, cannot be protected except by the usual spendthrift clause. But in the case of a woman it is quite different, a woman may have separate estate—may have estate vested in the hands of trustees in trust for her separate use, and without power of anticipation for her life and on bankruptcy it is very difficult to realise that, because it has been decided that the trustee can only get hold of the dividends after they have been paid to the wife. It is like taking butter out of a dog's mouth, whereas, in the case of a man it is not so. I cannot see why a married woman, in bankruptcy, should not be put on precisely the same footing, with regard to her separate estate, which is the only estate that can be dealt with, as a man.

1782. I daresay that you remember that under the Married Woman's Property Act of 1893, if a married woman brings an action, the court can order the costs to be paid out of the estate subject to a restraint on anticipation ?—I had forgotten that.

1783. Would you relax that, so that in the case of a married woman bankrupt, her estate, subject to the power of restraint, should be capable of being taken ?—I should like to answer that question in the most general way. I think that a married woman in regard to her property and her person should be put on precisely the same footing as any other bankrupt.

1784. Now you have already, I think, favoured us with your views on the eighth question, namely, as to voluntary arrangements, and the majority having power to bind the minority. This next question I am putting to you entirely on my own account. Would you mind telling me how you would deal with the question of who is a creditor, and who is not, because one's experience certainly shows that the debtor, from various motives, will sometimes leave out very important creditors when he calls his meeting, he will leave out somebody whom he has a spite against, and so on. What would be your procedure in determining who is a creditor, and who is not, for the purpose of a resolution by which the majority is to bind the minority ?—Of course if the man fraudulently, as no doubt is sometimes the case, omits any creditor, if it is a creditor for a material amount, then it would be necessary to make some provision for having the resolution reviewed by the court, but if it was not for a material amount, and only for some small amount that would not affect anything, then I do not know whether it would be worth while. Still that would be the obvious way of dealing with that difficulty. It would be necessary to do that—to have some machinery for having the thing reviewed, and, if necessary, set aside, modified, or rectified, in case the man had omitted any material creditor.

1785. I am just putting it as a sort of instance that occurs to me. A resolution might be passed by the requisite majority of those to whom notice had been sent, but it might turn out that some people, whom the debtor believed to be fully secured creditors, were not all fully secured, and then they would find themselves with a resolution, to which they objected, binding upon them in respect of their unsecured balances ?—Yes, but if the suggestion were adopted that the court was to have some hand over the trustee with regard to the audit and official control it would be easy to provide that the court should have some power of rectifying, and if necessary setting aside, a resolution of creditors that had been found to have been fraudulently obtained. We may take it that no system can be devised in bankruptcy which will not be open to some abuse, and the question is always to what extent those abuses extend. In my own recollection of matters of estates under Section 125 of the Act of 1869 I do not remember the cases you mention, but no doubt there would be some cases, and the question is what is the proportion of them.

1786. The last matter we refer to is the question which I think your association had particularly under consideration, namely, hiring agreements, and whether they ought to be registered, and also the question of registering assignments of book debts ?—I should like to confine myself to the question which we have mostly considered namely, hiring agreements which are the more important of the two. My association, although there are a good many dissentients, of whom I am bound to say I am inclined to be one, is strongly in favour of the registration of hiring agreements on the analogy of registration of bills of sale. But there are practical difficulties which occur to me more strongly than they do to some of my colleagues with regard to that. In the first place I think, although many of them do not think so, that it will be absolutely necessary if that is to be worked that the analogy of the Bills of Sale Act should be strictly followed, that is to say, that the hiring agreement should be sent up to the central office in London, there registered, and copies of the registration document transmitted to the various county courts in which the property is situate. I think that that is essential because if it is not done no high bailiff going in under an execution can tell whether the property is actually covered by a hiring agreement or not, because although these agreements usually provide against the removal of the property it is common knowledge that that property is removed from one district to another and, unless it is sent up to London to a central office so that notice is given everywhere, the main purpose will fail. Then you see that involves the question not of a room or two as in the case of the Bills of Sale registration, but it involves a considerable department because there are thousands of these things. Everything is done under a hire agreement of some kind—everything from a mangle to a £300 motor is subject to hiring agreements now. Even a man's books—his encyclopædia is practically under a hiring agreement—in fact everything, so that you would require a very large establishment to deal with them.

1787. (Mr. Peat.) Rolling stock on railways, trucks and carriages ?—I do not know what is not. Very few people buy anything right off, mostly everything is done on the system of paying for it by instalments. So that you would require a very large establishment in London. Now that would be a financial matter. I suppose the initial cost of registering and providing for the expenses of that office would be something material. The initial cost of registering must necessarily be thrown upon the man who lets the thing out for hire. Then the cost of searching will have to be thrown either upon the high bailiff, which I think would be the proper course, or upon the execution creditor. The execution creditor would say to the high bailiff: 'I am not going to pay these costs. The writ in your hands directs you to levy my judgment against the goods of A.B. in your bailiwick; do your duty. If you choose to have a search to assist you in doing your duty that is your look out, I am not going to pay for it." Those are the difficulties, but they are largely of a financial kind, and I do not dissent from the majority of my colleagues that the thing might be well worth trying, though I venture to think that there is another and a better way. In bankruptcy as the Committee know, a hiring agreement does not protect the hirer against the trustee in bankruptcy in respect of such things as household furniture, which is the commonest case. I do not see why the law should not be altered so as to make the order and disposition clause effective so as not to protect the hirer in the case of execution.

1788. (Chairman.) Pardon me, but household furniture is not subject to the order and disposition clause. It is only the goods in a man's trade that are ?—The decisions that I am thinking about were before the Act of 1883. What you say is perfectly true, but on the construction of the order and disposition clause as it existed before the Act of 1883 household goods in a man's occupation or man's reputed possession were not protected against his trustee. I think it would be a very simple and very effective way of dealing with this difficulty to provide that goods and chattels in the reputed ownership of an execution debtor should not be protected as between the execution creditor and the owner, but that they should be deemed to be, as in point of fact anyone would imagine them to be, the property of the hirer. The owner can protect himself if he chooses. If he chooses to brand his goods "These are the goods of such and such a company"—that would probably go far and might be sufficient. The hirer would not then be the reputed owner because the thing on its face would bear evidence to the contrary. The present state of the law is perfectly intolerable. There are several cases which have come to my knowledge as president of the Registrars' Association in which the high bailiff has asked this specific question—"Are these goods your goods. (A.) Yes. (Q.) Are they under a hiring agreement. (A.) No. (Q.) Very well" then the bailiff levies, and he is liable to be cast in damages for conversion at the suit of the owner, and he has been, in several cases, so cast. He has done his duty to the best of his ability. Of course, he has a right of action, but against whom ?—against an insolvent man who cannot pay—against an execution debtor. I suppose he would have an action for deceit against a man of that kind, but it would be worth nothing. It is necessary to provide in some way or other against that.

1789. (Chairman.) The extension of the "reputed ownership" clause is rather an extension of the suggestion that the goods of A should be taken to pay the debts of B. Is not that the reason that there has been rather a strong prejudice on the part of the courts against it, that it is taking the goods of A to pay the debts of B ?—My answer to that is that under the former Act the courts saw no difficulty about it, and indeed Sir George Jessel, in one of the cases in which this question of whether household furniture under a hiring agreement might be considered to be the property of the hirer arose, said that the public was entitled to assume that a man is the owner of the furniture in his house. I do not think there would be any prejudice on the part of the courts. I do not think there ought to be any prejudice. If a man chooses to do business on rather risky terms then he must take means to protect himself. If he does not take means to protect himself why should the courts go out of their way to favour him ?

1790. What I meant was protecting high bailiffs and the sheriffs against process for seizing goods which were under a hiring agreement seemed to me to be one thing, but saying that goods under a hiring agreement were to go to pay the debts of the man who had hired the goods seemed to me to be rather raising a larger question ?—It does not strike me much as a difficulty. No doubt the goods of the hirer are paid for by the owner, but the owner chooses to do a risky trade, and if he considers, on the whole, that it is a profitable business to trade on those terms he can do so; if he wishes to protect himself he can print on his pianos that he lends out, or on his mangles: "these are the goods of Smith & Company" he has a right to do that. If he does not choose to do that he is not obliged to do it. I do not think it is a business to be favoured, because it conduces more to people anticipating their income than anything else, except the county court itself which is perhaps the greatest machine for developing credit in this country.

1791. (Mr. Richardson.) You say under Section 3 that if the law relating to discharge were strengthened, still fewer discharges would be applied for. In Leeds, out of 474 petitions in 1905 only nineteen applications for discharge were made. Still you are not in favour of bankrupts going before the court after the official examination. Do you not think that those large numbers of undischarged bankrupts are a menace to general trade. Do you not think it would be far better that the whole of them should, under some condition or other, be discharged from their bankruptcy ?—I do not see what you could do. I do not see that they are a menace at all. One would much sooner that they were not there, but if the commercial classes choose to deal with a man without making the enquiries which they might and ought to make, I do not see why they should say "we are menaced." If they will consult their gazettes, which they never do, and if they were to make inquiries, which they rarely do, they could find out whether a man had been a bankrupt and if they found that out it would be also very easy for them to find out whether he had been discharged or not. But they do not do that. The fact is that such is the competition in business, and so much business is done by commercial travellers that they do not protect themselves in the way that they ought to do. I fail to see that there is any great hardship.

1792. I think you are in error in saying that they do not take notice of Gazettes; I know a number of firms that I have been connected with who make a special point of it. The Gazette is put in the hands of an old employé who knows the whole of their customers, and he goes through it every week and marks it and brings it to the attention of his principals ?—Does the commercial traveller take it with him ?

1793. If the commercial traveller takes an order then it is for the firm to accept or refuse it. The commercial traveller does not always know the standing or position of the firm he calls upon, and the firm which he represents have a right, after the order is taken, to consider whether they will execute the order or not. The commercial traveller is not at fault at all?—The firms do in a very large number of cases execute the order.

1794. You would like the registration of hiring agreements carried out for the protection of sheriffs and high bailiffs, and I think you also said creditors?—Yes.

1795. Do you mean also to include traders? If the hiring agreement was registered would you say that it should be published only to the court?—No, I do not say that; I say that it should be registered at the courts. Of course the creditors are interested and they ought to have power to search the register. What I am proposing is primarily for the benefit of the sheriffs and high bailiffs, but secondly I think I used the word "creditors." It would inure to the benefit of creditors. It is material that the creditors should know whether the man's household furniture, not being under a bill of sale, is under a hire purchase agreement.

1796. (Mr. Peat.) You indicated very strongly indeed that in your opinion there should be no compulsory consideration of a bankrupt's discharge. I suggest that there may be an advantage in that, because the court could in case of need make an order against the bankrupt for payment of certain instalments or other contributions from his income. Does that appear as a reasonable view?—That involves a very large and very important alteration in the bankruptcy law. At the present moment if a man chooses to come up for his discharge, then the court may attach as a condition to it that he should pay something out of his earnings. Cases in which the court does attach that condition are very very few, but still there it is. Then you suggest that the court should have power to do that even if the man does not come up for his discharge.

1797. Certainly?—In the first place how are you to compel him to come up for his discharge?

1798. I do not wish to argue that point?—If you do not compel him how is he to come?

1799. I suggest that whether he comes or not—and upon this I am asking your opinion—the court should at an early period of the bankruptcy consider the bankrupt's conduct and fit him with the punishment required by it. We will say imprisonment in some cases; in others by contributions from his earnings or that he should be obliged to produce a statement of his accounts from time to time for the consideration of his trustees. But the court at any rate would do two things—first it would prevent a huge wave of undischarged bankrupts being spread about, and in the second place it would punish in some measure a person according to his deserts. I suggest to you that that aspect of the question might rather change your view?—Do you suggest, and does your question imply, that you think that the court should punish a man in his absence whether he comes up or not?

1800. If you give him the opportunity to come, yes?—But you do not know—he may be prevented by illness, he may be absent from various causes, and it would be introducing an entirely new principle into the criminal law of England. Unless you are to punish him criminally as a misdemeanant I do not see that you can do anything. You must either punish him by bankruptcy, which must be by withholding his certificate or suspending his discharge, or if you punish him criminally you must punish him as a misdemeanant, and I do not think you will induce Parliament to alter the essential principle of criminal law that a man is not to be punished criminally unless he has had an opportunity of being heard in his own defence.

1801. (Mr. Evans.) The suggestion is that there should not be a compulsory application by the debtor for his discharge, but that the trustee or official receiver should bring up a report upon him and that upon that he should be summoned to appear.

1802. (Mr. Peat.) I do not think I made myself clear.

1803. (Mr. Evans.) He asked the question of you: "How can you compel a man to come and apply?"

1804. (Witness.) Assuming that to be the form proposed, you would have to make his non-attendance punishable as a contempt of court, and you must issue a warrant for him. That is the only way in which his attendance can be compelled.

1805. That is just as it is at present?—Yes; he is liable to a warrant for not appearing at his public examination.

1806. I pass from that just to say in addition to that that some of these bankrupts undischarged create fresh debts, and there is a second bankruptcy on the top of the first which creates complications?—True.

1807. Would not these complications be removed if there were a compulsory consideration of the discharge?—Yes; that is no doubt the fact, but I do not quite follow you in thinking that the existence of a large number of undischarged bankrupts is a menace to society or even to commercial society. That it is undesirable that they should exist we all of us agree. There are a certain class, I admit, of bankrupts—say solicitors—who are put by the law in a special position, and who are in a position of trust, and whose case, I think, differs from that of the ordinary commercial bankrupt. I think the existence of undischarged solicitor bankrupts is undesirable to the extent of being to some extent a menace. I do not say that with regard to the ordinary commercial bankrupt, especially with regard to the commercial bankrupt in a small way. A large commercial bankruptcy is generally known. In small cases it is not. I do not know exactly what the danger is. I should say that people are so anxious to do business that they do not very much bother themselves, and a man in a large business takes the small with the great and he says, "I do a large business—I make a certain number of bad debts—what does it matter?"

1808. I will move from that point. You indicated your view that penal offences should be extravagance in living and the non-keeping of books?—Yes, I thought that those ought to be punished as misdemeanours.

1809. Should you think it prudent to add to them gambling?—I have not considered it. I take those as being in my opinion the most important of the offences.

1810. Then I will come to the question of keeping books. Do you think it would be desirable to make provision in any new legislation that a trader should be required to keep an account of his income and expenditure. That is not a difficult thing for a man to do even of small education?—No, I think not.

1811. That could be made compulsory?—Yes, I think it would be very desirable. I think a man who carries on trade ought to be obliged by law to keep such books as enable his transactions to be followed and a cash account is the first, and, as you say, is a very simple thing. Few men are so ignorant as not to be able to do it. If they are they ought not to trade, and if they choose to trade not doing it then they must be punished.

1812. It has been suggested that the trader also should be compelled once a year to publish a statement of his assets and liabilities, not necessarily to keep systematic books or books which you described a short time ago as such as would be kept by a professional accountant, but once a year he should give a summarised statement of his assets and liabilities?—You are embarking on a very difficult question. It is to be remembered that traders extend from the class of people who keep their accounts by chalking a hieroglyphic on the back of a door to people in a large business with elaborate books, and so on, and to frame any system compelling a man to keep books would be a very difficult matter.

1813. Pardon me, I do not suggest keeping books. I said keeping a cash account?—A cash account, I entirely agree with you.

1814. And supporting that by a statement of his assets and liabilities prepared once a year?—I think with regard to the smallest class of traders they would say, and they would say with truth, "We cannot do this; we are too uneducated." We have had the Education Act for thirty years, but still there are those who would say that.

1815. You do not think it is possible?—I do not think that it is possible; I think that a man could honestly say "I cannot do it."

1816. You think that that would be going too far?—Yes. I think that the cash account a man ought to supply. It is a simple thing, and every man if he chooses can do it.

1817. You also mentioned extravagance in living and gave as an example a case where a man spent £400 in two years. Would you describe that as extravagance in living?—If he is losing money in his business I should. I forget what the number of the case is; I think it was No. 45. The man had £500 less than nothing—that is to say, the liabilities ranking for dividend were £679. His estimated assets were £140; his nett trade profits were £50 and he spent £421.

1818. In two years?—Yes, spending £421, and not having a farthing, and being £500 worse than having a farthing I call extravagance.

1819. Do you call extravagance in living a man spending 21s. if his income is £1?—I would not press that. I certainly call it extravagant living if a man spent 30s. or 35s. a week, having nothing at all.

1820. Mr. Addison, on my right, says that an expenditure of £400 possibly is nothing more than would be absolutely necessary to enable a man to live with a family of two or three, and that the point that you mention more properly comes under the heading of trading after knowing himself to be insolvent. How can you say that a man is extravagantly living if he has kept a wife and family for two years on £400?—Extravagance in living is a question of degree. For instance, there is the man to whom 30s. a week is a very considerable income, but there are men who spend 30s. a week on cabs.

1821. Do you make a suggestion that all hiring agreements or anything in the nature of a hiring agreement, should be registered. For instance, take the encyclopædia case that you mentioned, that is something in the nature of household furniture. Thousands upon thousands of persons have acquired encyclopædias in that way. Would people like to see that kind of hiring agreement registered?—I daresay not, but whether they like to see it or not, I do not think matters. I should extend the registering of the hiring agreement to all cases in which there was an agreement to hire.

1822. Even to railway wagons, railway trucks and locomotives?—Yes, if they were agreements to hire, I do not see any necessity to make any distinction at all.

1823. Although it enters into the trade of the country so very largely that it becomes an absolutely well-known fact that even railway companies hire trucks. You would have them all registered?—Yes, that is one of the points on which I apply my own personal suggestion as to the extension of the order and disposition clause. If it was a custom well-known to everybody then it would take it out of the case.

1824. You suggested that if a piano in a house were branded "This is the property of so-and-so," your difficulty would be got over?—The difficulty of its being under the order and disposition clause and of its being his reputed property—that difficulty would be got over, I think.

1825. But is that difficulty got over from this point of view—the tradesman who delivers the stuff at the door does not ever look at the goods. He sees that it is a well-furnished house, and the fact that he trusts the person upon that. He does not go and inspect the furniture and see whether it is marked in any particular way?—You mean the hirer.

1826. No, the tradesman who contracts the creditor. You do not improve the position of the creditor by a statement of that kind—in fact you come back to the point that it is a recognised custom not only with the man who has furniture in his house, but with the tradesman in the highest circles of trade; with the man of moderate wealth who takes in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," or even with some of the railway companies who get large deliveries of trucks upon the deferred payment system. I am afraid, however, that I am rather arguing with you?—No, the suggestion I make is primarily for the protection of the sheriff and high bailiff, and only secondarily and inferentially for that of the creditor. What we want, and what I think is required, is that the intolerable state of the law disclosed by the decision in Jelks v. Hayward should be amended and that the sheriff or high bailiff doing his duty, and obliged to do his duty and doing it according to the best of his ability, taking all reasonable pains—that he should be compelled out of his own pocket to pay the owner of goods let on hire is a proposition that I do not suppose anybody would defend, and it is for the purpose of getting rid of that anomaly I confess that the suggestions which I make are made. I may remind you that the registration device is one which I think myself is only the second best. I am putting it before you because it is the opinion of the county court registrars, who for this purpose I represent, but my own personal view, if you think it worth while to ask me what it is, is that the better plan would be to proceed by amending the order and disposition clause in the Bankruptcy Act.

1827. No question was asked you with regard to the assignment of book debts or rather the registration of assignments of book debts. You are aware, probably that in some cases security is given to bankers and to others sometimes upon a block of book debts, sometimes upon an individual debt, sometimes upon a debt in respect of work in progress in a shipyard, say?—Yes.

1828. And that is a common form of security with bankers and others?—Yes.

1829. It has been suggested by certain witnesses that such assignment of book debts, particularly where blocks of book debts are assigned, should be registered?—I quite agree.

1830. Are you of that opinion?—I quite agree, I think they should.

1831. Are you of opinion, for instance, that the assignment of a single debt should be registered?—"Book debts." I should hold you to the words "book debts." I do not think I should require the assignment of a book debt. I should require it to be in the plural.

1832. A block of debts?—Yes, I cannot say how many, but I should not think it would be worth while to register the assignment of one debt although even that may be material. However, that is for the draftsman of the Bill.

1833. You do not express an opinion upon it?—I am of opinion distinctly that it would be a very good thing if the assignment of book debts were registered. I think it would be a good thing to do and I think it falls within the principle of registration of bills of sale and within the principle of hiring agreements.

1834. Is your view at all based upon the fact that the assignment of a book debt, say in connection with the building of a ship, might mean the assignment of £20,000, £30,000 or £40,000—do you think it prudent that that should be assigned?—I leave it to wiser heads than my own to determine whether it should be "a book debt" or "book debts" but, in principle, I think if book debts were of that kind—a book debt of £20,000 or £30,000—it ought to require registration.

1835. You think it does require registration—that the assignment of it ought to be registered?—Certainly; if it was a book debt for 6s. 8d. that might be a different matter.

1836. (Chairman.) That could be cured by a provision like that in the Bills of Sale Act which does not apply to things under a certain amount.

1837. (Mr. Addison.) I will just follow that up by saying that the registration of the assignment of book debts would probably at once bring about the bankruptcy or suspension of the person making the assignment?—That would very likely be so.

1838. There might be another objection to the disclosing of the names of the debtors—yours or mine, for instance—for our tailor's bills?—You say another objection—I do not at present admit that the first is an objection. If it brings about a man's bankruptcy it will be a good thing because it probably only does earlier that which will have to be done sooner or later.

1839. It might be a temporary relief and that temporary relief would be rendered impossible?—You cannot get anything without paying something for it, and there would be inconveniences occasionally, I quite admit. I am prepared to take the risk of my name being disclosed.

1840. With regard to the bankrupt coming up for discharge, I daresay you recollect under the old Act of 1849 that he always did?—Yes.

1841. The last examination was fixed and the date of the application for certificate. He always came up?—Yes, before the Commissioner.

1842. He is now bound to come up for the last examination. Do you see any objection to his being bound to come up for discharge so that his conduct should be inquired into?—I see no objection to it except the objection that I do not see how either his failure to attend or anything that the court can do when he does attend, can be enforced. What is the use of bringing a man up, I would ask, to have his conduct considered unless the court on coming to the determination that his conduct is bad can do something? If it is proposed that the man should be haled up and then, if his conduct is bad, punished, I ask in what way is he to be punished? You can scarcely, I think, punish him as a misdemeanant, because there is the obvious answer that you propose to make a man's action criminal if he does not ask for his discharge whereas it is not criminal if he does ask for it. A man has been extravagant, he has been doing everything mentioned in Section 8, Clause 3. He comes up and asks for his discharge and all that the court can do is to refuse or suspend it. If he says "I do not care about a discharge—I am not going into business"—you surely would not propose to have him tried at quarter sessions or assize.

1843. The practical suggestion was the fixing of the day and the consideration of his conduct with reference to discharge and that the court should then deal with the whole question?—Yes, but if he does not want his discharge, how are you to punish him for misconduct?

1844. Might not the Court on that occasion inquire nto his conduct and see whether it was deserving of punishment?—But an inquiry which leads to nothing, what is the good of it? The Court would preach to him and he would listen attentively, and, I daresay with as much respect as people do listen to sermons, and it would do him as little good. Unless you can attach some consequence to an examination of that kind and a consideration of that kind, I fail to see what the good of it would be.

1845. There are several considerations—you might have a limited power of punishment for certain things in the court itself, or the court might order prosecution, or make an order as to his future earnings or future property, and set apart so much?—But you would have then to alter the Discharge clause because, as I pointed out, it would be too great an absurdity to punish a man who does not come up for a discharge, and not to punish him if he does.

1846. We are quite agreed upon that?—I am one of those who think that the two offences I have named, viz., not keeping books, and extravagance in living are cases which might well be made misdemeanours, and that the Court, even if a man does not apply for his discharge if it can get him before it—that is essential—might well punish him on the same footing as a bankupt, but I do not think, I confess, that it would be wise or profitable to entrust the Court of Bankruptcy with the functions of a criminal judge. They used to have it, no doubt, under the Act of 1849 or 1861, I forget which it was.

1847. (Chairman.) Both.

1848. (Witness.) But it would be idle to ask for that, and I do not think Parliament would sanction that, nor do I think it is desirable.

1849. (Mr. Addison.) As to hiring agreements, your suggested remedy was the extension of the Order and Disposition Clause?—Something analogous.

1850. That Order and Disposition Clause, as I recollect, never applied except to traders?—Yes, but it is proposed to make it apply.

1851. At present bankruptcy sweeps every debtor within its scope?—I should propose a new clause—a clause making no distinction between a trader and a non-trader.

1852. You would extend the Order and Disposition Clause?—I should make a new clause.

1853. You would extend it?—Yes, I should.

1854. Not merely limiting it to traders, but extending it to all debtors?—Yes, obviously.

1855. Although the tendency of modern decisions and of legislation has been the other way—to restrict its operation?—Yes, that may be, but I am for the moment in the position of the wise legislator who is trying to remedy things.

1856. Your point of view as to registering hiring agreements is on behalf of the high bailiff mainly?—And the sheriff—for their protection.

1857. Otherwise that objection would go?—If they could be adequately protected otherwise, I should not suggest registration.

1858. Because there are several points of view—one of the very large body of persons—manufacturers, traders and others whose living is largely connected with these transactions?—Persons who let out goods on hire.

1859. Yes,—that is one point of view, it is an enormous business?—Yes.

1860. Another point of view is that of the person hiring the goods—that is a young couple starting in life and hiring their furniture—that you have not considered?—Yes, indeed I have considered it.

1861. Because I am going to suggest to you that it would make the terms on which they would get their furniture much more onerous to them?—Yes, it might induce them not to enter into a hiring agreement, which would be a very good thing.

1862. But your point of view, I think, was mainly that of the sheriffs and high bailiffs?—It is entirely for the protection of the sheriff and high bailiff whose position at present is intolerable.

1863. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Just one question with regard to that. I suppose traders who are giving credit to persons who enter into hiring agreements have some right also to protection?—Traders who are giving credit—in other words, creditors.

1864. Yes, the registration of hiring agreements is desirable in their interests?—I think it is, although that is not the reason why the suggestion is made or the principal reason for it, but I think it is a secondary although a very important reason.

1865. But it is a reason often urged by commercial men?—I think it is a very reasonable reason.

1866. (Mr. Smith.) With regard to deeds of arrangement, I understand you to suggest that you are in favour of giving power to a majority to bind the minority?—A majority of some kind—say three-fourths in number or value.

1867. Would that include the discharge of the debtor?—No, I do not consider that discharge has anything to do with it.

1868. (Chairman.) Would not you put the word "release" instead of "discharge."

1869. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, release of the debtor?—Yes.

1870. From his obligations?—Yes, in the same way as a deed of arrangment releases a man who gives up everything. The creditors by the deed agree to release him on certain terms embodied in that deed.

1871. The Chairman suggested that a difficulty might arise in determining who are creditors. I think your answer was that you would be in favour of some machinery for determining that?—Yes.

1872. Would you also be in favour of some machinery for preventing the abuse of proxies which prevailed under the Act of 1869?—I have not thought about that but I see no objection to it. I think generally if you ask me that deeds of arrangement are good but that the present limited operation of the Act ought to be amended with a view of making them more valuable than they are, because for the purposes of realisation they act practically very much better than administration in bankruptcy. With regard to the proxies I only say I have not thought about the matter, but I see no objection in point of principle to it.

1873. Do not you think that it is a very important matter that the abuses which are alleged to have arisen under the old Act from the indiscriminate use of proxies—the touting for proxies, and the buying and selling of proxies—are very serious matters?—I had a very considerable experience under the Acts of 1849 and 1861 and also under the Act of 1869, and I should not be prepared to admit that the evils you mention were so widespread or so serious as your question seems to imply.

1874. Do not you think that they are sufficiently serious as to require some legislative provision against their abuse ?—If the abuse is found to be such as to require the remedy of a legislative provision, by all means let there be one.

1875. I suggest that it has been found to be so ?—I must accept your opinion upon that.

1876. Would you make the taxation of costs compulsory ?—Not compulsory, but I think any creditor dissatisfied with the solicitors' bill—for it comes to that—should have the power which, of course, he has by the present law.

1877. Has any creditor at present the power under a voluntary deed to require that a bill shall be taxed ?—I do not know, I cannot answer that question, but I should think probably not.

1878. Would you give that power to any creditor ?—Yes, I would give him power.

1879. Would you give him any power of appeal in the case of excessive remuneration being paid to the trustee ?—Appeal to whom ?

1880. Either to the court or to some public department, such as the Board of Trade ?—I would give it to the court; I would not give it to the Board of Trade, certainly.

1881. You suggested that you would require the trustee's accounts to be audited ?—I think they ought to be audited.

1882. By whom ?—The Board of Trade.

1883. Would you require unclaimed funds to be disposed of—you would require them to be paid into some account ?—I think generally the provisions by which trustees under the Act of 1869 are subject to audit and subject to account, and subject to paying in any funds in their hands, are applicable.

1884. Do you mean liquidation by arrangement under the 1869 Act ?—Yes, I think those provisions ought to be applied.

1885. Would it satisfy you, then, if you restored the liquidation by arrangement clause of the 1869 Act ?—I should have to read those clauses.

1886. (Chairman.) Is that correct ? Surely under the 1869 Act the trustee under a liquidation had not to pay his unclaimed balances ?

1887. (Mr. Smith.) No, he had not, it is only under the 1883 Act, but would the proceedings which characterised the liquidation by arrangement under the 1869 Act satisfy you generally ?—I have not gone into it with sufficient detail to answer.

1888. Would you have any investigation of the debtor's conduct in the case of a deed of arrangement ?—No.

1889. Why not ?—Not if the creditors are satisfied.

1890. Supposing a single creditor is not satisfied ?—I should leave a single creditor to be dissatisfied.

1891. And yet the debtor may have committed all those serious offences on which you have been commenting—keeping no books, having been extravagant in his living, having conducted his business with a knowledge of insolvency, having committed all the offences under the Bankruptcy Law that you have mentioned—yet you would give the creditors the right not only to condone those but to prevent any creditor from bringing the matter before the court ?—I should assume that the creditors were men of common sense and intelligence, and I should assume that the majority of creditors, if a man had been guilty of those offences would not give him a clean sheet but would join with a single dissentient creditor.

1892. On the contrary, is it not possible that the creditors might make use of the penalties of the Bankruptcy Law for the purpose of squeezing the debtor and getting something more out of him or his friends than they could under the ordinary procedure if they have the right to say, "We have power to put you into bankruptcy if you do not do so and so ?"—They have that power at present.

1893. Then he would be prosecuted ?—He may be examined—will he be prosecuted ? My own view is that it inures in most cases for the benefit of the debtor and for his exclusive benefit. I do not consider bankruptcy to be a matter to be feared. If I were a man living beyond my means I should welcome bankruptcy.

1894. I am putting a case of a man who had committed criminal offences, or offences which you would make criminal, and I say would it not place an enormous—a most unreasonable—power in the hands of the majority of creditors to enable them to say, "If you do not do so and so we shall make you bankrupt, but if you do so and so we shall condone your offence ?"—If there were a probability that that would be done, that would be, I think, a material objection against it, but if you ask me I do not think it would be done.

1895. May I suggest to you that under the last Act it was done continually—would you dispute it ?—I would not, because I have not the materials before me to dispute it, but I should like to examine the evidence on which the statement is made.

1896. And if I were to allege that the Act of 1869 was repealed on account of those very abuses, and the present system introduced, would you dispute that ?—Yes.

1897. Have you read the speeches in Parliament when the Bill was introduced ?—I read a good many of them, and I was pretty familiar with the controversy which took place at the time.

1898. Do not you know that the Bill was introduced for the express purpose of remedying those abuses ?—No, I do not agree with you there.

1899. I refer you to Mr. Chamberlain's speech on the introduction of the Bill. I am merely referring to the charges brought against the previous system, and the grounds on which he introduced the Bill of 1883 ?—I cannot agree with your statement. The chief reason was that the Chambers of Commerce—commercial men generally—had protested against the abuses of having estates got hold of by accountants and others who were trustees under the administration and never accounting for them but playing ducks and drakes with them. That was what the Chambers of Commerce objected to. I was in communication with the Chambers of Commerce and knew a good deal of what was going on; and that, I should have said, was the subject which, more than any other, gave rise to legislation, and which led to the change in the law by the introduction of the Act of 1883. The creditors said, "We have had enough of this non-official administration which leads to great abuse; we will have an official administration," and so it has been swinging see-saw ever since that time or even before then—prior to 1849, sometimes between the creditors and sometimes between the court. I should not accept, certainly, with all deference, what you suggest.

1900. You are not aware, perhaps, of the existence of the memorial which was brought forward by the bankers and merchants of London pointing out the abuses which had arisen under the liquidation clauses of the Act of 1869 ?—No, I am not aware of that memorial. I confess I do not know of it.

1901. I will not press you further on that point. Let me go to another question, the question of costs. I understand you to say that on a comparison of similar cases by official and non-official trustees under the Bankruptcy Act that the result is favourable to the non-official trustee ?—I think I have not gone into that. I have instituted two kinds of comparison. I have instituted a comparison between estates wound up by the official receiver with cases wound up under the Administration Act.

1902. (Chairman.) You mean the Deeds of Arrangement Act ?—I mean the Deeds of Arrangement Act, and with cases of a similar kind wound up under the County Court Administration Orders. I have not compared the other two.

1903. (Mr. Smith.) You did not make any comparison ?—I have not made any comparison with them.

1904. I was referring to your proof ?—I should prefer to hold to what I have said, rather than to what I thought I was going to say.

1905. Take first of all a comparison of the deeds of arrangement. Have you examined the figures carefully clause by clause to see whether the cost of official administration or under a deed of arrangement was the larger ?—How do you mean ? What I have compared are similar cases with regard to the amount, that is to say, with regard to proofs admitted and dividends paid in the first place. That I conceive to be the most important.

1906. I will ask you to compare the table on page 40 with the table on page 42. You will find in the last column on the right-hand side the amount of costs of administration, the total cost, and the percentage to the gross assets ?—Yes.

1907. Now you see the first return there refers to cases under £25 where the percentage of cost is marked 96 per cent. ?—Yes.

1908. And in the deeds of arrangement on page 56 you will find that they are marked 80 ?—Yes.

1909. Then the next class of estate is 63 and 53 respectively. The second class is 63 per cent. I am omitting decimals ?—What do you mean by the second class ?

1910. The second class of estates administered—those are estates between £25 and £50. They were 63 per cent. —I am omitting decimals. In both of those cases the cost of administering the estate was less than by the official administration class by class ?—I understand you to say that the cost of administering by the official receiver in a similar class of case up to £100——

1911. Up to £50 ?—Is less, very likely.

1912. No, is more ; the costs by the Official Receiver are 96 and 63 against 80 and 53 ?—Very well.

1913. Then take the next return, it is 42 under official administration, 43 and nearly 44 under deeds ?—Yes.

1914. Will you look down the table and see if you can find another figure where the costs of administration are not greater than the Official Receiver's ?—I have not gone into it.

1915. You gave evidence on the subject ?—I gave evidence on the general question ; you may take me as holding to what I have said. I should be glad to be cross-examined as to what I have said, but I have not made these comparisons. What I have compared, if you will permit me, are results under bankruptcy and under deeds of arrangement, and I have taken the total cases —putting the small and the big fish into the same basket—i.e., 3,522 cases wound up by the Official Receiver in 1904 in which the net available assets were £246,720, and dividends £144,445, and 2,710 cases in which final accounts were rendered under deeds of arrangement the net available assets being £1,127,539 and the dividend £848,109. I deduce from those figures the conclusion that, in the gross, management under deeds of arrangement is very greatly more to the benefit of the creditors than under the official administration.*

1916. I am going to submit to you that, the facts being as you stated them, the conclusion you have drawn is absolutely unwarranted ?—I should be glad to hear what you have to say on that point.

1917. I suppose you know that the cost of administering a large estate is very much less than the cost of administering a small one ?—It is, no doubt.

1918. It ranges according to these tables from 90 per cent. in the very small cases to 6 per cent. in cases of £8,000 ?—Yes.

1919. If you take the total assets of the one class and the total assets of the other and compare them in order to make a proper comparison, these cases would all have to represent a similar amount of assets on the average. Have you ascertained that they do ?—No, I have not

1920. Then I tell you that they do not and that the official cases are very small cases—I mean extremely small cases and the deeds of arrangement are comparatively large cases. Does not that show you that your conclusion is quite wrong ?—Taking it for the moment and assuming what you say to be true—I should like to examine the matter for myself and see what the thing is—it would modify the conclusion I have arrived at. The main conclusion is that the administration of large estates is more profitable to creditors under deeds of arrangement than it is under official administration.

1921. (Chairman.) But the official administration very seldom gets the large estate ?—That may be, but I will compare like things, and with regard to costs the costs are only a deduction. The important thing is how much do the creditors get—so much assets and so many dividends.

1922. (Mr. Smith.) I would prefer if you would answer the few questions which I wish to put to you ?—Very well.

1923. I presume that on coming here of necessity on the figures which you did give you had studied the reports of the Board of Trade and made yourself acquainted with the general question ?—Yes.

1924. That you make yourself responsible for the statistics which you submitted and the conclusions which you drew from them ?—Of course.

1925. Then may I ask did you study the table on page 18 of the report—I find I am mistaken ; it is not given in the 1904 report, but there is a comparison in 1902 ?—I have not compared it. I took the last.

1926. I want you to glance at these figures. Here is a comparison of the Official Receiver about various classes of assets compared with non-official and deeds. Would you tell me after looking at that whether you still say that the cost of deeds of arrangement is less ?—If you will allow me I would like to take this away and consider it. I will write to the chairman with the result.

1927. You can add it to the proof of your evidence ? —I might do that.

1928. (Mr. Smith.) I was sorry that you persisted in giving the figures because I felt that not being an expert you could hardly deal with those which are matters for an accountant ?—Of course I speak with all due humility.

1929. May I ask you to glance at the figures ?—I will glance at the figures.

1930. Do you see any single case ?—If you will allow me I would prefer not to go into this at present.

1931. You would rather not answer the question ?—I would rather not answer the question until I have had an opportunity of reading them carefully ; I am a little tired and have had a long day.

1932. There is one point I would like to put to you. I think you said that a large number of cases of insolvent estates went under deeds of arrangment ?—I said the largest cases.

1933. Then you would naturally expect the figures quoted as the cost of realisation to be smaller than in the smaller estates that go into bankruptcy ?—I do not know that I should. Costs, as I have already pointed out, are not the important thing. The important thing is how much assets go into the pockets of the creditors. The cost is one item, but it is only one item.

1934. What are the others ?—With regard to the Board of Trade there is a sum paid.

1935. What other item is there except the costs which are deducted from the administration of the debtor's estate ?—There are preferential payments and there are allowances to the bankrupt.

1936. Preferential payments do not come in in bankruptcy more than elsewhere ?—Not more than elsewhere.

* See Questions 1915-20 ; 1926-36.—Comparing the total results under bankruptcies and deeds of arrangement the conclusion to be deduced from the Board of Trade Returns was that, in the gross, liquidation under deeds of arrangement was very greatly more to the benefit of creditors than liquidation under official administration in bankruptcy. It was, however, pointed out by a member of the Committee that this statement was unwarranted, because a much greater number of large estates fall to be administered under deeds than by Official Receivers and the cost of administration being relatively less in large estates than in small ones, a comparison of gross results under the two systems is misleading, and that the true comparison should be between the classes of estates, small and great.

I promised to make this comparison, and having made it, I desire to modify my original answer by saying that the Tables on pp. 40 and 56 of the 1904 Board of Trade Return show that in estates where the gross assets are under £50, comprising 2,226 of the 3,522 estates noted on p. 40, administration under deeds is the cheaper of the two, but that in estates where the gross assets exceed £50 the cost of administration is cheaper in bankruptcy and in the largest estates greatly cheaper.

Whether there are any material facts other than those appearing in the Tables which ought to be taken into account is a question I do not ask ; my answer was founded on the facts given in the Tables, and on that basis and to the extent stated above, was inaccurate.

1937. But I mean, in distributing the net dividends, what other elements are there besides costs which you are to take into account ?—In the case of a bankruptcy there are deductions of the sums paid to the Official Receiver.

1938. Pardon me, that is a mistake entirely. I call your attention to the column here where the costs and the allowance to the debtor and the creditors make up the total ?—Is that page 40 ?

1939. It applies to all the totals. You will see here costs, allowance to the debtor, and the dividends, make up, with the balance in hand, which is always indivisible, the total available assets. You will find here net available assets ?—Yes.

1940. What else is there besides costs that the creditors do not get the benefit of ? There are no other deductions ? —Probably.

1941. The total available assets after deducting the costs are distributed amongst creditors ?—Yes; that is so.

1942. Then I put it to you that the average estates under deeds of arrangement being so much larger than they are in bankruptcy they ought to be very much less costly in the percentage of administration ?—In other words that the dividends ought to be more and the dividends are more. Mr. Thomas Marshall. 4 July, 1906.

1943. And the costs ?—I do not care about the costs and I do not think the creditors care about the costs. All the creditors care about is dividends. They say "a man has so much and there is not much coming into our pockets." The proper comparison, if I may say so with all respect, is between assets and between dividends.

1944. If you divide an estate between costs and creditors surely it comes to the same thing ?—But you do not divide it between costs and creditors.

1945. But where the returns are divided it shows the available assets between costs and creditors ?—I really cannot add anything to what I have said on that point, which is that the question of costs is an element which is not material or only slightly material for what I think is the essential comparison.

1946. It is hopeless for me I am sure to pursue this with you any further. I am sure you have done your best in giving your evidence ?—Yes. I have done the best I can for you.

TENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 11th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
JOHN BARKER, Esq., M.P.
GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary.)

Mr. A. SAYER HARRIS, called; and Examined.

1947. (Chairman.) I think you have read our terms of reference. May I ask what is your profession ?—At the present time I am retired from business, but I have been secretary and counting house manager to Messrs. Spencer, Turner & Boldero, Limited. I was with them forty-three years, and I had with them a good deal of experience in these matters, although I am not a lawyer. Mr. A. Sayer Harris. 11 July, 1906.

1948. I forget what they are ?—There are general traders—warehousemen—similar to the large City warehousemen.

1949. Are you a member of the Association of Trade Protection Societies ?—No, I am not, but I know several of them.

1950. I mean it is rather on behalf of that Association that you come ?—One of my late directors, Mr. Breeze, lately deceased, mentioned my name at one of the meetings as being able to give evidence of a useful character. That is for you to decide, however. I can tell you what I know, and any question you ask me I shall be very pleased to reply to if I can.

1951. I suppose the firm with which you were engaged had a great deal to do with debtors ?—Yes; I dare say I had very likely 100 failures a year to deal with in one way or another.

1952. (Mr. Addison.) I may take it that Mr. Harris is appointed for this purpose to represent the Association of Trade Protection Societies.

1953. (Chairman.) Is that so ?—No, I do not understand that at all.

1954. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I think Mr. Harris rather offers his evidence as representing one of the large financial houses ?—I had sent on to me, or had given to me one of the printed forms of your terms of reference Nos. 1 to 9. I was asked to give in writing my views on those sections. I did so, and sent it to the Trade Protection Society in Berners Street. Later on I received a letter asking me if I would call. I called and I saw Mr. Hadwen and also Mr. Longstaffe. It was decided that I should appear and give evidence. I was called upon to do so, my name being submitted as one of the witnesses; that is all I know about it.

1955. (Chairman.) You are therefore familiar with the terms of our order of reference, and dealing first with paragraph 1 which relates to the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt—what is your view as to the present state of the law, as to whether it should be in any way altered or strengthened ?—Of course my reply is this—an alteration is absolutely necessary; in fact I say that it is a matter of urgency. I also say that the conduct of the bankrupt should at the close of his public examination and before his application for discharge be considered by the court, and if not in the power of the court to inflict punishment—should punishment be necessary—that the law should be so framed as to meet the case. I consider that many of the offences which enable the court to refuse or suspend a bankrupt's discharge should be made criminal. That is as regards No. 1.

1956. Have you considered which of the matters in what are called bankruptcy offences should be made criminal ?—They run into three or four items.

1957. Perhaps you have dealt with them later ?—I have done so under another section.

1958. Then, as I understand you, when you say that the conduct of the bankrupt should be considered by the Court you mean that the Court should appoint a day to consider his conduct ?—Should appoint a day, or at the end of the examination should do so. I certainly think that ought to be done because from the Reports that we got from the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy it appears that thousands do not apply for their discharge, and the question is what becomes of those people.

11 July, 1906.

1959. Exactly. Then paragraph No. 2 is :—" Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt "—that is when the Court comes to consider it—" and the conditions on which discharge should be granted, refused, or suspended should be made more stringent " ?—I say that they should be made more stringent. As I say the mere withholding of a bankrupt's discharge, as experience has proved, does not affect him in the least. It appears to be a form of punishment that has no terrors for the reckless trader, vide Report for 1904 by the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy, which shows that in the twenty-one years since the passing of the Act of 1883, out of 89,583 bankrupts, only 19,130 applied for their discharge. What has become of the other 60,000 or 70,000 ? Are they trading anywhere or are they roaming about endeavouring to get credit from someone or another, and living in that way ? It is a very unsatisfactory state of things. Then I say that any alteration of the bankruptcy laws in respect to discharges is scarcely needed. The Court, I contend, cannot compel a bankrupt to apply for his discharge, and you cannot trust to the honour of either discharged or undischarged bankrupts to come forward at any future time to pay up the balance of their unpaid debts. It is admitted that a large proportion of failures arise from imperfect book-keeping, as also from the entire absence of book-keeping ; also betting upon horse-racing ; gambling upon the Stock Exchange ; and extravagance in living. Infractions of the law, or rather violations of honest trading, such as these, should be treated as penal offences. The uncertain state of the law as regards the fraudulent removal of stock or any property, and attempting to account for the deficiency by fictitious losses or expenses requires alteration or more stringent application. I have witnessed that on more than one occasion. I was at a bankruptcy meeting some nine months ago, where the debtor was ordered to produce a cash account for the past three years of his trading—he could not do it at the time. The meeting was adjourned for another day, and he produced certain figures, and amongst those figures were the repetitions of household expenses and of numerous other expenses. A large amount of money appeared to be put down for printing purposes. I questioned the debtor as regards those items. He said, " I paid the money for certain things." When the examination was concluded a gentleman in the room came to me and said : " Are you Mr. Harris ? " I said, " Yes." He said " That man has told a lot of lies, he has never paid me the amount of money he said he has done. If I have had £5 or £6 from him, it is as much as I have had in the three years." He could not account for his deficiencies in any way because he had kept no receipts or books. Why should a man like that not keep his receipts for two or three years ; because if he had them to refer to it would enable the debtor to make out an account which he cannot do by a mere effort of memory ; it is utterly impossible.

1960. Have you ever found by experience that sometimes debtors purport to account for losses by saying they have gambled away their money when they have really put their money privately away ?—I think many of them do put their money away, or they give it to their wives. You find that the bankrupt, after his examination goes away smiling, and you see him a few weeks afterwards riding about enjoying himself. I knew the case of a man living near me who had been under the bankruptcy law for twelve months without getting his discharge. He occupied a private house, paying £50 or £55 a year rental for it. He appeared to be as well off as ever he was. The question is, how is he able to do that—where does he get his money from to do it with ?

961. You have already told us that you are not a lawyer, and you have not considered the sort of procedure in accordance with which one would inflict punishment ?—I have always maintained that the bankruptcy laws are sufficient if they are properly administered ; but there is some luke-warmness somewhere, which I cannot account for. There seems to be quite sufficient in the present laws to enable debtors to be punished ; but the essence of the mischief, in my opinion, is want of proper book-keeping. I think there ought to be an Act passed that every trader should keep a system of book-keeping peculiar to his own trade. I have spoken to many at the end of the year when they have taken stock, and I have said to them, " Have you prepared a trading account ? " They have said, " No, we do not know what you mean." Then I have said, " Have you made out a profit and loss account ?" And to that they say, " We know what we have spent." Then I have asked, " Do you draw up a balance sheet ? " and the reply has been, " Yes, we do the best we can." Then I have enquired, " Have you any accountant ?" and the answer has been, " No, we keep the books ourselves. The business takes up all our time, but very often we do it on a Sunday afternoon."

1962. (Mr. Chamberlin.) A pleasant way of spending a Sunday afternoon ?—Yes, but that has been my experience of what they have told me, and I have had a large experience in that respect.

1963. (Chairman.) Do you think it practicable to legislate in that direction with respect to small traders—men with little education ?—Of course that is a question of degree. What do you call a small trader ? Would you go below the man doing £1,500 a year or £1,000 a year.

1964. I was thinking of a very familiar type of person in the Bankruptcy Court, namely, the jobbing builder. Even if he does not go bankrupt, he keeps very bad books, or very few books ?—I should say there are quite 75 per cent. of the traders in a small way doing from £1,000 up to £2,500 or £3,000 who have no proper system of book-keeping. Then again, they are assailed by the professional money-lender. I will give you an instance of that. I was at a man's residence one day and he said to me, " I am glad you have come, I want to show you something," and he pulls out of his pocket a roll of bank notes amounting to £100, which he had had sent to him unsolicited by Isaac Gordon of Birmingham. He said to me, " What shall I do with them ? " I said, ' Send them back." He said, " But he does not say anything about repayment." I said, " You will very soon hear from him if you do not send the money back."—I said to him, " Send the money back at once." I just mention that to illustrate how they do it, and there have been no end of cases during the last three years of the professional money-lender stepping in in that way. They creep in in most cases, and it has become a very serious point in the life of a trader. If he kept proper books and exhibited a proper balance sheet he would know how he stood. If the money lender came to him or he went to the money-lender the money-lender might ask, " Where is your balance sheet ? " and on the balance sheet being shown, the money-lender might say, " You are not solvent," but he cannot do that now because the man, perhaps, does not keep proper books. It ought to be insisted upon. I think that is the root of the evil.

1965. The next paragraph in our reference relates to the realisation and administration of property and the expense of it as to which there have been complaints ?—I scarcely know what to say about that. I do not think I quite understand the point there.

1966. The first is as to the time—it has been suggested as a matter of complaint that the realisation of assets takes too long a time ?—You are bound to declare a first dividend within four months, are not you ?

1967. Yes ?—Sometimes they take six months.

1968. I know they do ?—There might be a sort of happy medium. I often think it is too long to give even four months or six months, and it can be extended. Supposing a middle course be adopted—say two months. Of course there are always a lot of small traders who cannot afford to wait so long for their dividend. It might be a decent sized one or it might be one of infinitesimal size ; in the latter case it would not affect them so much, but still they are always looking out for the result of the winding up of the estate and to get their money as soon as they can.

1969. Do you think it would be practical to realise estates in the lump quicker than at present?—It all depends on the nature of the assets to be realised. In a great many cases in our trade you have men who give a large amount of credit in the country. They are almost like tally debts—like the Scotch draper. They send goods in one week, and take a portion of the money on the amount owing, and so they go on. There was a case three years ago in Mr. Mowll's district in Canterbury. In that case there were over £3,000 owing in book debts. They get in a large proportion of them, but there was about £1,200 or £1,300 in value which sold for £75 or thereabouts. Look at the enormous loss to the creditors under such a system of trading in which a man locks up his capital to that extent. He often starts with a very small capital of £300, £400, or £500 at the outside, and he gives an enormous amount of credit. When he is pressed himself the result is that he collapses.

1970. That rather points to a vicious system of trading, and not to any defect in the machinery for realisation, because I think you said that there they got in all the good book debts ?—That is the only object I can see in getting the time reduced, that is to say, to enable the creditors to get their money quicker; but they cannot get it all at once, because you cannot get the assets in all at once. In some cases they must wait four months, and very often six. I have a case now under the Deeds of Arrangement Act which has been going on now for eighteen months. I have paid one dividend and I have got another small balance to pay — another shilling.

1971. Have you any views as to the realisation of estates from the point of view of the expense ?—I do not think that the expenses are very great myself. In my own experience I think they are very reasonable. You cannot expect people to work for nothing. I find no fault with that at all. I would as soon wind up an estate in bankruptcy as under a deed of assignment, but, of course I do not like creditors losing control of their own affairs. I should not advocate anything of that kind.

1972. As regards paragraph 5 relating to bankrupts' after-acquired property, particularly with reference to hardship to new creditors owing to trustees sweeping away all after-acquired property where there has been a second bankruptcy, what have you to say ?—They ought to take the risk the same as the former creditors. I think the fairest thing would be for both to share in what is left—the old creditors and the new creditors. That would be my way of treating it. Why should not that be so ? Why should the old creditors lose the whole of their debts when there is a chance of their getting a bit of their money back. They undertook the risk in the first instance.

1973. You would not be in favour of saying that the new creditors should have a sort of right to be paid first ?—No ; I do not see it in that light at all—I must confess I do not. My view of the matter is that they should rank pro rata according to the amount of the debts.

1974. As regards married women, it is a matter of complaint that they enjoy so much immunity under the provisions of the bankruptcy law. What have you to say on that subject ?—That has always been a very sore point with traders, but I think that an amendment is necessary, and that a married woman whether trading or not separately from her husband should be subject to the bankruptcy law. It is common knowledge that an undischarged bankrupt uses his wife's name to trade again, or adopts some other name connected with the family. We do not know how things go on. The wife may be put in possession of some funds before the husband sees the end of his career coming, and the result is that he and the family are able afterwards to go on in affluence. I think it ought to be treated in the sense that a husband's and wife's debts should be one.

1975. You know, I suppose, that very often money is settled on a wife in such a way that it cannot be touched —that is, by means of what is called a restraint on anticipation ?—It all depends at the time the settlement was made what was the position of the man who made that settlement. Was he solvent at that time ?

1976. Would you be in favour of making a married woman's income which is restrained in that way subject to administration in favour of her creditors if she become bankrupt ?—Most certainly, I should get all we could. I am quite in favour of that. A lot of "hanky-panky" goes on, and I should thinkthat that would expose some of it.

1977. Paragraph 7 relates to the avoidance of marriage settlements and securities of that kind, and I rather gather from your statement to us that you think that the law is sufficient ?—In my opinion Sections 47 and 48 of the Act of 1883 appear to be sufficient. I have read them carefully through and I think that they really meet the case.

1978. May I put a question to you just a little outside your proof, and that is that sometimes the bankrupt at the time of his marriage covenants to pay a very large sum of money, something quite beyond what he ever coulh possibly pay, and then the trustees of the settlement with whom the covenant is made are able to put in a proof for a very large sum, perhaps getting the control of the estate as happened in a recent case ?—Yes, I know that very well.

1979. Where the wife's proof overtopped that of creditors and she was able to carry adjournments of the meetings and to appoint a trustee, and all the rest of it. Would you be in favour of postponing those kind of claims to other kinds of claims ?—I should say that her claim should be postponed until the creditors, that is to say, those who had lent money to the business, had got all they could get. If there was anything left for her afterwards she should take it. I think very often a wife is under a settlement by her husband to protect herself and the children of the marriage. That is what it is done for, but it comes out of the pocket of the creditors in the long run. The debtor secures himself by making this provision. He says, "Well, if I fail my wife has got so much coming in, and I can live very comfortably afterwards."

1980. That was not quite the point I was suggesting,—the point I was suggesting was that by means of settlements sometimes an almost fictitious debt is created which is enabled to rank for proof and dividend in competition with the creditors for money or money's worth ? —Of course, if it is fictitious the claim would not be admitted.

1981. I do not mean that it is fictitious in law, but it is almost fictitious ?—Of course we want to avoid that kind of thing if possible, but to what extent does it go on ? I have not come across a case of that kind. The case we have come across has been where a man has made a settlement at his marriage on his wife of so much. That man fails, we will say, after five, six, nine or ten years. The wife is provided for and so is the family. Why should not that come into the coffers for the creditors' benefit ? It was done to secure himself as well as his wife and children but we cannot get at that money. A man, I believe, up to ten years is responsible.

1982. (Chairman.)It is not quite that, but that perhaps goes rather into a legal matter. Now then, passing on to paragraph 8 which relates to deeds of arrangement, would you favour the Committee with your views as to whether the law should be amended with the view of placing deeds of arrangement more under control than they are now ?—I do not think any alteration there is needed. I say that my experience leads me to the conclusion that creditors have a great objection to further control by the Board of Trade over deeds of arrangement. I know that as a fact, they very strongly object to any further interference. A committee of inspection is always formed in conjunction with the trustee in administration of an estate under a deed of assignment, and if all payments are certified by such a Committee an official audit by the Board of Trade is not necessary. It is the interest of the creditors to keep expenses down, so that we are not likely to spend too much money to carry out the deed or covenants of it. We keep the expenses down and get as big a dividend as we possibly can, so that I do not see the value of an audit by the Board of Trade. The committee audit the accounts, and after the disposal of the estate we see that nothing wrong is imported into them in the way of expenses. They are gone through carefully one by one.

1983. Have you often been on the committee of inspection ?—Yes, many times, and I have often been trustee—I might say dozens and dozens of times, and I am very familiar with the working of them. In fact I know that any interference by the Board of Trade would be very much deprecated by the trade, that is the drapery trade. They feel that they can conduct their own affairs themselves.

11 July, 1906.

1984. Passing on to No. 9, are you in favour of the registration of hiring agreements ?—Certainly I am—most certainly.

1985. Perhaps you could just tell us, as you have written it down, what are your views on this paragraph 9 ?—This deals with the assignment of book debts first.

1986. Just so ?—I say that they ought to be registered. Why should one creditor have an advantage over another in regard to book debts ? Assignments of any kind that give one creditor a preference over another should be registered.

1987. Would you extend that only to general assignments of book debts, or would you include the assignment of a particular book debt ?—No, all book debts connected with the business considered as assets of the business. You might as well take an assignment of the stock as an assignment of the book debts.

1988. A general assignment of all the book debts in the business is one thing, and the assignment of a particular book debt, like, for instance, money due under a building contract, is another thing. Would you go so far as to say that those ought to be registered ?—There is no rule without an exception—that probably might be an exception, but I am speaking generally of book debts, and I say that they should not be assigned without being registered under the same conditions as a Bill of Sale.

1989. It has been pointed out by some of the witnesses who have come here that if you register assignments of book debts and all the names of the customers by whom the debts are owing that that might be injurious. Do you see what I mean, that an assignment of book debts would have a schedule showing by whom all the book debts were due ?—Certainly.

1990. It has been suggested that that might prejudice the people who, as customers, would be in that schedule ?—I do not think so. I mean, not from my experience.

1991. I mean nobody particularly likes their name to appear in a register which is copied into Stubbs, and so on ?—No, I admit there is something in that ; but the principle of the thing I think is right, that it should be registered in some way or another. If it is possible to omit names that might be done. The schedule need not be published perhaps in detail. As to that, I am not prepared to say how it should be, but I certainly think the sort of particular preference of one creditor over another should be stopped. It is not often it is done. In fact, I have only known it done two or three times during all my experience in my trade.

1992. Are you speaking of an assignment of book debts ?—Yes, in our trade we think we are above that sort of thing—that is, we do not seek to get a preference.

1993. Then with regard to the registration of hiring agreements, have you anything to say with respect to that subject ?—I have been at meetings of creditors where there has been haggling over furniture. A man who has not got on very well in the world, goes to one of these hiring agreement companies, and on the hire-purchase system buys furniture to the value of £50 or £60, and before he is able to clear it off the poor fellow fails. They come down upon him and take all he has got, if he has not kept up his payments. I look upon that case as a very serious one and prejudicial to the interests of the general body of creditors.

1994. What is your remedy ; would you require that the hiring agreement should be void, unless it is registered ?—I think so. Why cannot it be registered ?

1995. That is to say, that the owner of the goods who lets them out on hire should lose his goods if he does not register ?—Certainly, he should rank as any other creditor I should say.

1996. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Do we understand that you have retired from business now ?—Yes.

1997. But you said just now that you had one case going on at present ?—You see there are some old affairs that I have to wind up as trustee. They may last, and they probably will, till the end of this year, until I make my report to the Board of Trade. I have three or four to wind up by the end of the year. That explains the position.

1998. You have had large experience in dealing with debtors' estates ?—I have.

1999. Will you tell the Committee whether, in your experience, a good deal of the faults of the working—or the so-called faults of the working—of the Bankruptcy Act are brought about by creditors showing no interest whatever in the winding up of a bankrupt concern ?—I think the creditors take a deal of interest in the winding up.

2000. Some witnesses have told us that some creditors take no interest whatever. If they make a bad debt they do not trouble about it, and there is an end of the matter—that is not your experience ?—It is rather a funny remark to make.

2001. You say that is not your experience ?—There might be a few little things of that kind when the debts are only up to £10, and they do not care which way it goes, or whether they get a dividend or not ; but my experience is that we are very chary, for the most part, as regards any matter either in bankruptcy or under a deed of assignment or even in a composition. We do not want a man to make a composition unless we know that it is a fair and proper one and that he really is in difficulties. Of course we examine into his affairs before we take the composition.

2002. I am not talking about you personally ?—No, but I am speaking in the first person.

2003. I have met you several times myself, and therefore I know you take plenty of pains. But I want simply to get it before the Committee, whether in your judgment you think there is a very serious lack of care taken by creditors in the winding up of insolvent estates ?—That is not at all my experience, and I say it is rather the other way about.

2004. In your proof you say that there are very serious evils in the working of the Act, and you state that the root of the evil, in your judgment, is the non-keeping of accounts ?—I do.

2005. What is the actual remedy which you suggest ?—As I said to the Chairman, proper books should be kept, and the keeping of them should be made compulsory if possible, by Act of Parliament.

2006. Supposing they are not kept, what is to be the result ; would you imprison people who did not keep books of account ?—I think there ought to be a penal clause ; there ought to be some arrangement, because the man is a kind of robber in mufti who gets your goods and does not intend to pay for them.

2007. But you have stated that in your opinion at least 75 per cent. of the traders do not keep proper books ?—That is my experience in our trade.

2008. Of course in your varied business you have a number of small customers ?—A great many.

2009. Do not you find that some of these people are not competent to keep books ?—They can always get people to keep them for them, or show them how to keep them if they will take the trouble. There is many a clerk in a counting-house who, for a couple of guineas a year, would come and keep a small trader's books, and keep them properly ; but they will not spend the money, and that is what I find fault with.

2010. Do you differentiate at all between what you call a fraudulent debtor and what you would say was an unfortunate debtor ?—I do. There is a difference between the two. I say that a fraudulent debtor is he who does not care what comes of his estate as long as he can live in luxury. A man like that will buy goods and take any amount of credit. If you stop him at a certain amount he will go somewhere else. For a reference he gives a house where he takes his full 2½ per cent., and that reference is always satisfactory, and enables him to get credit. A man who has got only £100 capital I will guarantee in three or four months will get £400 or £500 credit, and perhaps more

2011. Is not that the fault of the houses ?—Not wholly so—I know there is a good deal of competition, and we are apt to give credit where we should not do so 2012. You speak about the violation of honest trading at the end of paragraph 2 ?—Yes.

2013. And you instance betting upon horse racing ?—Yes.

2014. And Stock Exchange speculations ?—Yes.

2015. And you would have those treated as penal offences ?—I should, as I come across them frequently.

2016. Where are you going to draw the line as to what is gambling on the Stock Exchange, and what is business ?—A man will tell you sometimes at an examination in a private meeting of his creditors—"I have lost so much on the Stock Exchange," but I have heard by side winds that that man has been betting. I have investigated the charge against him, and found that it is quite correct. The debtor at first has denied it, but when I have brought up evidence against him he has admitted that he has been betting.

2017. A man might buy some Stock Exchange securities with the idea that they were going to be enhanced in value—would you consider that gambling ?—He wants to make money in some way or other than by his own proper trade.

2018. Supposing a man speculates in cotton because he thinks that the market is going up, would you call that gambling ?—That would only appertain to a large trader, and not to the class of trader we have been mixed up with. They would not gamble on the Cotton Exchange.

2019. Surely there may be a class of traders who buy, for instance, a large quantity of sugar, because they think the market is going up. Now assume the market goes down and the speculation goes against them, and they are brought into bankruptcy through it, would you call that equal to gambling ?—I should—it is a species of gambling.

2020. Only you would treat it as a penal offence, you know—it wants to be carefully considered, does not it ?—To go back to the Bankruptcy Laws, why do they withhold a man's discharge or suspend it for so many years ? What is the offence ? Certainly the offence that you are now speaking of.

2021. (Chairman.) Or one of them.

2022. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Just one question as regard the assignment of book debts. You say you would make it an offence to assign book debts to one creditor ?—I would not exactly say that it should be an offence, but I say that one creditor should not have a preference over another. Book debts are almost like stock to a trader.

2023. Yes, but of course you are aware that in some businesses it is absolutely essential to a man continuing business successfully to be able to get credit by pledging some portion of his book debts ?—Then how about his other creditors—how are they to fare ? Supposing a creditor says, "I have gone so far, I shall not give any further credit," and the account is stopped; he may be still secured by the book debts. Why should not that be known to the other creditors ?

2024. Take a man who is in a large venture—he has building property, we will say, and he has to get a certain amount of credit upon that building—do you mean to say that you think it ought to be made a penal offence for that man to give the wholesale house or the manufacturer he is doing business with an assignment of his property ?—I do not know what happens in the building trade, but I do know this much, that every week a certain class of solicitors are approached by their clients for further moneys to go on building a block of houses with. They have got them under their thumb all the while, but in what way I really cannot tell you.

2025. The only object of my question is this, that while you want to protect the public against fraud, you want to be careful not to inflict penalities which will handicap the honest trader in an instance of that kind. Then as regards hiring agreements. You speak about people who bought furniture from certain houses on the hire system, but you know there are first class people—first class sellers and first class buyers—who do not consider it at all a discredit to buy, for example, the "Times Encyclopædia" on those terms ?—That is quite right, I have done the same thing myself.

2026. Or to buy gold watches or motor cars or things of that sort on that system. Do not you want to classify these things a little bit ?—I would not go in for motor cars, but some years ago I was induced to try an experiment of selling furniture on the hire system. I sent in a parcel of about £400 worth of furniture. In less than twelve months the man to whom I sent it said to me—he was not in our trade—"Mr. Harris, I cannot get on; you must take your furniture back." I said, "All right, I will take it back." We sold it again, and lost about £140 on it. That was my experience of that, and I dropped the hire-purchase system.

2027. I simply wanted to draw out the distinction as between the honest seller and the honest buyer, both as regards the assignment of book debts, and also as regards the registration of hiring agreements ?—Of course many a trader may be honest although he does not keep proper books, but the ultimate result is that his honesty disappears when he finds himself in trouble.

2028. (Mr. Richardson.) As to book-keeping, have you found that generally in the estates that you have been connected with in the winding-up, the traders have kept proper books up to a certain period rather than have not kept books at all ?—No, that is not my experience.

2029. It is not ?—No, that is where I am so dead against the trader

2030. You say they have not kept books at all ?—Not properly at all.

2031. That is another question, but at some time they have kept them properly ?—No, not properly. I have never found a perfect system of book-keeping in our trade amongst the smaller traders.

2032. But when you have been inquiring into a small bankrupt's estate, have you gone back through the whole of his history from the beginning, and through his books from the beginning; or only for the last year or two ? My contention is that the bulk of traders, especially drapers, will keep books, and the better class of shopkeepers will keep books, for a certain time properly, and then cease to keep books. My object in asking you this question is to ascertain whether in your opinion those people who have kept books properly, but have ceased to keep books, should not be more amenable to punishment than a man who has not kept books at all ?—In my own experience I have found no proper system of book-keeping in our trade amongst the small class of trader. You see, we do not do a very high class trade at our place. The traders that we deal with are generally up to about £9,000 or £10,000 a year turnover. That is the maximum. We have very few accounts where the turnover is very much bigger. We have some, but they are only tentative accounts. They do not last very long. We may have a cheap line to offer Mr. Chamberlin, £300 or £400, and if he thinks it is cheap he may buy it, but we have no regular accounts with the big houses. The most of our trade has been done with people who have a turnover up to about £10,000.

2034. Is it your opinion that that was a better system than the one that is so encouraged now, of hire-purchase ?—It is. They pay through the nose for it, and the stuff is not so good.

2035. Is it your opinion, as it is mine, that the object of the hire-purchase system is to tempt people who cannot afford to buy to purchase goods ?—Undoubtedly it is.

2036. And is it your opinion that the registration of hire-purchase agreements would to some extent stop that pernicious system of trading ?—I think perhaps it would. I think I must agree with you that it would have that effect.

2037. I do not think I ought to say it is a "pernicious" system ?—I do. I am on all fours with you as regards that.

2038. But do you think if these hire-purchase agreements were registered it would have the effect of stopping to some extent that system ?—It is a system that induces a lot of young people to get married who really cannot afford to get married.

2039. But they got married under just the same circumstances thirty or forty years ago ?—I do not think they did.

2040. Yes, they married earlier then than they do now ?—I do not quite agree with you.

2041. I am quite certain that thirty or forty years ago young men married earlier than they do now ?—They made more money then.

2042. No, they made less money, but the system of trade was undoubtedly this, that an ordinary man—a young man— a working man or a man in a shop, or in whatever state of life he was, could go to a tradesman, if he was in good repute, and could get credit to a reasonable amount ?—I would not mind trusting a working man for £5, but some would trust him for £10, and some would trust him for £50.

2043. (Mr. Addison.) About book-keeping, do you suggest that an Act of Parliament might prescribe what books should be kept ? Would you suggest in the trade with which you are familiar what books should be prescribed ?—You want a very small supply of books—it is merely a question of trouble. You can do it in a very simple way.

2044. Just name the books ?—You must have a ledger to keep your accounts in ; you must have a cash book which shall show on one side what money you receive, and on the other side what you do with it—whether you bank it or whether you pay it away in expenses or otherwise. As for cheques of course they will always account for themselves. Then you will require a stock book for your purchases. On one side you put all you buy and on the other side all you sell. You want to show what your profit is and whether that is sufficient to meet your expenses. Then again the trader ought to take stock.

2045. The books in the trade with which you are familiar you suggest ought to be the ledger, cash book, and stock book ?—The ledger, cash book, and stock book, that is all. I think it is very simple ; you could start a man in book-keeping with an outlay on books of about 10s. or so, and applies to small traders only ; larger businesses would require a more extended system.

2047. How would you suggest that ledger should be kept—the small shopkeeper's ledger ?—Of course you would have your ledger and at one end of it you would have a space showing where you buy your stuff and at the other end of it you would have a space for your customers' accounts—whether they paid every month or every quarter. You only want one ledger for it. You could open an account, for instance, with Messrs. Chamberlin, of Norwich, showing that you owed them so much for goods. You would have the invoice. You would enter it into your stock book and post it from there to your ledger.

2049. You have answered my question as to that. Now as to deeds of arrangement I see you have had a good deal of experience. Do you find a difficulty owing to the three months in which a deed of assignment is now an act of bankruptcy ?—Yes, I think that the money ought to be distributed at a much earlier period. Why should we wait three months until the act of bankruptcy has expired ?

2050. Because as the law now stands you cannot bind one single dissentient creditor ?—No, or two, or more.

2051. Do you think that that is undesirable and that where the majority of the trade creditors want to wind up that estate under a deed there should be some power to bind the minority ?—Certainly.

2052. It is strongly objected by many that there should be no power to bind the minority without some means by which that minority could test the question whether they should be bound. Do you think it would be right that, where the great majority of creditors approved, the deed they might apply to the court to bind the dissentient minority ?—I do, because in my experience I find that those who stand out of the deeds are a mere infinitesimal proportion—in fact in nine cases out of ten they would not total £50. They are sometimes the means of the estate going into bankruptcy, and they keep the matter open in a spiteful way I consider.

2054. He stands out ?—Yes.

2056. So as to enable the trustee to deal with the property within the three months ?—Just so. I think it is very unfair from my experience of deeds of arrangement that two or three small creditors should upset the whole bag of tricks.

2057. I quite agree with you. There was one question which I do not think you quite understood, and that was this, whether there should not be some power to realise an estate speedily. You have just referred to the difficulty with the three months under the deed ?—I did not quite understand it.

2058. My idea is that not only in bankruptcy, but under a deed the goodwill of a business or something that might be sold advantageously depreciates through delay—do you find that that is so ?—Yes.

2059. And therefore there are some estates in which if you could sell the property or some property within two or three days after suspension you could sell it more advantageously than after delay ?—Certainly.

2060. Do you find the present system as to proxies, requiring a proxy to be written in the hand of the creditor himself, a troublesome one—have you had any experience of that ?—I have not had any great experience of that, but I have got over those matters very well—I have not had any trouble in that direction.

2062. Do you not think it would be a great improvement in the law if in all cases the report of the official receiver as to the conduct of a bankrupt should be brought to the notice of the court whether there is an application for discharge or not ?—Yes, that is what I contend should be done, because if he has done something that is radically wrong, and his discharge is suspended or not granted at all, what is the reason—is it not on account of some serious matter that he has not got his discharge ?

2063. I presume your impression is that the fact of a large number of debtors not applying for discharge rather implies that they have committed some offences and are afraid of coming under the review of the Court ?—That is what I think. Why is it there are so many ?

2065. Do not you think that it would be a great advantage if the court when dealing with the conduct of the debtor should have a power to inflict punishment in cases where the court thinks some offence has been committed ?—By the "court" you mean the registrar. I think so, I think it would be a desirable alteration in some cases. I do not mean in serious offences, which should be dealt with by a higher tribunal.

2066. You would give him a summary power to deal with minor offences in bankruptcy ?—Just so.

2068. If it were seen that the punishment was speedy and certain ?—Yes, and there is one point that I would like to mention to the Committee and that is in reference to the stocktaking. The debtors very often take their stock and when they come before the creditors they are asked: "Did you take stock last year ?" "Yes." "Where is your stock-book ?" "I destroyed it." "Did not you total it up to see what it came to." Then he says: "I did, but I did not think it necessary to keep it." Why should it not be kept for a certain period, say, three years, and all receipts as well for the same period.

2070. Would it be sufficient in your opinion if the judge were bound to refuse a discharge to every debtor who had not kept books ?—I say that not getting his discharge has no terrors for that class of debtor.

2071. Under a new law the undischarged bankrupt would be in a different category I take it from an undischarged bankrupt at the present time, because he would have been adjudicated upon, and the fact that the court had declined to give his discharge would be a distinct stigma upon him ?—I think that they all ought to come up.

2073. In regard to bankrupts who trade under names other than their own, does not that rather point to the desirability of establishing some system by which a partner in a firm or any person who trades under a name other than his own should register it so that creditors could ascertain by the inspection of the register who the individual actually trading is ?—That has been agitated for some years.

2074. Yes; and Select Committees of Parliament have made recommendations on it ?—I have not noticed that but I know in our trade it has been agitated for some years.

2075. Are you in favour of that ?—I am.

2076. Strongly ?—I am. I will tell you how it is. Some large city houses have branches and it would not do to have their names up—firms like Cook & Son, Pawsons & Leafs, and others—they must have another name up.

2077. (Mr. Smith.) I understand that your experience is chiefly confined to the drapery trade ?—Yes.

2078. I believe that is a highly organised trade with regard to bankruptcy and insolvency matters ?—Yes.

2079. They have their own accountants agents and solicitors ?—Yes.

2080. And they work together and the result is very satisfactory ?—It has been.

2081. You would not say the same with regard to other trades with which you have no experience ?—I have no experience of other trades and I could not speak for them.

2082. Therefore you would not advocate legislation with reference to one trade. You understand that you have to take a very large and varied experience of industry, drapers only being a very small proportion of the whole ?—I do know that the drapery trade is a very huge trade—one of the biggest.

2083. Taking the whole trade of the country, it is only a comparatively small portion of the whole trade of the country, and you would not apply the same principle to all trades and to all trade creditors ?—I do not think you could do so, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with, or versed in, other kinds of trades to say.

2084. You have practically no experience of the abuses that have arisen under deeds of arrangement in your trade ?—No, I cannot say that I have. There is only one point that I have put down with regard to deeds of arrangement, and that is, that the trustee, where he is a stranger, should find security, the same as in bankruptcy.

2085. Would you require any provision as to unclaimed dividends being paid into a banking account ?—I generally keep them for two years, and then I think the Board of Trade wake me up as to what has become of the money—that has been my experience.

2086. Supposing the dividends are not claimed, what becomes of them—do you keep the money ?—No, they go to the Board of Trade, or they are put into the Bank of England under a special fund. We have to make a return every year to the Board of Trade; and, if there is a balance in hand, it is bound to be paid to the Board of Trade, or to the Bank of England to the account of the Board of Trade.

2087. Perhaps you have no experience where balances are unpaid ?—Yes, I have: I have got two that have now got balances.

2090. If it could be shown to you that there are a large number of trustees throughout the country who hold unpaid dividends which are not paid into a special account, but are retained by the trustees, would you approve of any legislation compelling them to account for these balances ?—Most certainly, they have no right to retain the money, because they get paid for their duties.

2091. Supposing a question arose as to the administration of a trustee under a deed, where it was alleged that he had behaved improperly, would you give any authority to investigate in such a case ?—I do not think that the trustee should be appointed unless he is a straightforward man. He ought to be known to the creditors.

2092. In the drapery trade, you have your own trustees ?—We have only trustees who are honest and straight-forward men—men of substance.

2093. Men who are generally accountants ?—Generally accountants.

2094. Members of the society of chartered accountants. You have some guarantee for their honesty; but taking trustees throughout the country, do not you think there ought to be some legislation requiring trustees to be called to account if necessary ?—In our trade we like to take assignments of all property; and a person, such as the secretary of a company or counting house manager, has a power of attorney. I would not let in every man. If a man whom I did not know, and had no confidence in, was appointed, I would put the estate in bankruptcy.

2095. In that way you secure satisfactory results ?—I consider you do.

2097. To bring them to account ?—Yes.

2098. I suppose, in your trade, if a debtor has been guilty of a criminal offence, or an offence which you suggest should be treated as criminal, as a rule creditors would put the estate in bankruptcy ?—Yes; but then the Board of Trade ought to take it up where it is a very bad case.

2099. The Board of Trade have no power to take it up, outside the bankruptcy laws ?—But surely it could be done on the recommendation of the registrar or the Official Receiver.

2100. They have no such power at present. Would you recommend that the Board of Trade should take up all cases where criminal offences had been committed by a debtor where his affairs were being wound up under a deed of arrangement ?—I think so; I had a case some eleven or twelve years ago where we had a very large bad debt of over £4,000. I meant to go in for a prosecution, and I got evidence up to a certain point: but it fell through: I never could make out how it did fall through. I frequently saw that man riding about on horseback every morning before he commenced business. He kept a mistress, although he had got a wife and two or three children 2101. Would you approve of some means being taken to bring a debtor before the court, if there was any suspicion that he had been guilty of dishonest conduct ?—Yes, I am very strong on that point.

11 July, 1906.

2102. You mentioned an experience you had at a meeting where a debtor had given a fictitious account of his losses ?—Yes.

2103. Was there anything done in that case ?—No.

2104. Was it under the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes, in bankruptcy.

2105. It was a bankruptcy ?—We had a duffer of a trustee there: he was a regular jackanapes.

2106. Was the Official Receiver present ?—He was present; but I will not mention names, because I know him very well. He was a very able man, and he managed the case very well as regards the examination; but when the registrar ordered an account to be filed in a certain time, the man could not possibly do it. He had not got the means to do it except by fictitious items being put forward. He had put down a large amount to housekeeping twice over.

2107. About the registration of book debts, you were asked a question by Mr. Chamberlin as to whether you would advise the registration of book debts which had been incurred for such articles as motor cars, etc. Do you see any reason, if a person buys a motor car on credit and if the seller sells on credit, and then goes and pawns that debt to a banker, or anyone else, why that should not be published for the benefit of other creditors ?—It is a fraud, and I should stop a fraud if it were one.

2108. Do you see any reason why it should not be published ?—I see no reason. I thought it was a very weak observation that was made with regard to the names of creditors appearing in the schedule of debts.

2109. Supposing a system could be devised whereby you had a registration of the fact that a man had executed an assignment of a certain amount of book debts and supposing that were published without the names being given, would that he satisfactory to you ?—I think so, because it would show by the publication of the debtor's name, the fact of his having given a preference to another creditor.

2110. You only want publicity as to the fact that the man has given a charge over his estate ?—Yes, and I think that should be so.

2111. Why should the fact that he has assigned his debts be made public for the benefit of his creditors ?—I will tell you why. Supposing at that particular time our debt was £100. Then a firm got the debtor's book debts assigned to them without our knowing about it. Our account might in ignorance of the assignment go on increasing and instead of being £100 in the month of July it might be in September £500; whereas if we had known of the transaction by its being registered we should not have given that increased amount of credit.

2113. With regard to the present procedure under the bankruptcy law, I think you have said that you are satisfied with it on the whole ?—I am satisfied with it on the whole.

2115. With regard to the time which proceedings occupy have you any complaint to make as to calling meetings ?—I will tell you where they ought to be made easier—that is in getting the receiving order. Some three or four years ago a client of ours had to go before his creditors. He did not come to us as being his largest creditor, but he went to an accountant in the City of London, a sharp practitioner. He went likewise to a notorious solicitor. The meeting was called at the accountant's office, and I went there with about eight or nine others. I said, "Is the debtor here ?" the accountant said, "No, he cannot come; he is not well." I said, "Do you not think you had better telegraph to know if he can come and we will adjourn the meeting until the afternoon." He said: "The fact is he cannot come; he is too unwell." Then the meeting went on. The accountant said: "There is enough to pay 4s. in the pound to the creditors." I said: "I am not going to take 4s. in the pound," and I said, "Has not he got any account of his trading ?" The accountant said: "No, he has not; you may either take the 4s. or leave it." I felt that I was not going to be bullied like that and I vacated the chair. I could not get hold of the debtor, and it was six weeks before we got a receiving order. They had no substituted service at all.

2116. I think that was comparatively early, was it not—six weeks ?—I do not think so. I thought six weeks was a long time; I would make it less than that.

2117. Then I do not know what you would say to a period of two years ?—The result was that the money in hand was all dissipated. He paid his wife £100 which he said he owed her, which I believe was untrue, and we got nothing.

2119. Does he call generally a meeting; before the first meeting of creditors is arranged is there a preliminary meeting called ?—No; we get a receiving order and the next thing is that we have to wait for the meeting to appoint our trustee.

2122. You have no complaint to make in regard to that ?—No, only I think the time is long before we get to work.

2123. That is what I want to diminish, by giving you some opportunity of being consulted if it were possible before the first meeting of creditors. I suppose your answer would be that the first meeting of creditors should be held earlier ?—You cannot get it much under a week after the receiving order, can you ?

2124. I merely wanted to know whether you had any suggestion to make, or any complaint with regard to the existing practice ?—That is the only complaint I have to make; I have had one or two cases like that. Before we could get hold of money in the debtor's hand he has decamped, or it had been squandered away.

2125. That is before the receiving order ?—Yes.

2126. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to the assignment of book debts, is it your experience that the assignment of a book debt, or of more than one book debt, is evidence of the insolvency of the person making the assignment ?—It is evidence that he cannot pay his accounts when they are due.

2127. I wanted to know whether, in your experience, where a book-debt, or more than one, has been assigned, you would regard it as evidence of insolvency ?—I should say it was evidence of impending insolvency.

2128. It is your experience that it is ?—That is what one is apt to think in one's own mind. You say, "Why does a man do that ?" He gets goods from us and the other account is stopped. We are let in and the other gets out.

2129. (Chairman.) You have often acted as chairman of meetings of creditors, I mean for the purposes of a deed ? Yes ; hundreds of times.

2130. And then you have been trustee afterwards ?—Yes, trustee afterwards, of course, where we have been the largest creditors.

2131. Do you find any difficulty, either at the meeting or afterwards as trustee, with regard to deciding upon who are creditors and who are not—I mean if a man puts in a large claim at the meeting ?—Of course the claim is always investigated. The claims cannot be investigated at the time ; it must be done afterwards when you have got into working order. I have always avoided taking an assignment to prevent the man committing an act of bankruptcy. I think we ought to have a meeting of creditors first and then decide what is the best to be done. If, in our discretion, he should make a composition, we take the composition if there is no evidence of fraud existing anywhere, or he has come to grief through misfortune. In such a case, instead of putting the machinery of the bankruptcy law in motion, we take our own deed of assignment, and wind him up in our own way.

2132. But you ascertain afterwards if there is any question about a claim ?—Certainly, because it affects the dividend very much.

2133. It was only passing through my mind with reference to the majority binding the minority. Is it your idea that that would require any investigation ?—We go on just the same realising the estate and we keep the dividend in hand until they apply for it.

2134. (Mr. Addison.) When you said that the husband and wife should be one, were you expressing the view of the trader who supplied the goods or the husband who is asked to pay for them ?—Of the trader.

2135. You are expressing his view ?—Yes, I am.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 18th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HARRY LLOYD PRICE, called; and Examined.

2136. (Chairman.) I think you are a fellow, vice-president, and member of the Council of the Society of Accountants and Auditors which was incorporated in 1885, and that you are a member of the firm of Harry L. Price & Co., incorporated accountants, 15, Fountain Street, Manchester ?—That is so.

2137. I think you are familiar with the order of reference to the Committee, and would you kindly, as you are familiar with the numbers of the order of reference, give us your views upon paragraph 1. I do not think I need read it to you—referring to the question of the investigation of the debtor's conduct ?—Yes, I take it, sir, that it is not your wish that I should read any part of the proof which I sent in.

2138. I think it is generally convenient to the Committee that you should incorporate everything in your answer that is in your proof ?—I may say in relation to that, that I raised a question as to the precise meaning of the term "insolvent debtor" which you were good enough to clear up subsequently. I understand an insolvent debtor to whom you refer to be one against whom a petition has been filed and a receiving order made, but who has not been adjudicated bankrupt, and the terms of reference ask whether any alteration in the law affecting the consideration of the conduct of such insolvent debtor is considered necessary or desirable. I cannot say that I think it is. Adjudication follows a receiving order except in cases where a composition scheme or some scheme of arrangement is carried through. The debtor's conduct has been the subject of investigation by the Official Receiver in his preliminary examination and otherwise, and inasmuch as the Official Receiver would inevitably oppose the confirmation of any scheme if there was anything in the conduct of the debtor rendering it undesirable in the public interests that such a scheme should go forward, then adjudication would follow and the conduct of the debtor would come before the Court thus. But I do not know that the conduct of the debtor need be otherwise considered than is provided at present by the Act and Rules.

2139. It has been suggested before this Committee that certain matters which involve the suspension or withholding of the discharge—such as not keeping proper books, or trading with knowledge of insolvency—should be made the subject of actual punishment. Have you considered that question ?—Yes, I am strongly of opinion that the non-keeping of proper accounts should be made the subject of punishment by the Court, just as offences arising out of the keeping of accounts are punished. Thus, if in the investigation of a debtor's accounts it appears from those accounts that he has failed to disclose certain assets he is punished for the non-disclosure of those assets, and the very books he has kept may be the means of bringing him to punishment. It does appear to me, therefore, that if he seeks to conceal assets, as I have no doubt many debtors do, by not keeping books, that ought to be made an offence, because the books are the material upon which mainly you have to judge whether a man's trading has been honest or not.

2140. It has also been suggested to us that, in order to make that provision work justly a debtor ought to have some information as to what books he is required by law to keep. Do you think that practicable or desirable ? I think it would be undesirable to fix the precise form of books, but I do suggest that a debtor should be compelled by law to keep certain specific information, and I have suggested in my proof that however roughly it be kept makes no matter so long as it is kept. In other words, that he should have in some form a complete record of his purchases and sales ; a record of his cash receipts and payments, and that once a year at least he should state in an inventory his stock-in-trade, and lists of his debtors and creditors. Those figures would enable any trustee or Official Receiver subsequently to build up accounts. I doubt if a debtor—an illiterate debtor—could be taught, by any sample accounts which you may prescribe, to keep accounts in a correct double entry form, but if he provided the raw material then we could build up the necessary accounts from that.

2141. And as regards such offences as trading with a knowledge of insolvency, or making away with assets by gambling and so forth, do you think that those ought to be made punishable also ?—In so far as losses by gambling are concerned that, to my mind, comes within the description of reckless trading and should be punishable. As to trading with a knowledge of insolvency the difficulty always arises of proving what was in the man's mind. I have found that practically insurmountable. I may say, in that relation, that some years ago a Trade Protection Society, with which I have the honour to be connected, set out to prosecute fraudulent debtors and they had in view this as one of the objects at which they aimed—to punish men who traded with a knowledge of insolvency, but they failed all along the line in every prosecution they undertook to bring home to the Court the fact that the debtor knew that he was insolvent.

2142. Then, lastly, on this question would you recommend that the conduct of the debtor should be considered and pronounced upon by the Court whether he applies for discharge or not ?—I think that very desirable.

2144. And have you at all considered the question, assuming that those things were made punishable offences, whether the Bankruptcy Court should inflict the punishment or whether it should be by means of a prosecution before a magistrate or a judge and jury ?—I think the more summary it is made the better. I think that the County Court Judge who is an impartial judge, and who has acquired a knowledge of all the facts in the course of the public examination, and so on, is well qualified to deal with offences of that kind.

2145. Now the second paragraph of our Reference refers to a kindred subject which you have been good enough incidentally to deal with in what you have been saying, and the only other point on which I should like you to refer to it is as to whether the present conditions on which the discharge is granted should be made more stringent—for instance, that it should be refused altogether where the man has not kept proper books ?—Preferably I would punish a man for thus offending, and as soon as may be thereafter I would rehabilitate him as a citizen—not so much for himself, although that has to be considered—but in view of his possible future relations to the community.

2146. Would you recommend any sort of provision by which the bankrupt should be made to give an account of his conduct periodically afterwards ?—I think that that would be desirable, though its benefits in some directions may be doubted. I think whilst a man is undischarged every effort should be made to bring him to account. In other words, I would seek to make discharge more valuable and more desirable than it appears to be at present. Undischarged bankrupts seem to set very little store upon the fact that they are undischarged and it would be a good plan if the law were to seek to make him so unhappy in his undischarged condition that he would tend to seek the relief of the Courts. I would in that relation make it an offence for a man not to proclaim his condition from the housetops—I would compel him if he has traded again, on every invoice and letter form or in whatever way you like, to declare to the whole world from whom he is seeking credit that he is an undischarged bankrupt. You will find then that undischarged bankrupts will very much more freely than now tend to apply for their discharge, and the public convenience would be served materially in that respect.

2147. Then the fourth question that we have to consider is whether the existing provision of the Bankruptcy Act relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of the bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made. Perhaps you can tell us the result of your experience on that question ?—I have not found that any inconvenience results from the present arrangement. The assets in the main consist of stock, fixtures, machinery and book debts. The book debts are immediately applied for by the Official Receiver and therefore you could not expedite realisation of that asset. The stock is, as a rule, realised by the Official Receiver where it is of a perishable nature, and where it is not of a perishable nature there is no pressing necessity for its realisation. It sometimes happens that a business can be sold as a going concern. It also happens, inasmuch as even Official Receivers have not the amplest knowledge of every trade, that they have not the facilities for realising every class of stock to the best possible advantage. Among trustees there is a tendency in the direction of specialising. You will find that one class of trustees deal with drapery stocks, another with grocery stocks, another with boots and shoes, and each of those men in his own particular branch has facilities for disposing of stocks-in-trade which an Official Receiver cannot be expected to have, and the trustee may subsequently be able to dispose of them to better advantage than if they were needlessly forced in advance of the election of the trustee.

2149. Then the next matter which you have kindly considered is the present state of the law by which the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt claims for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after-acquired property. Do you think that that law should be modified in any and what way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy, or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after-acquired property from the bankrupt; I think you have considered that matter somewhat fully ?—Yes, it has been within my knowledge that very considerable hardship has been wrought upon the second body of creditors where an undischarged bankrupt has again been made a bankrupt; and where creditors have quite honestly and innocently given credit to such a man, in my opinion, they ought to be protected, to the extent of having those assets, which they have supplied, divided for the payment of their debts, or materially so.

2150. Then as regards creditors of an undischarged bankrupt who know of the bankrupt's previous failure ?—Then I think they should take the consequences where they have, with deliberation, granted credit to a man whom they knew to be an undischarged bankrupt. I would without hesitation bar them from participation in the after-acquired property.

arrangement ought to be modified ?—Yes. I have dealt with the same fully in my proof.

2156. Your proof does not go down on our shorthand note ?—I beg your pardon. Then I think I may say that the Board of Trade should have the right to audit trustees' accounts under deeds of arrangement as they have in bankruptcy. Some audit is necessary, and I know of no other efficient authority to undertake the audit than the Board of Trade. That is rendered necessary, as we know, by frequent misfeasances on the part of trustees. I think, further, that every trustee under a deed of arrangement, should, as in bankruptcy, be compelled to give a fidelity bond that he will deal honestly with the assets of the estate, and that appears to be necessary for the same reason as I have alleged, that there are not infrequently frauds on the part of trustees under such deeds, and it is a matter of public policy, as far as may be, to guard against the loss which would in consequence of those frauds fall upon the creditors.

2157. To whom would you suggest the bond should be given ?—It should be given to some nominee of the creditors, but preferably, I think, to the Board of Trade, as in bankruptcy.

2158. Then as regards any other control over the estate —I mean as to administration and so forth—would you recommend any change in the law as regards that ?—Administration in what direction ?

2160. It exists in the Court of Chancery, but it is only exerciseable by a creditor in the nature of a law suit ?—Does it not exist in the county court ? I ask that because, quite recently in two or three cases, I have had occasion, on behalf of creditors, to instruct solicitors to take proceedings against recalcitrant trustees who were guilty as we thought, of mal-administration, and those proceedings have been taken in each case on the equity side of the County Court, and have been considered effective as well as inexpensive.

2162. So that you do not think that any further provision of the law is necessary in that respect ?—Not beyond the extension which I have referred to, because if resort were had to the Board of Trade I imagine that the law would have to be set in motion in some form to compel the due performance of duties.

2164. I see that in your observations which you have been kind enough to furnish, you have made some suggestion with reference to the election of a trustee under a deed of arrangement ?—Yes.

2165. Would you kindly favour the Committee with your views on that ?—In my view of these matters, the election of the trustee ought, as in bankruptcy, to be a matter for the creditors. It is not so at present. It is true that meetings are frequently called without any deed having been entered into, but it is equally true that in a large number of cases deeds are taken in advance of meetings, and without the creditors being in any way consulted as to the person who shall take, on their behalf, the office of trustee. What happens is that the debtor's solicitor, actuated by a desire to retain the business, it may be, will execute the deed in advance of a meeting to his own nominee, who is not the nominee of the creditors, and I always hold, that in the event of any conflict of interests arising between creditors and debtor the trustee cannot be expected—being the nominee of the debtor's solicitor—to act impartially as between debtor and creditors. I would, therefore, suggest that there should be a provision that every trustee shall be elected by a duly convened meeting of creditors. His election may be upon a majority in value, as in bankruptcy. I think that is a very convenient method of ascertaining the wishes of creditors.

2166. Just to work that out a little—"Duly convened" —Who would you suggest should convene the meeting ? Of course, in bankruptcy, there has been a receiving order and there is an official of the Court who convenes the meetings directed by the Court ?—When I used the words "duly convened," perhaps I was speaking in legal terms, and was not thinking of the fact that a debtor sometimes himself convenes the meeting, and that there are no means of ascertaining whether it has been as we should call it, "duly convened." I do not know that you can put upon anyone outside an official the duty to convene the meeting.

2167. No ?—In ordinary practice the debtor's solicitor convenes the meetings—probably in 90 per cent. of the cases it is either the debtor's solicitor or the creditor's accountant who does so.

2169. And is there any practical difficulty in ascertaining the amount of their claims—whether their claims are liable to reduction or increase ?—There is a difficulty, because no one at the meeting has, as a rule, any knowledge of the claims of creditors beyond the debtor.

2170. Then, lastly, inasmuch as the deed of assignment is by the debtor himself, have you considered at all what kind of provision of the law would be required to compel the debtor to assign his property to a trustee nominated by the creditors if he did not choose to do so ?—I do not think you could apply compulsion. I think you could only go the length of saying that if the deed of assignment is executed it shall be to a nominee approved by the creditors.

2172. Then the last matter that you have dealt with is whether the minority of the creditors should be bound by the decision of the majority; on that I apprehend it would follow if they were that they could not present Bankruptcy petitions. What is your view on that ?—There is a constantly recurring practice among small creditors and occasionally among larger, of refraining from assenting to the deed not because, I think, they object to that particular method of administration, but in the hope that they may be able later on, either upon the trustee or the debtor, to levy a species of blackmail. May I illustrate what I mean by giving an instance of a case I had not very long ago. The liabilities were over £3,000. Every creditor assented, except one for £240. He at the outset intimated in writing that he did not intend to assent to the deed and would present a Bankruptcy petition. The other large creditors saw him and came back with the information that they thought he would in due course assent. The estate was administered, and that dissentient creditor two and a half months after the deed filed a petition upon which a receiving order was made, and the solicitor's clerk after the receiving order was made expressed regret that I had not seen fit even at the last moment to offer him 10s. in the £ for his debt—that that had been his hope, and that they did not want a receiving order; that is a state of things which is not infrequently met with, and I say it is grossly unfair to the £3,000 represented by other creditors—that one creditor should have the right to destroy what was a very good administration. I had realised the whole of the assets: the cash was in the bank for a couple of months awaiting distribution, and it was simply handed over then to the Official Receiver to distribute.

2176. (Mr. Smith) Do I understand you to say that you would permit an investigation into the trustee's conduct under a deed of arrangement if there were any complaints ?—Yes, I would undoubtedly.

2177. By whom—by the Board of Trade ?—Either by the Board of Trade or by the County Court.

2178. Has the County Court the machinery for investigating ?—Yes, I can issue a simple summons on the equity side of the County Court. It has been done. We do it in Manchester frequently.

2179. Is it your suggestion that the Board of Trade or the Official Receiver should look into the matters complained of, and see whether there was such evidence of misconduct as to bring it before the Court ?—I see no objection to that, but I should prefer that the jurisdiction of the County Court should be extended and that every creditor should have the right to resort there himself.

2180. I am speaking of the preliminary investigation necessary before the matter goes into Court. Would you suggest that the Board of Trade should investigate the complaints of creditors before the matter is brought before the Court ?—I can see no objection to that, provided you reserve the right of the creditors to go to the Court without going to the Board of Trade.

2181. Supposing there are questions affecting the conduct of the debtor—that he has been guilty of misconduct and that the trustee takes no action upon that, would you allow any independent authority to bring that matter before the Court ?—I would allow an examination of every debtor if the creditors thought it necessary—whether under a deed or otherwise.

2184. And I understood you to say that you would require security from a trustee under a private deed ?—Yes.

2185. And that you would audit his accounts by the Board of Trade ?—Yes.

2186. Do you not secure all that at present in the case of a Receiving Order ?—Yes.

2187. What is the objection to requiring that every deed of arrangement should be brought in under the Bankruptcy Act to that extent?—Because rightly or wrongly the commercial community has resented always the thick-and-thin introduction of official administration.

2188. We are not dealing with the opinion of the commercial community. I want to know from you whether you think it consistent to advocate the introduction by Statute of those provisions to a voluntary deed of arrangement instead of bringing them in under the machinery which Parliament has now provided ?—Yes, I do, because after all they are voluntary arrangements and those are suggested only as collateral safeguards.

2189. Would not they cease to be voluntary if they were made the subject of compulsion by Parliament ?—To the extent that you legislated on them they would, but not otherwise.

2191. What would be the difference ?—The difference would be—what ?

2192. I do not know ?—It is difficult at a moment to say what would be the various differences, but they would be considerable.

2193. I mean substantial differences ?—I would undertake to give you a note of them if I might do so later.

2194. But nothing occurs to you at the moment ?—Not at the moment.

2195. I would suggest to you that in addition to those advantages you would have the advantage of an official calling a meeting, and securing that the wishes of the creditors would be given effect to ?—But does not that mean dispensing with private arrangements altogether.

2197. As a mere matter of machinery. I am asking you from your personal experience and point of view do you see any objection to requiring these things to be done under the bankruptcy law instead of under another statutory system ?—You have already got a statute dealing with deeds of arrangement.

2200. You mean liquidation by arrangement ?—Yes, liquidation by arrangement.

2201. I have very great objection to liquidation by arrangement under the Act of 1869, and I would not like to do anything to re-establish it ?—No, nor I.

2202. But it is you who have suggested that the proceedings under the Act of 1869 should be re-enacted by statute ?—No, I have not in so many words, except it be without the disadvantages which inhered in that Act.

2203. What were the disadvantages ?—That there was not a sufficient control. You had no audit of trustees' accounts, and you had a gross traffic in proxies, for my memory goes back to the administration under the Act of 1869.

2204. Would not there still be a gross traffic in proxies, under your system ?—No, there are no proxies.

2205. There are no proxies at present ?—No.

2206. But would not there be if you gave the majority power to bind the minority ?—Possibly.

2207. How would you deal with the old abuse with regard to proxies?—I would make some sort of prohibition, such as you have in bankruptcy.

2208. So that you see, inch by inch, you are adopting the whole of the bankruptcy procedure ?—Yes, and if you gave the same facilities in bankruptcy procedure as there are under deeds I do not see any objection to its coming into force.

2209. Making deeds of arrangement, if you facilitated them, come within bankruptcy ?—If you facilitate these arrangements within the Bankruptcy Act I do not see any serious objection to it. By that I mean that the wishes and interests of the creditors shall not be set aside in order that the State shall have regard to the debtor's conduct.

2210. Then you and I are very nearly agreed. I do not know that I have any other questions to ask you, but you said something about rehabilitating the debtor in the interests of the community. I do not quite know what you mean by that ?—That was an undischarged bankrupt.

2211. Yes. He is a social danger.

2212. He is ?—And I say the sooner you take away his dangerous possibilities the better it will be for the community.

2213. Do you think that it would result in benefit to the community to discharge him more speedily merely for the sake of discharging him and merely for the sake of enabling him to get credit ?—It seems to me to be a question of choosing between two evils, and to keep him undischarged is, to my mind, the greater of the two.

2214. The greater to him or to the community ?—To the community.

2215. Do you think so ?—Yes.

2216. Would he not gain credit more readily if he were discharged ?—He might, but his assets are at least available to satisfy that credit.

2217. At present he commits a criminal offence if he incurs a liability of £20 without disclosing the fact ?—Yes.

2218. He would be free from that ?—Yes, but you forget also that the new creditor loses the assets in the event of a subsequent bankruptcy.

2219. Yes, exactly, but the old creditors would lose the assets which the debtor might hereafter acquire and to which they would be entitled under the present law ?—Yes, but in my view not equitably entitled.

2220. Now when you are suggesting that he should get a discharge it seems to me that it is only for the sake of getting a discharge ?—No, if you will remove the danger which his undischarged condition offers to the community leave him undischarged if you will. I hold the view, of course, that you make a worse citizen of him, but that is another question.

2221. When you speak of danger to the community do you mean the danger of his incurring credit ?—Yes.

2222. Without its being known that he is undischarged ?—I do.

2223. If you discharge him he will still incur credit ?—Doubtless, but that is an ordinary risk which the creditor is willing to take.

2224. But he would be free from any criminal offence in doing so ?—Yes.

2225. Would that be beneficial to the public ?—He would at all events be discharged and there would not be the danger, as I have already said, of the new creditors losing their assets.

2226. Yes, the new creditors ?—I put it to you that if you remedy that point a good deal of my objection goes.

2227. I do not know whether you had any experience under the old Act ?—I had considerable.

2230. Do not you think that that is due to the stringency of the bankruptcy law in suspending the bankrupt's discharge ?—I think it has had a good deal to do with it.

2231. We have had it placed before the Committee that the suspension or refusal of a debtor's discharge would be of no value to the community—do you agree in that ?—I would hardly go so far.

2232. I myself would suggest to you that anyone who had had experience of the state of commerce and of insolvency under the old Act would say that there has been a very large diminution in the larger branches of insolvency due to the increased stringency in the bankruptcy law ?—It may be due to that in part.

2233. And that the complaints chiefly relate to the smaller class of traders amongst whom it is found that numbers of them set up again in their wife's name, or some other name, which is the sort of thing that a large merchant could not do ?—I grant you.

2236. To what extent—would you make it a misdemeanour, or would you merely refuse the discharge ?—I would make it a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment.

2237. In every case ?—In every case. I hold the view that the more summary the punishment the more effective it is. The long lingering of a deferred discharge I am inclined to think would not be so effective as the certainty that certain offences brought with them imprisonment.

2239. In administering punishment where he found offences had been committed against the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes.

2240. Have you considered whether Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890, in regard to Clause B, requires any amendment—I mean as to the words that the bankrupt has omitted to keep such books of account as are usual and proper in the business carried on by him ?—Yes, that is an offence for which at present his discharge is withheld—that is the offence which I would make punishable by imprisonment.

2241. But is there not difficulty sometimes in establishing what are the usual and proper books of account to be kept by any particular class of trader ?—If you were to prescribe a minimum as I have already suggested, then you would punish any failure to comply with that minimum requirement.

2242. Then those words would no longer be necessary in the Bankruptcy Act ?—No.

2243. How would it do to insert words somewhat of this kind—" that if a debtor has omitted to keep such books of account as are necessary to exhibit and explain the whole transactions of his trade or business " ?—That is saying, in another form, what I have already said.

2244. Yes, it is practically what you suggest. Then I gather that you are quite in favour of the official receiver reporting on the conduct of a debtor in every case ?—Yes, in every case.

2245. Whether the debtor makes an application for discharge or not ?—Exactly.

2246. And upon that report you would give the Court power to act—either to grant a discharge or to refuse it, or to grant it subject to conditions or to impose penalties under the procedure ?—That exactly represents my view.

2248. Have you thought of any particular remedy for that defect ?—Only the remedy of speedy discharge and the conditions which I have suggested of compelling an undischarged bankrupt regardless of the limit of £20, to proclaim to all the world that he is an undischarged bankrupt. If you look at the enormous number of adjudications and compare those with the small number of applications for discharge it must strike any business man as phenomenal that so few men should think it worth their while to make an application to the court to become respectable citizens again. Therefore, it does seem to me that the granting of a discharge would do away with a good many of the subterfuges to which these men are driven. A man may trade as The Patent Boot Company, by which no one can identify him. He may have been Brown of Manchester, but he has removed to Birmingham, and trades under some such fancy name. You cannot identify that man. If he sought credit from his old creditors they could not identify him.

2250. You would then be able at once to ascertain who the person was who was trading under a firm name ?—Yes.

2251. And thus be able to ascertain whether he was a desirable person to whom to give credit or not ?—Yes, or whether he was your old debtor.

2253. Have not you heard of many cases where the debtor has assigned practically the whole of his book debts, say, to a banker, and has revised his schedule of debts from time to time as they get paid off, adding new names and striking off the old ones, and do you not think that that act must operate necessarily to the great advantage of the great body of creditors and is practically a preference ?—I have heard of it, but I repeat that in my experience it is not at all a common case. Indeed, I would go further and say that it is the rarest thing possible to find that that has been done. I speak only of my experience in the north.

2254. But assuming that evidence could be brought forward that such a system exists, do not you think that it would be greatly to the disadvantage of trade creditors ?—That it should be done, I do.

2255. Without any knowledge or intimation being given ?—I do.

2258. It might be that book debts were assigned against cash advances. If so, that might alter your opinion as to the mischief of the transaction ?—Yes, I can imagine many cases in which an assignment of book debts may be made without there being either the intention to do anything wrong or ultimate harm resulting to anybody.

2259. I think Mr. Smith rather got you to assent in terms to a proposition perhaps wider than you intended in the suggestion that you did not object to all deeds being brought into bankruptcy. Would you propose to apply that to deeds where all the creditors assented ?—That answer is one I should like to carefully read, because it is difficult under conditions such as these to say precisely all one has in one's mind, but where all the creditors have assented there is unanimity of wish and intention on the part of the debtor and creditors, and I think the Board of Trade itself in its reports from time to time has conceded the right of creditors so to arrange with their debtors outside the operation of the courts.

2260. And that is your view ?—That is my view.

2261. About the danger to the community of which you spoke of undischarged bankrupts, have you, in your experience, found them becoming members of firms, or entering into other relations of importance with people who knew nothing about their bankruptcy ?—I have. I have found undischarged bankrupts becoming members of firms, and it appears extremely doubtful whether the contracting of credit in that relation is one which is punishable within the terms of the Debtors Act.

2262. Perhaps you have not had the case before you or the purchase of property and the subsequent mortgage of it being set aside, have you ?—I have known of those cases.

2263. Those would be additional dangers ?—Just so.

2264. As to an undischarged bankrupt reporting himself from time to time, have you any suggestion how that could be worked out ? Supposing the bankrupt removes to a distance or goes abroad or other circumstances take him from the place where he was made bankrupt ?—It does not appear to me that that would be of much material advantage to the outside world, unless you are going to advertise it widely. To take the illustration I gave just now : a man Brown, of Birmingham, goes to and trades in London as Jones. He may report that fact to the Birmingham Official Receiver, but unless that receiver is authorised widely by advertisement to make the fact known that Jones, of London, is really Brown, an undischarged bankrupt, formerly of Birmingham, I do not see that such reporting can be of any use except to keep track of his subsequent earnings. I do not know that any material benefit could result except that being in a good way of business in London he could be made to contribute towards his old liabilities.

2266. I think that everybody ought to know his position, but it is difficult to indicate it by Act of Parliament if you once go beyond traders ?—It would be a step very largely in the right direction if you said traders

2267. (Mr. Peat.) When you mentioned a little time ago that you would have an undischarged bankrupt publish the fact of his being undischarged somewhat freely, would it not suit your purpose or suggestion if every undischarged bankrupt had, every year, to bring before the courts, so long as he was undischarged, a statement of his receipts and payments ?—No, it would not meet my case, because if he alters his place of residence and his name, he is getting credit, in my view, improperly, and to render a return to the court of his receipts and payments would not cure that.

2268. Your answer is that it would not assist matters, in your opinion ?—No.

2270. On the subject of books, you indicated your view that every—I understand trader, but that seems to be a little in doubt—but that every one taking credit should keep an account of his sales and purchases. Does it enter into your mind that that should be kept in detail ?—It should be kept in detail.

2271. Would not that be rather difficult, do not you think ?—Surely no. You state day by day in one book all the purchases you have made with the names of the persons from whom you have bought and the amount of the invoice. I am not suggesting, of course, that you should set out the details of all invoices, but the amount bought—that you should, day by day, record all your purchases, and, day by day, record all your sales.

2272. In total—cash sales and purchases ?—Not cash sales and purchases—but purchases of goods on credit and sales of goods on credit.

2273. That is what you mean ?—Yes, your purchases and sales for cash would pass through your cash book.

2274. I understand your answer. Do you think in many cases, perhaps, with which you are familiar, that the debtor is capable of doing that ?—It is difficult to state a percentage, but I should think that few men are so illiterate that they could not keep that minimum record. It is so easy to put down the name of a man from whom you have bought goods, with the amount of the goods bought, and however badly written, and in however rough a book, the Official Receiver, or the trustee, or his accountant, could keep track of that man's transactions and the fact that he does not record them leads, I suggest, to very considerable fraud.

2275. Then I understand your answer to be that every person taking credit should keep an account of his receipts and payments, an account of his purchases and sales on credit, an account of his purchases and sales for cash, and that each year he should prepare what might be called a statement of his affairs ?—That he should take stock, that is how I put it. It would be better if he would state it in the form of a balance sheet.

2276. State the stock, and show his debtors and creditors in his statement of affairs ?—Yes.

2277. I understand your answer. In the event of a bankrupt becoming a bankrupt a second time, before he was discharged from his first bankruptcy, would you consider that a subject which requires punishment ?—I think you could hardly say so generally, because on both occasions they may be the result of dire misfortune.

2278. Mr. Smith asked you a question on the subject of commercial insolvency and your answer, I think, was that it was less than it was during the period before the Bankruptcy Act 1883 ?—Yes, that is my impression.

2279. Did you take into account the great increase in trading in limited liability and the many failures in limited liability ?—No I did not. I was rather thinking of the fact that within the two or three years immediately succeeding the passing of the Act of 1883 I had occasion, in my official capacity, to compare with the preceding three or four years the volume of insolvencies and on that occasion I reported, and reported with pleasure, that since the passing of the Act of 1883 there had been a substantial diminution in the volume of insolvencies.

2280. But I am asking if that volume included insolvency under the Companies Act ?—No, it included insolvencies of private debtors, but it is only fair to say that there was nothing in the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 which produced conditions different from those which prevailed from the year 1869 and onwards, as regards insolvencies of companies.

2281. From 1862 and onwards ?—From 1862 if you will, but if you take the period of six years prior to 1883 and the period of six years subsequently for the purpose of comparison the conditions were practically the same.

2282. Did you look into that ?—I did at that time.

2283. The question of the insolvency of public companies ?—The question of the insolvency of public companies I did not touch.

2284. You assume that the volume there would be the same ?—In both periods.

2285. Without having looked at it ?—Without having looked at it; indeed we had not the material to enable us to look at it.

2286. I think you mentioned in the latter part of your examination that there were frequent frauds by trustees. Did you mean trustees in Bankruptcy or trustees under deeds of arrangement or both ?—Both.

2287. Perhaps you will tell me whether you have found. I conclude you speak from experience ?—As to fraud ?

2288. Yes—from having seen it yourself ?—Yes, from having seen it myself.

2289. Will you tell us whether you found those frauds prevail in cases where the trustees were members of some body of public accountants or only amongst what I should call non-professional trustees ?—Both.

2290. Quite so ?—I would not say equally. I have in my mind, and the Board of Trade officials will have in their minds, one or two names which stand out in a more marked manner and one name I may mention—that of Leslie Armstrong.

2291. We have had him about a dozen times but that is one man repeated many times ?—That is one man repeated many times, but he is not the only man.

2293. I am now asking the question whether those frauds arose, in your experience, among trustees who were members of some professional body such as the Institute of Chartered Accountants, or the Incorporated Accountants, or whether those frauds arose, in your experience, among non-professional men who had not their profession to back them up ?—My experience is they have been among so-called accountants who are not members of any professional body.

2294. That has been my experience too. On the subject of voluntary arrangements you answered, I think, a question which I should have addressed to you, your views are not that all voluntary arrangements should come under the Board of Trade in Bankruptcy ?—Personally I think they should not.

2295. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to the non-keeping of books you used the expression at first that they should be punished. You afterwards said in reply to Sir Edward Fithian—"In every case." Do you think it would be fair in every case or would you put in that the non-keeping of books may be punished in the discretion of the Court. Are there not, even to-day, with the educational facilities we have, many thousands of men who are quite illiterate but who are yet splendid business men. I am speaking of milk sellers, coal-dealers, and so on. Do you not think it would be unfair, and undesirable, to make those men amenable to punishment for the non-keeping of books ? They are men who began in a small way ?—I have suggested a minimum requirement in that direction. I would make it as simple as may be so long as it was efficient for the purpose of building up accounts. Even milk-dealers who are illiterate usually have children who are not, and if they have not children they can, at a very cheap rate, for their small transactions, employ a man to make a record for them.

2296. There are a tremendous number of small traders—widows and so on, who could not afford to pay anybody, and to make it that they should be punished seems to me too drastic. Would not you be satisfied that the law should say that they might be punished in the opinion of the Court ? There may be some, as I have put to other witnesses, in respect of whom the great difficulty comes in with regard to the non-keeping of books, that they are men who are able to keep books, who have kept books, but who have ceased to keep books for the express purpose of getting through a bankruptcy. Now those, it seems to me, ought to be punished above all, but those who are really unable, the poor and the illiterate, to keep books, I do not think should be amenable to punishment straight off ?—In my opinion, the moment you begin to make legislation which has for its object the punishment of an offence, permissive or conditional, you begin to provide loopholes through which not the innocent, but the rascally escape. So soon as you begin to make provisoes and qualifications, you find that the most astute villain escapes under those conditions and not the poor widow. That is my experience as to qualifications and provisions for exceptions in a Bankruptcy Act.

2298. That they do not realise as quickly as they might do ? Although as you say justly, they are specialised, yet very frequently a trustee is appointed who apparently understands the trade, but he does not realise as quickly as he might do ?—What does he do ?

2300. With regard to hire-purchase agreements, you have not been asked your opinion as to whether hire-purchase agreements should be registered or not ?—I think it would be a good thing if they were. There might be some private cases such as where a young couple newly married had obtained their furniture under a hire-purchase agreement where it might be a hardship to register the agreement. It might seem hard that they should be in that way exposed to their neighbours, but apart from that a good deal of mischief is wrought under the ægis of hire-purchase agreements; and, probably, in the main, benefit would accrue from their registration.

2301. Sir Edward Fithian asked you with regard to the assignment of book debts. Have not you found it usually the case, not only as regards the assignment of book debts in the large majority of cases, but also of stocks, that it is evidence of the insolvency of a man ?—It may be, if you interpret insolvency as the inability to pay debts as they fall due. A man may be perfectly solvent, but gorged with stock. But so far as the stock is concerned that would be immediately got over by effecting a forced sale.

2302. But it would not with regard to the assignment of book debts ?—It would not with regard to the assignment of book debts; but, as I say, in my experience it is not frequently done. I speak with knowledge of the large wholesale houses in Manchester; and it is not the fact, in my experience, that book debts are assigned to the wholesale houses.

2303. When it is done do not you agree that they should be registered the same as bills of sale ?—Yes, if you can make any provision that it shall not be misconstrued as to solvent people.

2304. It remains for the man to satisfy his friends that he is solvent, but should not the general creditors have that safeguard ?—Suppose there are no general creditors—supposing you have only got one creditor, and the man assigns his book debts to satisfy that debt.

2305. That is quite an extreme case ?—But you have to legislate for extreme cases.

2306. No, you legislate for the majority and not for the minority. You state you would have the debtor come up for his discharge immediately after his examination ? —No, that the Official Receiver should report to the Court immediately after his examination. In my view, once in every six months the Official Receiver should automatically bring up each case of an undischarged bankrupt for consideration.

2307. And decide whether he should be discharged ?—Or whether his discharge should be still withheld.

2309. In page 3 of your proof you say : " The creditors of an undischarged bankrupt who can be proved to have known of the bankrupt's previous failure should be precluded from participation in the after acquired property " ?—Yes.

2310. Do not you think it would be more difficult to prove that a man did not know of a man's previous failure than that he did know ? In the majority of cases those who have dealt with a trader who has become bankrupt give him credit again ?—Well, then they should suffer.

2311. They all know ?—Consequently they do it with their eyes open.

2312. They all know who have not traded before ?—That may be prima facie evidence, but the fact that a creditor in a prior bankruptcy is again involved imports knowledge beyond question.

2313. With the present trade journals practically everybody knows whether a man has been bankrupt or not. If he trades in another name then it is a different matter ?—No, pardon me, he does not know of necessity. Suppose a man failed ten years ago and is seeking credit to-day from a new house—how is that house to know that that man failed ?

2314. Yes, there may be a number of those cases. In your last paragraph of all, you say that the assent to such an arrangement of a majority of some five-sixths of the creditors should bind the assent of the minority of one-sixth. Do you mean five-sixths in value, or number, or both ?—In value only.

2315. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I am afraid that a good many of the questions which have been asked were questions which I had intended asking you, and therefore I will not amplify or repeat what has been put to you, but I should like to ask you to give us your opinion from your vast experience whether or no the registration of hire agreements and the registration of book debts might not in many instances be a source not only of great inconvenience but of worse than that to large firms in business ?—I think that is so; there are many conceivable cases where it would work hardship, and after all it is the balance of advantage that you have to consider. I have said so far as book debts are concerned the assignment of them is not so general as it appears to be within the knowledge of the gentlemen here. So far as the hire of furniture is concerned, it is of the commonest possible kind, as we all know, and that being so I do not know whether the registration of it would result in very much advantage.

2316. Of course you would readily say that where a man assigns book debts with an absolute intention of defrauding a certain section of his creditors that that would be absolutely wrong and should be prevented, if possible ? —I take it you mean with the intention of preferring one of his creditors, because if he is owing money to the creditor to whom he assigns he is not defrauding anybody by paying him his debt in kind instead of in cash.

2317. I simply want to get upon our minutes your opinion that although doubtless the registration of book debts and registration of hiring agreements might be useful in certain directions, it might be very damaging in others ?—In that I quite agree.

2318. I am not going to give evidence, but I have had a very large experience of business for forty years in the eastern part of England and I can only say that I know very few cases of the assignment of book debts ? –Yes, that is my experience.

2319. I take it from your evidence that your opinion is that the working of the Bankruptcy Act at the present time is an improvement upon that of the prior Act ?—Vastly so.

2320. May I take your opinion as to whether there are not a great number of bankruptcies caused by the rash and reckless way in which wholesale houses give credit under the stress of competition ?—That is undoubtedly true.

2321. And therefore they have to a certain extent themselves to blame ?—Yes.

2322. You speak about the punishment which you would like to see awarded to the people who do not keep proper books of account ?—Yes.

2323. I take it from that that you consider the present condition in connection with the keeping of proper books of account is not of much value ?—Scarcely of any value; you see it is said as a rule in the Official Receiver's Report that the debtor has not kept such books of account as properly disclose his position from time to time, and that is one of the many offences for which his discharge is suspended, but the fact that that is reported and that his discharge is refused in consequence of it does not lead any more men to keep books.

2324. You made a remark that speaking of a percentage is rather a dangerous course, but would you roughly tell us in your experience of the North about what proportion of people you think keep no books of account at all ? —I do not think I would like to venture upon a guess.

2325. Do you think that it is done to a very great extent—that it prevails to a very great extent ?—Yes, amongst small traders.

2326. But I take it that in your experience you come into touch with the larger traders ?—I come into touch with both and I find the retailers almost invariably fail to keep proper books of account.

2327. You say that an undischarged bankrupt should be made to proclaim to all the world that he is an undischarged bankrupt ?—Yes.

2328. If he does not put the talismanic U.B. after his name would you punish him ?—I would.

2329. In what way ?—Any man who omitted to declare that he was an undischarged bankrupt should be punished.

2330. (Mr. Smith.) In the act of incurring credit ? —Yes, in the act of incurring credit.

2331. (Mr. Chamberlin.) When the trustee is nominated, as you say is often the case, by a solicitor, is not the ultimate selection of the trustee decided by a majority of the creditors ?—No, where a deed has been executed in advance of a meeting, and, as is very frequently the case, without any necessity for it, the deed is hurriedly registered, and there you have an accomplished fact, and the only way in which the creditors can dispossess the trustee whom they did not elect and perhaps did not want is by filing a petition in bankruptcy, but that is like breaking a butterfly on the wheel.

2332. One other question, and that is a matter of opinion only, but in your experience do you find the creditors take any vital interest in the realisation of an estate ?—Only through their committee of inspection.

2333. But it has been given to us in evidence that creditors take no interest at all. They make a bad debt and they let it slide under the deed of arrangement. Is that your experience of the firms that you represent, for instance, in Manchester ?—No, I cannot say that it is.

In the large majority of the cases with which I am concerned, committees of inspection are appointed whether under a deed or in bankruptcy; and I am bound to say that in the main they attend actively and interestedly to the duties devolving on them.

2334. (Chairman.) Might I ask you one question on a matter that you mentioned? Is it your experience when application is made to the Court, either by the creditors or by the trustee under a private deed, that the court is much more reluctant to interfere with the administration by the private trustee than in the administration in bankruptcy?—In applications by creditors as against the trustee, I have not found that the Court has exhibited any reluctance. On the contrary, Judge Parry, at Manchester, offers us the greatest facilities to bring to book any trustee who refuses to do his duty.

2335. (Mr. Smith.) There is a question I omitted to ask, but I understood you would be in favour of giving large facilities for the investigation of the debtor's conduct, even under the deed of arrangement, if there was any suggestion of his misconduct?—Yes.

2336. Supposing that in the investigation it was disclosed that the bankrupt had committed offences under the Act, such as not keeping books, how would you deal with that—would you punish the bankrupt for it?—Yes, I would give any creditor the right to take proceedings.

2337. Would you deprive him of his release under the deed of arrangement?—I doubt if you could, because the release is the consideration for the deed.

2339. Would you be in favour of putting that in as a condition—that where the debtor has committed offences which would have justified his imprisonment under the bankruptcy law, that that should operate as releasing the creditors from their obligation to give the debtor his discharge?—No, for you would then be making bankrupts of them—you would at once assimilate the whole procedure and the whole administration to that of bankruptcy.

2340. I am not one of those parties who look upon bankruptcy as a particularly inferior mode of procedure. I want to know whether you would punish the debtor and ensure his punishment for committing these offences or whether it is your suggestion that the creditors should have the right to relieve him?—I think the creditors should have a right to arrange privately with the debtor if they please, and in the manner they please.

2341. Can you give me any instance whatsoever in the law of England where the public have the right to interfere with the administration of the criminal law and to say whether it shall be put in motion or not?—I am afraid, not being a lawyer, that I cannot.

2342. You cannot give me any example of what you suggest, that the creditors should have the right to apply, as I suggest, the criminal law, and to hold it over their debtor as a threat?—They do at the present time. If debtors have obtained credit for the sum of £20 and upwards they can be prosecuted, but it not infrequently happens that those undischarged bankrupts who have committed that offence are subsequently arranged with privately, and are not prosecuted because creditors decide not to set the law in motion.

2343. (Mr. Addison.) I do not at present understand the question. It is an abstract point of law. How any man can release the rights of the Crown to prosecute I do not know.

2344. (Chairman.) I think that what Mr. Smith meant was that the creditors do, in entering into a private arrangement, prevent the bankruptcy which is the foundation of the offence. Until the man becomes bankrupt he does not commit the offence. I mean it is so many months from the receiving order or the petition; but perhaps Mr. Smith is putting rather a question of argument.

2345. (Mr. Smith.) I take it that the witness says that the creditors should have a right to release the debtor who has executed a deed of arrangement from the effect of misconduct if they so choose.

2346. (Witness.) Yes.

Sir Edward W. Fithian.
W. B. Peat, Esq.
W. M. Richardson, Esq.
John Smith, Esq., C. B.

Walter T. Kaye, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. J. Durie Kerr, called; and Examined.

2348. Then what is the body of which you are secretary?—I am not secretary at all. There are seventy-four, or thereabouts, wholesale houses in Birmingham, and they met together, called by me as being the trade accountant; they formulated these resolutions which you have in front of you and they elected me to give voice to their opinions; therefore, any opinions I express will be their opinions and not my own personal opinions.

2349. But we may take it that they are the opinions of the local wholesale grocers, provision merchants and allied traders in Birmingham?—That is so.

2350. I think that in reference to the matters referred to this Committee that the Committee whose views you have come here to express have resolved, firstly, "That the provision of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended and provision made that the conduct of such debtor should in every case be brought before the court for consideration whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not." In regard to the second, taking the two together they have resolved: "That the provision of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused or suspended, should be made more stringent so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading and the neglect by traders to keep proper books of account should be amended and that such alterations and amendments be (1) That under no circumstances should an undischarged bankrupt be allowed to trade again, and should he do he should be guilty of an offence punishable by imprisonment. (2) that a list of undischarged bankrupts with their present addresses should be published in The London Gazette half-yearly or yearly. (3) That a bankrupt's application for discharge should be heard on payment of a nominal sum not exceeding £5. (4) That registrars of county courts should have power to hear and deal with all applications for discharge. (5) That when it has been proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debtor has been guilty of improper trading or gambling or has neglected to keep proper books and accounts he shall be guilty of an offence punishable by imprisonment. (6) That such books should contain a full record of the debtor's trading so far as outgoing and incoming from first transaction to last."

2351. Would you kindly give us the reasons for those conclusions, shortly, which represent the views of your Committee ?—The principal reasons for the conclusions embodied in paragraphs 1 and 2 are that the mere fact of a debtor knowing that he would be periodically brought before the court would act as an incentive to him to apply for his discharge. If the bankrupt, under the existing rules, has committed any offence which might contribute towards any refusal or suspension of his dis harge he invariably when his attention is drawn to the fact states "I shall not apply for my discharge." In addition, by the suggested procedure, the present system of an undischarged bankrupt trading in his wife's name or any other name would be materially checked. If a bankrupt anticipated his conduct would be brought before the court and his present occupation and means discussed, whether he applied for his discharge or not, he would attempt to conform with the existing Acts much more so than he does at present, by keeping proper books, preparing periodical accounts, etc.

2352. Now with regard to the provisions relating to the discharge of the bankrupt, we know what your committee's suggestions are. I think you have got some observations amplifying them ?—Yes, my committee say with regard to the provisions of the law relating to the discharge of a bankrupt (1) that under no circumstances should an undischarged bankrupt be allowed to trade again, and should he do so he should be guilty of an offence punishable by imprisonment. Under existing circumstances a bankrupt is generally anxious to trade again, and usually adopts the following course. On realisation of his estate taking place his wife, son, daughter or other relation (preferably of the same name) acquire directly or indirectly if possible, the shop or business premises, and frequently an arrangement is entered into between the landlord and this relative even before a petition in bankruptcy has been filed, and, unknown to the trustee, who realises the estate by auction or private sale, the fixtures and utensils are bought by a nominee in a different name from the trustee. With as little delay as possible the shop is re-opened and the name, preferably the initial only, is altered over the door, the debtor himself appears behind the counter in the capacity, according to his explanation, "of an assistant." He gives the orders to the travellers, and to all intents and purposes the business is his still. The goodwill is intact, and the connection is continued. The custom is not to buy the book debts from the trustee, but the collection of them is hindered in most cases very materially by the new concern, and members of my committee have known cases where the debtor has assisted the customers to avoid payment of their indebtedness to the old estate. Where an arrangement of the nature suggested is carried out the debtor should be held to be trading. My committee can see the difficulties of establishing the fact that the business is the bankrupt's, but if more stringent measures were adopted the debtor would make no attempt to trade in other persons' names. Admittedly a good deal also might be done by the wholesale trader himself, by refusing to supply goods. (2) The publication of this list of undischarged bankrupts, my committee consider, would be one of the most helpful rules that could be adopted to check fraud, especially if the list contained the present addresses of the bankrupts. Difficulty is now experienced in identifying a bankrupt; say, for instance, his name is John Robinson, and he is trading in London or elsewhere where he is a bankrupt; he subsequently obtains a situation in this district and after a time in the capacity of an assistant is well known to the travellers calling on his employers; he saves a little money and commences again on his own account, and in his own name, paying at the outset punctually, but he subsequently is in difficulties, and for the first time the creditors learn that he is an undischarged bankrupt; whereas if he is undischarged whilst as an assistant, and his name and present address appeared in the suggested list, it would be practically impossible for him to commence trading again in his own name or in the name of a relative without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt. My committee, of course, foresee the difficulties and hardships of an undischarged bankrupt who is an assistant "living in," whose employers would naturally raise strong objections to employing a man whose name with their address appeared periodically on the suggested list. (3) The cost of an application for discharge is, of course, at present but nominal, yet at the same time it is felt that even this cost might be made lighter still. Many small grocery failures will have from 75 to 150 creditors. It is also thought that the costs of an application for an order of discharge, including the expenses of "Gazette," might be £1 or less, and the fees payable with respect to creditors who have to be notified of the application 6d., and the creditors only whose claims are over £10 or £20 should be notified of the debtor's application. The cost of an application for discharge should always be fully explained to the debtor, and the process, in addition, should be so simple as not to necessitate the employment of a solicitor to a man of even meagre education. (4) That registrars of county courts should have power to hear and deal with all applications for discharge seems to my committee to be a very desirable amendment; the registrar's court under ordinary circumstances have to conduct all the debtor's examination, and the registrar is conversant with all the facts of the conduct of the debtor and his demeanour at the examination, and it is this court, they consider, which should adjudicate on the application for discharge instead of any court who can know practically nothing of this particular matter. My committee also discussed as to whether in their opinion further powers should be given to registrars in bankruptcy cases such as :—to commit a debtor for contempt—to impose a term of imprisonment for any offence under the Bankruptcy Laws, or to commit a bankrupt for trial for any offence under the Debtor's Act, but they do not think it desirable to give registrars such powers. (5) Reckless and improper trading my committee would define as (1) the selling of goods generally without any regard to their cost. (2) Contracting of debts without any probable means of payment. (3) Inability to satisfactorily account for loss of assets. (4) Putting a creditor to unnecessary legal expense in defending an action, and (5) giving an undue preference within three months of his bankruptcy, and they consider that stringent measures should be taken to punish a bankrupt who has been guilty of betting. Debtors in the grocery and provision trade here do not generally admit being guilty of this latter offence, as in other trades. (6) My committee attach great importance to the non-keeping of books, as in their opinion the absence of books contributes greatly to fraud. My experience in the grocery trade in this district, especially in the retail trade, is that practically no books are kept, and in those cases where there are a few books kept they are quite insufficient to disclose their business transactions, neither are they kept, as a rule, even indifferently for some time prior to their failure. My committee do not suggest that an elaborate or complete set of books be compulsorily kept, but only such books as contain a full record of the debtor's trading from the first transaction to the last. The principal books that should be kept, in their opinion, are a cash book showing receipts and payments, and a bought day-book showing some record of the purchases, and a sales day-book or manifold book containing some detailed record of the credit sales. They also consider that when a debtor applies for his discharge, in addition to the keeping of books, the fact as to whether he has periodically taken stock or not in an attempt to ascertain his position should be taken into consideration.

2353. I do not think we need trouble you with the third paragraph of the report, because that is a matter on which we shall have the observations of the Incorporated Law Society ?—Exactly, sir.

2354. Then No. 4 of your committee's suggestions is: "That the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made, and that such alteration and amendment should be (1) That the debtor within twenty-four hours of the receiving order being made against him should supply the court with a list of his creditors. (2) That a meeting of creditors should be convened within seven days of the estate passing into the hands of the Official Receiver, and that the creditors could then direct as to the most efficient means of realisation. (3) That a trustee should be elected in a non-summary case, by a majority in value, and two-thirds in number of the creditors present or represented and entitled to vote. (4) That the Official Receiver should have absolute discretion as to admitting a proof for voting purposes. (5) That the debtor's public examination should not be concluded until such time as the whole of the estate has been realised. (6) That within sixty days of the first meeting the trustee should issue a report to the creditors, clearly showing the realisation to date and pay a first dividend." Have you any observations to make on those suggestions?—I would say with regard to this clause of the terms of reference, that my Committee's suggestions are based on the following considerations:—(1) That if the debtor were compelled to file with the Court a list of his creditors within twenty-four hours the matter would be dealt with much more expeditiously than at present. (2) That by holding a meeting of creditors within seven days of the estate passing into the hands of the Official Receiver, general directions could be taken from the creditors, and practical men who know the particular business would then direct as to the most efficient means of realisation. At the present time a want of knowledge as to the best means of realisation sometimes entails a considerable sacrifice on the creditors. (3) It has been found here on more than one occasion (particularly in re Crisp, No. 109 of 1905) that the election of a trustee by the present mode of voting inflicts hardships on trade creditors. In the particular case in question the debtor prepared balance sheets from time to time which were duly audited by a local chartered accountant, and eventually he found himself in difficulties and a petition was filed. In the summary accompanying the notice calling the first meeting of creditors, the creditors were informed for the first time that there was a cash creditor for money said to have been lent years ago, when the debtor had traded previously. He had originally been a partner with this creditor at Norwich and they had promoted companies together, indulged in Stock Exchange transactions, and the debtor stated that some years ago this creditor and himself had had a settlement, an amount being agreed upon as being due from the bankrupt, but "he never anticipated any claim would arise from this source." He had been in business twice since this amount had been adjusted, the first instance as a "one man" company and in the second instance as a wholesale grocer. The first venture was unsuccessful. He as the debenture holder acquired all the assets and the trade creditors got nothing. The bankrupt never included the liability in his second trading at all and never paid any interest on it. The liabilities, exclusive of this claim, which amounted to £3,812 19s. 2d. were £1,040 13s. 2d., and the assets scheduled at £823 6s. When the first meeting took place, although the whole of the trade liabilities had been incurred in Birmingham, the cash creditor insisted on nominating his own trustee, a gentleman who had been previously associated with the bankrupt and himself as auditor in one or two of their unsuccessfu concerns, and the latter admitted that he frequently employed him. The cash creditor was the only one who voted for the appointment of this gentleman as trustee, although sixteen trade creditors for large amounts voted for another person, and had they known there was a big "money lent" claim, other creditors would no doubt have done the same, but as stated the cash creditor persisted in his own nominee being appointed. The Official Receiver received the vote and in spite of a protest to the Board of Trade, the trustee was elected. The Committee of inspection were trade creditors and looked with some suspicion on the claim of the "money lent" creditor, and they desired an independent legal investigation and the appointment of a solicitor of their own choice. The trustee refused to appoint the one they nominated, but apparently accepted the nominee of the cash creditor. The committee and the trustee not seeing eye to eye in the matter, the trustee called a meeting of creditors, and by the sole vote of the cash creditor removed the two trade creditors from the Committee and re-elected others in their place. A smaller case recently occurred at Coventry—a debtor had arranged with his uncle to take over a business that he had managed for some years. No account was arrived at, but after some five or six years trading a claim of £800 or £900 was made, and the debtor feeling his position did not warrant him defending it himself filed a petition. In this case also the cash creditor used his vote for the appointment of his own nominee, totally disregarding all other creditors. Other cases of a similar nature could be named. Therefore my Committee think that a majority in value and two-thirds in number of the creditors present or represented and entitled to vote should be necessary before a trustee can carry the appointment, and if not the matter should remain in the hands of the Official Receiver with a Committee of Inspection appointed by the creditors. (4) That the Official Receiver should have absolute discretion as to the admitting of a proof for voting purposes, and in that event in both these cases he would no doubt have rejected the claim for voting and left the trade creditors' nominee to deal with the estate. (5) My Committee are aware of the existing rules as to the declaration of a dividend, but they are of opinion that creditors should be informed within two months as to the position of the estate, and the trustee should likewise be compelled to pay a first dividend.

2354A. Have you any personal opinion as to the advisability of the suggestion that the Official Receiver should have absolute discretion as to admitting a proof for voting purposes? I mean to a lawyer it sounds a rather strong order to say that a man, with possibly a good debt, should be excluded from voting if the Receiver in his discretion thinks it better that he should not?—In my opinion, the Official Receiver would use any power conferred on him in a proper way. Occasionally, it would come hard, admittedly, on a creditor. There was a case in Northampton this week where the Official Receiver used his discretion on a proxy which in my expressed opinion was out of order. There was no heading in the proxy of any description or kind, but the Official Receiver used it to vote on the proof of a partly secured creditor, and the consequence was that a nominee of that creditor was elected as trustee; but in the case in question of re Crisp, had the Official Receiver had the power he would not have allowed the vote of the creditor for money lent.

2356. (Chairman.) The Official Receiver is bound to admit the vote of a man who shows a debt.

2357. (Mr. Smith.) Would he act differently if he had absolute power?

2358. (Chairman.) I think your suggestion was that he should have power to exclude a proof from voting irrespective of the rights of the creditors?—Yes. In this case of Crisp the debtor said that money was owing. Evidence was produced that money was owing by the production of bills, and one or two persons were prepared to say that they knew money was owing and yet the proof out-voted everybody.

2359. Then passing on to the next question I see that your committee resolved, "That the law so far as it allows the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired assets should not be modified in any way." Have you any observations on that?—They say that the law so far as it allows the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the after acquired assets should not be modified. They consider that the law as it at present exists prevents to some extent an undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit, as the wholesale trader is generally aware of the existence of this law.

2360. Then as regards No. 6 they resolved "That the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made a bankrupt should be extended so as to render all classes of married women who incur debts on their own account, subject to the Bankruptcy Laws in the same way as the male trader. We are further of opinion that the full name of the proprietor of the business should be placed over the door of the business premises and if the trader is a woman such name should be prefixed by 'Mrs.' or 'Miss.'" In amplification of that, what is the opinion of your committee ?—My committee are of opinion that if a married woman trades she should be amenable to the same laws as the male trader. The retail trader here to disguise the actual proprietorship of the business will after a failure simply trade in the surname and add "& Co." or in the name of "Stores" or "Trading Co.," without any name appearing over the shop door or on the premises. A good deal of difficulty would be obviated, my committee consider, if the full name of the proprietor of the business be placed over the door of the business premises in the same way as is now required for certain licences and that if the trader is a woman such name should be prefixed by "Mrs." or "Miss." Any mistake as to the identity of the trader could then be obviated ; the mere placing of the christian name over the door would in some cases be no guide as to whether it was an undischarged bankrupt's wife or his daughter who was trading.

2361. Then as regards No. 7, your committee resolved, "That the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage settlements and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt should be extended so as to prevent trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrances of property under any such dispositions as above described." I think you have not very much to add to that ?—No ; with regard to that the conclusion my Committee arrived at is embodied fully in their letter. The cases where marriage settlements have competed with traders in this district is very few, and personally I do not know a local case in the grocery and provision trade during my twenty-five years' experience in this particular class. They are very rare, sir.

2362. Then on No. 8 the resolution of your Committee is "That the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of such arrangement more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustees' accounts and official control over the assets in his hands, and that further alterations and amendments should be, (1) The deed of assignment should not be acted upon or registered unless a good percentage of trade creditors have assented thereto, (2) That a trustee should have power to investigate debtors' past dealings as in bankruptcy, (3) That a deed of assignment should include for a certain period after acquired property, (4) That a deed of assignment or composition should become absolute within one month from the signing thereof, (5) That a majority of creditors in value and two-thirds in number assenting to a deed of assignment or composition should bind the minority, (6) That the powers of the Committee of Inspection should be materially strengthened, (7) That no duty fees be paid to the Board of Trade for exercising official control over assets in the hands of trustees or for official audit of his accounts. We are, however, strongly of opinion that deeds of arrangement should be abolished entirely and that the only procedure should be bankruptcy." That embodies a considerable portion of your proof. Perhaps you will first tell us what are the committee's views in amplification of that resolution ?—The conclusions of my committee herein are fully set out in their letter, but I would add with regard thereto, (1) That if a deed of assignment could not be acted upon or registered until a good percentage of trade creditors had assented thereto, the present serious existing evils would be done away with. There is a so-called class of "Accountants" here who peruse the judgments registered in trade papers weekly ; they then send a circular to the debtors saying they are not "money lenders," but they can be of considerable assistance to him, and in more than one case it has come to my knowledge that subsequent letters have contained an offer that if the debtor will come to Birmingham to see them they will pay his fare and expenses. The debtor comes and explains his position and they then get from him a statement of his liabilities and assets and suggest to him that he can continue to trade by executing a deed undertaking to pay to the trustee, who is of course always a member of the accountant's firm, so much per week, the trustees to distribute periodically pro rata amongst the creditors such sums until 10s. or more in the £ has been paid. A tempting dividend is suggested to the creditors so that they may fall in with the deed. The first pro rata dividend is not arranged to take place until three months ; the deed is then absolute, and under certain clauses thereof, which the debtor is supposed to have broken, the estate is, without regard to the debtor or the creditors, summarily seized by the trustee and disposed of, usually by an auctioneer appointed by himself. In the majority of cases the trustee never distributes any dividend whatever to the creditors. By the carrying out of my committee's suggestion such a fraudulent procedure on the part of so-called "accountants" would be avoided. (2) A trustee should have power to investigate a debtor's past dealings as in bankruptcy, and where undue preferences have been made, have power to take steps to recover as in bankruptcy. (3) It has been found here on occasions that after a debtor has executed a deed and creditors have assented thereto, and in some instances where the estate has been closed, the debtor has inherited money under a will, although actually at the time of the deed he had no negotiable interest under the said will. My committee consider that property acquired within twelve months from the signing of the deed should be the property of the trustees. (4) They are strongly of opinion that a deed of assignment should become absolute in one month from the signing thereof. Their conclusions as to this are many, of which you will be aware. The principal of these are that where there are outstanding creditors the position of a trustee is unsatisfactory, and also that a trustee cannot safely distribute an estate until the deed becomes absolute. (5) This conclusion is arrived at by the fact that frequently smaller creditors delay and upset a deed of assignment, or sometimes by suing the debtor afterwards obtain payment of their debt in full. In addition the assets of creditors frequently get into the hands of "Accountants" and agents who directly or indirectly require payment either from the trustee or out of the estate for any trouble they have had in the matter. This practice would be obviated by the majority binding the minority. (6) The powers of the committee of Inspection should be materially strengthened, and my committee consider principally they should on all occasions be made parties to the deed and should be in the same position and have the same powers as in bankruptcy and a proper provision be made for their remuneration. (7) My committee have arrived at this conclusion after careful consideration, as they think if the Board of Trade exercised efficient control over the assets in the hands of a trustee and official audit of his accounts, the existing abuses would be in a great measure checked. Another important conclusion my committee arrived at was that deeds of assignment should be abolished entirely and the only procedure be bankruptcy. That if a debtor were aware that private arrangements were abolished and the only procedure in the event of failure was bankruptcy, with its attendant publicity and punishments, they would, whilst trading, endeavour to conform with the existing laws as to keeping books, gambling, reckless trading, etc. They are aware the costs of realisation under deeds of assignment are less than in bankruptcy at present.

2364. Then, as regards No. 9, I see that your Committee resolved, "That the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities should be extended so as to include and apply to general assignments of book debts and hiring agreements." I think you can probably give us some valuable assistance upon that point?—With regard to the laws relating to the registration of certain classes of securities, the particular classes of securities my committee desire to see registered are the assignment of book debts; they consider the non-registration of these as under the present law to be a great inducement to fraud, and enables a creditor to hold security for a floating account. There was a case in Birmingham some time ago where a debtor assigned all present and future book debts to a house for which he was agent. He purchased goods from outside houses for large amounts, converted them into book debts in the ordinary way of trade, and thus the firm in question, to whom he owed £5,000 or £6,000, were secured at the time of the failure. The mode of carrying the matter out was that a duplicate copy of all his transactions was supplied to the house weekly by the debtor, and by this means, without access to his books, they knew the actual position of each debt and were enabled to enforce their security whenever they thought fit. They thus obtained payment of their account at the expense of new creditors. Hiring agreements are becoming more common in the grocery, provision, and allied trades in our district. In addition to check tills, scales, etc., other trade utensils are being let out on hiring agreements and hire purchase agreements. The registration of assignments of book debts and hiring agreements would obviate, my committee consider, the difficulties.

2365. That is all they have to say on that particular question; and then generally with regard to the amendment of the bankruptcy procedure I think you could favour us just with a summary of what your Committee recommend?—With regard to the suggestions of amendment in and additions to the existing Bankruptcy Acts my committee recommend (1) That provisions should be made for adequately providing out of bankrupts' estates for the services of the members of the committee of inspection by payment in addition to the actual out-pockets of a fee of £1 1s. for each meeting attended. My committee consider that the present difficulties of obtaining the consent of creditors to sit on committees of inspection would be obviated. At the present time, I should say that 95 per cent. of the local traders decline to waste time by sitting on committees, and endeavouring to increase the possible dividends. Some influential creditors will sometimes consent to sit on committees, but a quorum can only be obtained with difficulty and a trustee at times experiences the greatest difficulty in conducting realisations. In bankruptcy, committees are also, at present, apathetical; they are generally anxious to get away from a meeting which they attend as quickly as possible, and their examination of accounts is consequently hurried and perfunctory. They do not suggest that any remuneration should be given to professional men for their services on committees, in fact, they prefer that professional men are not elected on such committees under deeds or in bankruptcy even when they are entitled as creditors to be elected. The meetings of the committee might be regulated so as to avoid unnecessary meetings being held, or the fee suggested might be on a sliding scale commensurate with the assets.

2366. Your next recommendation is: "That in cases where the assets are insufficient to cover the costs of the proceedings, and it should be found necessary to take legal proceedings against any person or persons, the costs of such action be borne by the Board of Trade Bankruptcy Department"?—We say, regarding the cases where the assets are insufficient to cover the costs of the proceedings, and it should be found necessary to take legal proceedings against any person or persons, my committee arrived at this conclusion from many experiences they have had in this district, for instance, in a case re Liggett, where a man ostensibly had three shops, the trading name of each being "Liggett's Stores." At one of the shops the debtor lived with his wife, at another shop where he personally attended he gave the orders instructing the firms to send so much of the goods to each shop. When the debtor failed it was found that the lease of one shop where he lived was in the name of his wife, who traded in her maiden name before he married her as "Liggett's Stores." He admitted that certain goods had been sent there, but stated she had paid as an ordinary wholesale customer for what goods she had had, but he had no books to prove this. The principal assets were at the wife's shop, and the other shops only realised sufficient to pay the preference payments. The Official Receiver declined to take action against Mrs. Liggett without a guarantee from the trade creditors, and this sum they declined to give, therefore Mrs. Liggett was left in undisturbed possession of the shop.

2367. With regard to that did the committee consider who was to bear the cost supposing the proceedings were unsuccessful—I mean it would be the Public Exchequer, would it not, which would bear the cost?—It should come out of the public funds of some kind. This is a case which frequently occurs in our district. We had a case this week where a man a month ago had plenty of assets apparently; and a day or two after his petition he had no assets at all. The creditors met, and they subscribed £50 among themselves, to prosecute the man—I will not say to prosecute him, but to follow his assets.

2368. Then you have No. 3: "That in small bankruptcy cases where the assets are under £100 special provision should be made for economical realization of such assets, with a maximum of costs not exceeding 5 per cent.?"—They say, with regard to small bankruptcies, where the assets are under £100, my committee are of opinion that a much more economical realisation should be effected by a reduction of the court costs and the Board of Trade fees, etc. The Gazette notices should also be dispensed with as well as possession charges; an inclusive fee of £5 should be made in each case.

2369. Then as regards preference payments, I think that they suggest, "that rent, rates, taxes, and gas should not rank in any way in preference to trade creditors." What have they further to say with regard to that?—With regard to preferential payments, my Committee feel that at times considerable injustice is done to trade creditors by preference payments absorbing practically the whole estate. They admit that difficulty would arise by making all these payments on an equality with trade creditors, at the same time they consider steps should be taken to put every class of creditor on an equal footing.

2370. I see they do not refer to arrears of wages and salary there?—No.

2371. Would they keep the preference there?—I think they would.

2372. That includes all you have been good enough to favour us with. Would you just tell me what class of traders were they that joined in this matter—were they retail traders or wholesale?—No retail traders of any description or kind, but purely wholesale traders and wholesale houses in Birmingham or its immediate district—firms of importance absolutely confined to that district.

2373. I think your original letter had the signature of those firms attached to it?—Yes, it had the signature of the Committee appointed by the trade.

2374. There were fifteen in number. About how many houses were represented as joining in the thing altogether?—I should make it clear what I mean by Birmingham houses. We only invited houses which were Birmingham and immediate district houses pure and simple. A firm, for instance—a London house—who had an agency in Birmingham would not be invited.

2375. How many should you say you had?—There were seventy-four in Birmingham, I think, speaking from memory, and I believe that sixty-nine joined in calling this meeting.

2376. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You have read the terms of the Reference to this Committee, viz.: "To inquire into and report upon the effect of the provisions of the laws at present in force in the United Kingdom in relation to bankruptcy, deeds of arrangement, and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors, and the prevention and punishment of frauds by debtors or their creditors, and the points and matters in which those laws and the procedure and administration under them require amendment." Does your association say point blank that they think insolvent estates are more favourably wound up under bankruptcy than under deeds of assignment ?—They are more satisfactorily wound up from a creditor's point of view but not financially—I mean they do not always look at the financial part of it.

2377. I am afraid I hardly follow that. What, in the opinion of your association, is the best way for the creditors to have an estate wound up ?—Financially, for the moment, they consider a deed of assignment is the better way.

2378. I understood you to say that your association had come to the conclusion that bankrupts' estates were more successfully realised in bankruptcy than under a deed ?—No, they have never said that.

2379. I understood you to say that your personal opinion was rather contrary to it ?—They have said that they would like deeds of assignment done away with.

2380. Why ?—Because they consider that there would be less bankruptcy if they were done away with and that the debtor would keep proper books and would not land himself into the Bankruptcy Court.

2381. What is your experience in the Birmingham district as to whether books are kept or books are not kept ?—My particular experience in this trade is that they are not kept.

2382. In answer to the Chairman, you said that your association represents the larger traders in your particular business in Birmingham and the district—do you think that they come into contact with the smaller traders ?—They do—shopkeepers.

2383. Shopkeepers, I know, but do you mean shopkeepers who do a large amount of business or small shopkeepers ?—Both.

2384. You would not find as a rule shopkeepers—grocers in a fairly large way of business—not keeping books ?—They do not keep books as a rule.

2385. Then that evidently is a crying evil. What suggestions would you make to the Committee to try and obviate that which is wrong ?—The suggestions I should make are embodied in my proof to a great extent, i.e., that it should be an offence if they did not keep them.

2386. Yes, but what should be the punishment ?—

2387. (Sir Edward Fithian.) He says imprisonment ?—In my proof it says imprisonment.

2388. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Would you go as far as that ?—Personally I should.

2389. Do you not think that there are a large class who are not competent to keep proper books of account as you would regard proper books of account ?—Yes. I am not speaking of proper books of account—I am not speaking of an adequate system of book-keeping—even an indifferent system of book-keeping would satisfy our requirements.

2390. Of course you realise that Britons are rather shy of the idea of imprisonment without there is some solid reason for it ?—I agree.

2391. And therefore we want to differentiate between those who cannot and those who will not keep books of account ?—Would you take this example ? A man at Wolverhampton—a grocer of whose estate I was trustee—has debtors who owe him approximately £4,000. He fails and comes into my hands. I find that he has kept no cash book; he has kept not a single paper that would enable me to prove one of those debts or to furnish the customer with proper particulars of those debts.

2392. And that man ought to be punished ?—That man ought to be punished. His wife acquires the business indirectly from the trustee and commences again, but it is identically the same business. Then she is made a bankrupt, but of course you cannot punish her.

2393. In your opinion is the fact of the suspension of the discharge any punishment at all ?—Not a bit, it is so very easy for the debtor to start again under another name.

2394. What is your experience in the wholesale trade of Birmingham as to a certain amount of bad debts being made by the somewhat reckless trading of the wholesale houses themselves in these days of strong competition ?—That is a big factor, no doubt, is the giving of indiscriminate credit

2395. And wholesale houses which recklessly trade must not be surprised if they make bad debts ?—I agree there are a few—I do not wish it to be understood that there are lots who recklessly trade in Birmingham, but there are a very few.

2396. What is your experience in Birmingham amongst wholesale houses who have contracted bad debts. Do they take any trouble to look after the winding up of an estate under a deed of assignment ?—Not the slightest.

2397. And therefore your suggestion is that they should be paid a fee of one guinea for attending the committee meeting so as to induce them to look after their own interest ?—I do.

2398. Therefore that they should be paid a premium to look after that which they should attend to without a premium ?—They have a man as trustee in whom they have presumably confidence, and they leave it almost entirely to him. Nominally they are members of the Committee, but virtually they do not bother about it. I think you would have some claim on their services greater than you have at present if you paid them a fee of a guinea for attending the meeting. There are evils, I quite see, in connection with the proposal, however.

2399. Then as regards No. 5 in our reference as to after acquired property, what are your views—that the present order of things should be modified so as to protect persons who may become creditors ?—They say that the law should not be modified in any way.

2400. You say not ?—Certainly; as it is, frequently the wholesaler does not make the full inquiries which he might.

2401. Have you any views to put before the Committee as to a general assignment of book debts beyond what you have set forth in your proof ?—Nothing beyond that they should be registered.

2402. Have you considered that it might be very disadvantageous to certain traders if they were not allowed to assign book debts under certain circumstances ?—I cannot see any more serious disadvantages than there are in a bill of sale.

2403. Have you fully considered that point ?—Yes.

2404. Are there any people in a large way of business who are producing various articles which they manufacture who it is essential should give security to those whom they are getting their products from ?—That does not apply in the grocery trade.

2406. (Chairman.) The book debtors you mean ?

2407. (Witness.) Would you mind putting the question again ?

2408. (Mr. Chamberlin.) In registering the assignment of book debts do you think it would be a hardship that the names of the debtors should be stated ?—Certainly.

2409. You think it would be a hardship ?—No, I do not think it would; I think the name of the person to whom the security is given should be stated.

2410. (Chairman.) You are misunderstanding it. Mr. Chamberlin means the name of the person who owes the debt.

2411. (Mr. Chamberlin.) What I want to try and bring out is this. Take the case of a gentleman who owes a tradesman £20 for goods recently supplied. Would it not be rather detrimental to that man personally that in the registration of book debts his name should appear ?—No, I think not.

2412. I mean if you went to a tailor and bought a suit of clothes, and take it that that debt had been standing a week, would you like it that your name should be published all over England that you owed your tailor £10 ?—I do not follow you; I think I have misunderstood your question.

2413. This is what I want to get at; in registering book debts in the same way as you would register a bill of sale do you think that it is essential that the names of people—the names of gentlemen owing debts to tradesmen—should be published ?—I do not see in what form they should be published.

2414. Then should you publish them at all ?—As far as I see there is no necessity to publish them. I do not see that the names should be published at all. Under a bill of sale you do not publish the absolute contents of the bill of sale.

2415. Book debts are rather different from goods under a bill of sale. The idea is that if a man assigns his book debts to a trade creditor they should be registered, and you cannot register them unless you give the particulars ?—I would register the name of the person to whom it was given and the name of the person who had given it, and the names of the debtors would be attached to the deed.

2416. (Mr. Richardson.) Referring to page 3 of your notes, do you not think that in the majority of cases where a bankrupt begins business again wholesale houses do know that he is undischarged but nevertheless gives him credit ?—There are such cases.

2417. Do not you think it is so in 90 per cent. of the cases ?—No.

2418. That men start business again and that wholesale houses give them credit again shortly afterwards knowing that they are undischarged bankrupts ?—No, I do not think that that is done.

2419. Would you bar such creditors in the second bankruptcy until the creditors of the first bankruptcy had been satisfied ?—No, I would allow the law to remain identically as it is now.

2420. You would give those who had allowed this man to start again the same rights under the law as the men who had given credit without knowing that their debtor was an undischarged bankrupt ?—Exactly.

2421. On page 4 you speak of reckless and improper trading, and the selling of goods generally without any regard to their cost. Have you thought that out as to how that can be proved—would it not be extremely difficult to prove it ?—There is no difficulty in the grocery trade as regards the question of cost, because the cost is identical in the majority of cases. For instance, a certain kind of bacon is sold at practically the same price all over England in the wholesale.

2422. Only from week to week ?—It fluctuates very little, from week to week.

2423. In the grocery trade in particular do not the prices change from day to day with regard to things which are of a perishable nature ?—Not every day, but weekly they may fluctuate.

2425. Then on page 5 under Clause 4 you say that, "By holding a meeting of creditors within seven days of the estate passing into the hands of the Official Receiver general directions could be taken from the creditors and practical men." Who do you mean by practical men ?—The creditors.

2426. You simply mean creditors who are practical men ?—Certainly.

2427. Then on page 8 you advocate that the names of the proprietors of businesses should be written up publicly outside of their premises ?—We do.

2428. Do you intend that to apply to all traders whether undischarged bankrupts or not ?—Certainly.

2430. Why not in all trades ?—I am not speaking of any other trade.

2431. If it is to apply to one trade why not to all—if it is good for the grocery trade why should it not be good for every other trade ?—We are sure it would be good for the grocery trade, and we cannot speak outside of that trade.

2432. Just one question with regard to the registration of book debts. You mean, I suppose, that the book debts should be registered precisely the same as a bill of sale, but only that the name of the person assigning the book debts and the person to whom it is given should be registered without giving the details of the debts ?—I do.

2434. But if professional men are legitimate traders it would be monstrously unfair to bar them from being on that committee ?—It would probably if professional men were creditors.

2435. And if creditors have the appointment of this committee what objection is there to a professional man if you wish to appoint one ? The creditors have a right to appoint whom they like, have they not ?—Yes.

2436. If they prefer to have a professional man why should not they have one ?—There is always a difficulty as to what authority a professional man has in these matters. I mean that we are subject in Birmingham to men coming from larger cities than Birmingham representing probably the whole people in a particular trade in that town. They come down and they say they have a list of creditors and represent so and so. Their voting powers are very heavy and they naturally want to sit on the committee; you cannot challenge professional men's authority in every case.

2437. They not only come from a larger town than Birmingham but they come from Birmingham to larger towns—to London, for instance—for such a purpose ?—Whilst you are on that point, nothing derogatory do I wish to say to brother professional men, but it certainly is very awkward if you get professional men from London, from Liverpool, Manchester or Bristol to attend a meeting of creditors in Birmingham, to object to those men sitting on the committee if they wish.

2438. On the last page you speak about the rates and taxes, and so on. I understand that you mean that the landlord should come in only as a trade creditor ?—That is so.

2439. (Mr. Peat.) When you refer to the fact of professional men sometimes representing a considerable number of debts and that they come from distances to represent their clients, have you any doubt in your mind that they do represent them ?—You have a doubt in your mind at times as to whether they have actually the authority of the principal of that firm or whether the authority may not come from a subordinate.

2440. For instance, have you no experience of certain trades being represented, say, by a wholesale grocers' association ?—Quite so.

2441. And that the Wholesale Grocers' Association as a rule act through a particular man ?—Quite so.

2442. And that the association consists of, say, in London, the wholesale grocers ?—Yes.

2443. And that they elect and request a particular man to represent them ?—Yes.

2444. Are you aware of that ?—I am quite aware of that. There is an excellent association in Liverpool of which Mr. Harmood Banner is the secretary.

2445. Why should you doubt the powers of such a man attending a meeting armed to represent all the members of his particular association who are creditors ?—I do not doubt the powers of a man like that. That is not the power that I doubt at all—where a man of respectability and eminence is concerned—but it is the smaller man who gets away from his particular town whose power I doubt. There are men who will go from Birmingham, I will not say to London, but to a place like Penzance, and say that they represent several people whom they do not represent at all, but who they might know and whom they probably had represented before.

2446. The trouble does not affect you, apparently, in Birmingham—it is something which might happen in some far distant town of less magnitude than Birmingham ?—That trouble ?

2447. Yes ?—I am only speaking of this one particular trade, the grocery trade, and each town, of course, is represented by its own particular accountant in the grocery trade.

2448. I may assume that you are aware that the wholesale grocery trades are combined ?—I know that there is an association in Liverpool—non-proprietary associations we will call them—and there is an association in Manchester, but I do not know of any other in the grocery trade.

25 July, 1906.

2449. And one in London ?—Not of wholesale grocers, is there ?

2450. You know better than I, possibly, but I thought there was ?—There is not an association of wholesale grocers, they are represented through an accountant, in the same way as Birmingham grocers are represented through me. There is no association, I think.

2451. Do you object in these cases, or do you think that objection need be taken in such cases, to professional men—and essentially to an accountant—representing members of an association to which he is accredited ?—I do not think that any objection can be taken to the representing of a bona fide association.

2452. Is it your experience with those whom you describe as "so-called accountants" or members of the profession to which you and I belong—you to the Incorporated, and I to the Institute—are outsiders who belong to nobody ?—They are outsiders mostly. They have just started in Birmingham an association called the "Wholesale Grocers' Alliance and Creditors' Protective Association," the secretary of which has issued a circular to everybody in the trade, informing them that he will always attend meetings of creditors for them free, and that he takes the trusteeship under deeds of assignment "without fee or remuneration."

2454. What you have in your mind is that that class of man should not be admitted to a trusteeship except under very rigid supervision ?—Yes ; I was talking of sitting on committees more for the moment. You see, a man goes down from Birmingham to a large town and he says, "I represent so-and-so." He gives you the name of the creditor and the amount of his debts, and you cannot say to him "Show me your credentials."

2455. Leaving that, let me assume that the bona fide honest man coming down from the association is elected on the committee, and that he generally is elected on the committee at the request or at the suggestion of his clients. Now, is there any reason why he should be treated differently to any other committee man ?—The difficulty is a very great one. I have known it myself when there have been two trade creditors and three professional men.

2456. And supposing they are respectable men representing honest associations, as you do, why should not they sit on the committee and be treated the same as any other members ?—Personally I should be very sorry to let it go forth that I have the slightest objection ; but the creditors amongst themselves, as you know, are rather awed by too much of the professional element in a matter of this kind, and if there are three or four accountants and two trade creditors on a committee it rather overawes them.

2457. Is not that rather unusual ?—It may be an exceptional case, but I have known of cases where the professional element has been more predominant than even that.

2458. However, your personal view is that professional men ought not to be treated differently to other men, provided they are properly accredited, and provided they do their duty properly ?—Exactly : that expresses my meaning perfectly.

2459. I understand your observations with regard to deeds of assignment—that you have a personal opinion different from that which your association has ?—I should like to make it quite clear that there is no association. There is a grocers' association in Birmingham, but it is an association of retail grocers.

2460. You do not represent the Grocers' Association in Birmingham ?—No. There is no association of wholesale grocers in Birmingham.

2461. It is a collection of wholesale traders in Birmingham whom you represent ?—Yes, wholesale traders in Birmingham and immediate district.

2462. You said that they had come to the conclusion that deeds of assignment should be amended in a particular way or that they should be abolished—properly abolished ?—Yes.

2463. That was not your own opinion ?—No, certainly not.

2465. Are they aware of the fact, for instance, that half of all the insolvencies are done by deeds of assignment ?—Yes, they are.

2466. And still they have come to the conclusion that they ought to be abolished ?—Yes.

2467. Are you aware of their view on the subject, for instance, of a deed of assignment, in which all the traders agree to release the debtor. Would they say that that was an illegal assignment—is that their opinion—where there are no outstanding and dissenting creditors ? Is it the opinion of the gentlemen whom you represent that such an arrangement as that should be considered illegal ?—Yes, it should—whether they assent or dissent.

2468. Independently of the wishes of the creditors, their opinion is that that should be considered illegal ?—Quite so, but my opinion is very much the opposite but I am not here to express my own opinion.

2470. You are aware of several, I think ?—Yes, and it is getting more prevalent, too.

2471. Do you think your friends, the wholesale grocers, are aware that such things happen ?—Yes, painfully aware.

2472. And that they would consider all such private arrangements under which a man took ten shillings instead of twenty shillings should be illegal—that a man must be bankrupt if he cannot pay twenty shillings in the £ ?—That is their idea.

2473. That the creditor may not accept five shillings, ten shillings, fifteen shillings, or seventeen and sixpence ?—Yes ; their idea is that every man should be made bankrupt who cannot pay twenty shillings in the £.

2474. And the creditor would have no power to compromise his debts ?—That is so.

2475. I would like to ask you upon a point which you mentioned just to make it clear on the minutes—you referred to frauds by trustees in cases where a trustee gets appointed in an improper and roundabout way, and never accounts for the money in his hands. I conclude that that would only be under deeds of assignment or voluntary arrangements of that character ?—That is so.

2476. Do you find that such trustees are professional men, or that they are men who do not belong to the societies which you and I represent ?—The particular class do not belong to either body, but they are professional men, and they call themselves accountants.

2478. I wonder if your society considered when they suggested that the names of all the partners should appear over the door that in the case of the wholesale houses the names of the partners should also appear over the door, because I think their remarks might mean that the names of the partners should be over the door of the shopkeeper, but not over the door of the wholesale house ?—There may have been some little ignorance on that point amongst them.

2479. They would like the names of the partners over the door of their debtors' premises without being over their own doors, but you are not aware that they have considered that ?—I do not know whether they have considered that—I would not say—but most of them have their own names up.

2481. I would like to ask your view on the subject of distinguishing cash creditors from trade creditors. Do your people represent or consider that a person who is a cash creditor for a bonâ fide loan should be treated differently from a person who is a creditor bonâ fide also for goods delivered ?—They do not say there should be any difference in the treatment, not if he is a bonâ fide creditor.

2482. I understood you rather to say that they should have certain restricted rights ?—No, they say that the trustee should be elected only by a certain majority of creditors.

2483. Is not that a preference to trade creditors a-distinguished from cash creditors ?—I do not follow that.

2484. I understood your observations to refer to the fact that the official receiver had admitted in some particular case the cash creditor to vote, and hence by that means had carried the appointment of a particular trustee ?—Yes, but what they did not want was the whole of the estate in the hands of one creditor—whether he be a trade creditor or cash creditor—they do not want the whole of the power in the hands of one creditor.

2485. You do not wish to interfere with the rights of the cash creditor to vote ?—No.

2486. I am sorry I have not quite fully grasped your meaning on that subject, which apparently was that the majority in amount should not carry the trustee ?—Quite so.

2487. But the majority in number and amount should, is that it ?—That is not so.

2488. The majority in number and amount together ?—It is a majority in value, and two-thirds in number.

2489. Why two-thirds in number, have you any reason for that ? why not one-third or three-thirds ?—Their only views are that the smaller creditor should have an equal voice in the appointment of the trustee with the larger creditor—that the smaller creditor should have a voice in the appointment of trustees as well as the larger one.

2490. That is independent of the question whether the cash creditor would bonâ fide seek the interests of the estate as well as the creditor for goods, but the creditor for goods being for a smaller amount should have a voice in the appointment of trustee ?—Quite so.

2491. That is the view that you have, or your association has ?—My personal views are that the difficulties of that would be almost insurmountable.

2492. Yes, I fear they would be ?—A majority in value and two-thirds in number would simply mean that some of these houses would be pestered for their votes.

2493. I fear that your association may not have fully considered all the difficulties in the way; however, you are only expressing their views. For instance, do you think it possible that every debtor should file a list of his creditors within twenty-four hours, considering the fact that the debtor's creditors may be hundreds in number. Is it possible ? How can your people have sufficiently considered it to think that it is possible for a debtor to file a list of his creditors and the amount due to them in twenty-four hours ?—Assuming there are 150 creditors there should be no difficulty in that if a man has kept his books in the slightest way that could be relied on. The headings and addresses are in the ledger, and the amounts are in the ledger, and I would not bind him down to a shilling as to his indebtedness.

2494. Supposing the creditors instead of being 150 were 150,000 ?—150,000 in number ?

2496. I daresay in the grocery trade ?—I should think that the average would be seventy-five to 100.

2497. In the grocery trade ?—Yes.

2498. Your observations do not deal with the larger estates ?—We should not have that class in Birmingham.

2499. Your observations would not apply to the larger estates ?—No. The biggest I think I have dealt with in Birmingham for some time is probably one where the assets were £13,000, and that was an exceptional one.

2500. Is it your view that a man who was a bankrupt, the trustee having sold his estate to his wife, or daughter, cousin, or any other relation, should not be in a position to act for that relation in carrying on the shop in future ?—Certainly I do not think he should.

2501. He should not be in the position to do so ?—No.

2502. To act for that relation in carrying on the shop for him ?—No.

2504. Supposing a wholesale house bought the assets, would you allow the bankrupt then to assist ? If you did not, you would destroy, would you not, his means of earning a sixpence ?—I think there might be hardships in one or two solitary cases, but they would be very few and far between.

2505. You have not considered that point ?—We have thought it out, but we have not come to any definite conclusion upon it, because it was impossible to do so.

2506. With regard to books, you have expressed your view, but you do not suggest that the debtor might conveniently be required to prepare some statement of his affairs at the end of each year—say as to his stock and his book debts on the one side, and to his liabilities and capital on the other ?—I make a suggestion, however, earlier in my evidence (see page 96) to the effect that when he applies for his discharge the fact should be taken into account whether he had periodically taken stock or not in an attempt to ascertain his position.

2507. I mean that a trader going on year by year should be compelled to keep some statement of his affairs each year, as well as a cash account—do you think that that is advisable ?—I think that it is absolutely essential.

2508. Your view is that he should keep some form of books which would enable him to see his position at the end of each year of his trading, giving his receipts and payments, and an account of the debts which he owes, and of the book debts due to him ?—Quite so.

2509. That would seem necessary and elementary as far as book-keeping was concerned ?—Quite so.

2510. You represent the wholesale houses in the grocery trade in Birmingham but not houses who have agencies in Birmingham ?—No.

2511. Is there any reason why they should have kept aloof ?—We felt that each town would take its own initiative in this matter.

2512. Are there seventy-four wholesale houses in the grocery trade in Birmingham ?—Yes.

2513. Or more ?—No, there are no more.

2514. That is the total ?—It is drawing a hard and fast line, but there might be one or two men who claim that they are wholesale houses in addition, but we have not included them. We have not included any shopkeeper or any man who could be called a retailer.

2515. You had no association, but you summoned these gentlemen to consider these terms of reference for that purpose ?—Yes.

2516. And it may be said that those gentlemen represent in fact the wholesale houses in the grocery trade in Birmingham other than those who have any agency ?—Birmingham and the immediate district. You see what happened was this. I was requested by one or two of the wholesale houses to call this meeting and I called it; and I was in possession of a copy of the terms of reference which I laid before them. They thereupon, out of themselves, formed a Committee of eighteen thoroughly representative firms—one representing jam-making, another representing the paper trade as applied to groceries, and a third representing the coffee trade, while the others would represent provisions and groceries, and other branches. The Committee met week after week and considered these things very carefully, and had them some time under discussion, and then they formulated these resolutions.

2517. And were their views approved by the seventy-four, or are they the views of the Committee only ?—They are the views of the Committee, but the seventy-four have been put in possession of those views, and there has been only one dissentient from them.

2518. Are you aware whether the seventy-four fully grasped the meaning of these views ?—They are men of average intelligence, and I assume that they did—every man in Birmingham, of course thinks——

25 July, 1906.

2519. That he is a man of average intelligence or more ?—I would not like to impute that, but every man thinks he has some idea of amending the Bankruptcy Act and revolutionising it in some way.

2520. (Mr. Addison.) I want to understand about this annual list of undischarged bankrupts—who was to prepare it ?—It should be prepared by some of the many officials in the Board of Trade Department.

2521. At Government expense ?—Yes.

2522. Do you know how many undischarged bankrupts there are now ?—50,000 or 60,000.

2523. 70,000 according to the report for 1904 ?—Yes, I have the figure somewhere exactly.

2525. Apart from other objections, how would you deal with that list as regards corrections which would require to be made by reason of deaths or persons going out of the country. Who is to see to that ? Would they be retained and published year by year, notwithstanding death and absence ?—No, deaths——

2526. I rather want to see how this is practicable ?—I quite agree that it is almost impracticable in many ways.

2527. I think, if you think that, that we will stop there ?—I do. I pointed out to my committee what a formidable list it would be—I made the same point that you have raised.

2528. I am not sure whether you would approve of persons in this condition being pilloried also every year by a publication of their names ?—I do not think there are any hardships too many that you can inflict on a bankrupt.

2529. Persons who have been convicted of offences—people guilty of theft it might be convenient to have published in a list in that way ?—Quite so.

2530. But when they have undergone their punishment I doubt whether that would be considered a right thing ?—Your list would materially decrease from time to time because that would be one of the incentives for a man to apply for his discharge—to avoid appearing in that list. The cases of bankruptcy from misfortune, are very few and far between in our experience.

2531. I must not take up too much time, but I see on the page where you refer to hiring agreements you say : "The committee consider the registration and assignment of book debts and hiring agreements would obviate the difficulties." You do not tell us what the difficulties are or what they would obviate ?—Some of the difficulties are that the man has a very good pair of scales in his shop ; he has a very good cart and he has a cash till or two. They are substantial assets, and when a man fails you are probably confronted with the fact that all those three are under hiring agreements, or have been obtained under the hire purchase system.

2532. Then the difficulty is that the trader says : "I gave you credit, and because you had somebody else's property then, that somebody else's property should pay my debt" ?—That is so.

2533. I think one point you made was that the Official Receiver should have power to reject a proof if he thought fit to do so ?—Yes, it would not be permanently rejected but rejected for voting purposes.

2534. The scheme of the Act is that creditors as a whole are to have certain rights ?—Certainly.

2535. Is it your suggestion that the Official Receiver should, for the purpose of appointing a trustee, have power to take away the rights of particular creditors ?—He should have power to exercise the rights named.

2536. You know, under the Rules, he has power to admit or reject a proof for the purpose of voting, but it is subject to appeal. That means, if he is not satisfied that the person is a creditor, but I understand you to mean that he is to have right to reject any proof or proofs without regard to that ?—Certainly.

2537. On page 12 you say : "If it should be found necessary to take legal proceedings against any person or persons" that, I understand, ought to be provided for at the public expense ?—Yes, certainly.

2538. What legal proceedings are referred to ?—For the recovery of assets by way of motion.

2539. Provided for by the Board of Trade, I suppose ?—Yes, there should be some fund available.

2540. And, as the Chairman suggested, are the Board of Trade to pay the costs of the defendant if he succeeds ?—It is not an expensive process—it should be but a small expense.

2541. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I think, if I understand correctly, that the report which has been presented on behalf of the wholesale grocers of Birmingham was unanimously arrived at by the Committee ?—It was, and signed by them.

2542. And that they are in favour of a report being presented in every case as to the conduct of the debtor ?—Yes, that is so.

2543. Whether he applies for his discharge or not ?—That is so.

2544. And the reason assigned for that is that the mere fact of a debtor knowing that he will be periodically brought before the Court would act as an incentive to him to apply for his discharge ?—That is so.

2545. Then the number of undischarged bankrupts would presumably be very considerably diminished ?—We hope so.

2546. That is to say, they would be dealt with by the court either by having their discharge refused or granted subject to conditions or not ?—Certainly.

2547. Is not it an inference that the undischarged bankrupts—those who now fail to apply for discharge, consist largely, in the opinion of the wholesale grocers of Birmingham, of people who have committed offences against the Bankruptcy Act ?—No, not entirely.

2548. They do not go so far as that ?—No ; but of men who do not desire a second exposure.

2549. But why is that expression put there which is quoted in the document, "I shall not apply for my discharge," if attention is not pointed to the fact that some offence has been committed ?—It is also pointed to the fact that it will not hurt him if he applies for a discharge.

2550. Can you assign any reason why these undischarged bankrupts do not apply for their discharge ?—One of the principal reasons is, as I have said, they do not desire a second exposure, and another reason is on the ground of expense.

2551. But if they could easily get their discharge would not the second exposure be rather to their advantage than otherwise ?—No, I do not think it would. I do not see how it could be worked, but I think the application for discharging a man should be heard with as little publicity as possible.

2552. On what ground ?—On the ground that perhaps the bankruptcy may have taken place ten years before he applies for his discharge. He applies for it, and the whole thing crops up again and appears in a local paper, and he is exposed again.

2553. Is it not the very principle of the present Bankruptcy Act that there shall be full disclosure and full publicity in regard to all bankruptcy proceedings ?—Probably it is—I agree that it is.

2554. Can you suggest any other reason why he should not apply for his discharge ?—On the ground of expense.

2555. On the ground of expense ?—Yes.

2556. I see you would make the non-keeping of books a misdemeanour, I presume ?—That is so.

2557. Then in regard to the question of the publication of the name of the trader over his door, had your committee before them the question as to the desirability of establishing a system of registration of firms and persons who trade in other names than their own ?—No, we have not thought that out at all.

2558. Do not you think that something of that kind would meet the difficulty ?—Personally I do.

2559. So that any person wishing to give credit to a man in trade would be able to ascertain by an inspection of the register who he really was, no matter under what name he is trading ?—I agree personally that that would be an excellent form.

2560. I think the committee had before them the question as to enlarging the powers of the registrar, and they appear to have had some doubt as to whether it is desirable to give the registrar power to commit the bankrupt for contempt, or impose a term of imprisonment for offences—have they considered whether such powers ought to be given, or might reasonably be given to the county court judge, so that he could deal with offences that have been established before him ?—We talked it over, but we came to no resolution on the point.

2561. Have you any personal opinion on the subject ?—My personal opinion is that the judge should deal with the matter.

2562. And should have summary power ?—Yes.

2563. So that cases could be dealt with rapidly and effectively ?—Yes, but limiting his powers to small offences.

2564. The object of that would be rather to secure a certainty of punishment and quickness with regard to procedure ?—Yes.

2565. And consequently that it should act as a deterrent ?—Yes.

2566. With regard to other cases ?—Certainly. You see the difficulty now is bringing home to a man an offence. I had, if I might cite it, a particular case myself in Wolverhampton a few months ago where the man's wife bought the business back from the trustee. She was subsequently made a bankrupt, and she swore that a part of the money with which she bought the business—£100—was lent her by an assistant. That assistant was brought up under Section 27, and he swore that he lent her this £100. He further stated in what way he lent it to her—that he had lent it to her in gold. The dates were put up on an almanac when it was lent Subsequently the man—the witness—was asked, "Where did you get the money from ?". (A.) "I borrowed the money from my brother." (Q.) "Where does your brother live." (A.) "I decline to say." The registrar finally sent the witness before the judge, the judge committed the witness for contempt of court for refusing to answer the question, and he went to Stafford Gaol. The man was in Stafford Gaol for a week or ten days, and then he made an application to the judge to come up and purge his contempt. I was the trustee—and he said, "I have come to tell you that everything I have said with regard to the £100 is false—that I never lent the woman £100, and that nothing of the sort transpired. What happened was that she gave me the £100 which she said she had saved from some source or another. I handed it to her again." The whole of these papers and the transcript of the shorthand notes were submitted to the Public Prosecutor, who declined to take up the matter on the ground that perjury of that kind required corroborative or confirmatory evidence.

2567. Then as a remedy for cases of that kind you would place the power in the hands of the county court judge ?—I would.

2568. To deal with offences that are established before him ?—I would.

2569. Your committee came to the conclusion that deeds of arrangement should be abolished entirely, the only proceeding being in bankruptcy. The reasons, I gather, would be because of the attendant publicity and punishment with regard to the bankruptcy ?—That is so.

2570. And that in the public interest therefore they think it desirable that all debtors should go through the same operation—the same ordeal of publicity ?—That exactly expresses their view. They know that the trustee's powers under the deed are very limited as regards the debtor's conduct.

2571. In regard to the assignment of book debts, do these assignments occur to any very considerable extent in the grocery trade in Birmingham ?—They are very rare.

2572. But when they do, you find they occasion a great hardship to creditors ?—Yes, when they do.

2573. And you think that the proper remedy would be to have them registered so that creditors could ascertain exactly what book debts had been assigned ?—Yes.

2574. (Mr. Smith.) I assume that your Committee are desirous of getting control over a bankrupt's estate at an earlier date than at present ?—We are.

2575. And that is the origin of the suggestion that debtors should file a list of creditors within twenty-four hours ?—That is so.

2576. In cases where, owing to the complication of the debtor's affairs, it would be impossible to do that, would you put forward a suggestion for calling a meeting of persons claiming to be creditors at an early date for the purpose of the Official Receiver consulting with them as to the interim management of the estate ?—I agree that that would meet the case in all probability—it is not suggested that the statement of affairs, or anything of that kind should accompany the first notice.

2577. No, I am assuming that the notice could not be prepared but that where there is a considerable interval required for the preparation of the debtor's statement of affairs that that would meet the difficulty ?—Yes, I think so.

2578. The Official Receiver would be inclined to act on the suggestion of the creditors—is that your experience ?—We always find him most agreeable.

2580. Would it meet your difficulty if the powers of the Board of Trade were enlarged as to the taking of an objection to a trustee ? You are aware that at present they are somewhat narrowly limited. Would you approve of extending the power to cases where the Board of Trade were of opinion that in the interests of the general body of creditors it was not desirable that certain persons should be appointed trustees ?—I quite agree that they should have such power, and that might to some extent meet our objection provided they exercised it without any personal bias.

2581. That you must take your chance of, but I take it you would be prepared to run that risk. You would act under the directions of the Board of Trade in the matter. With regard to the payment of the committee you suggested that the committee should be paid or rather that was your committee's suggestion ?—Yes.

2582. You yourself said that you thought that might be open to some evils ?—I did so.

2583. Do you see any real objection to the payment of the committee ?—The only thing is that it might multiply the number of meetings.

2584. The remuneration might be limited to a small commission ?—It might.

2585. Do you not think that the committee of inspection would take a more active interest if they had a small nominal interest in the realisation of the estate ?—I am certain that they would.

2586. With regard to the trustees' claim on subsequent assets your Committee are of opinion that the law should not be altered upon that point ?—Yes.

2587. Did they take into consideration mortgages on land where the debtor had obtained an advance on land while he was an undischarged bankrupt; have they taken into consideration the hardship involved there ?—No, we did not discuss that question.

2588. Just a question about deeds of arrangement. I suppose there are a good many deeds of arrangement in Birmingham in the grocery trade ?—There are a great number.

2589. And is it at all usual for such a practice as the non-keeping of books to be disclosed in those cases ?—Personally, being interested in most of those grocery failures, I always state fully what books have been kept, and if I attend a meeting I ask what books have been kept.

2590. Is it usual where estates are wound up under deeds of arrangement to find that no satisfactory books have been kept ?—No satisfactory books have been kept usually.

25 July, 1906.

2591. And do you find that several offences under the Bankruptcy Acts have been committed ?—Yes, many.

2592. And do the Committee think that the debtor should be punished when these offences take place ?—They do.

2593. I suppose that the Committee base their recommendation that the deed should be abolished upon the view that the evils which arise and the abuses which arise under deeds of arrangement are greater than the advantages which are derived from them ?—They do base their views on that, and one of the principal objections they take is that in a good many cases the trustees do not issue a statement of receipts and payments.

2594. That you must either introduce checks, therefore, into deeds of assignment, which it is very difficult to do, or else you must condone these offences, or you must bring them into bankruptcy—there are only the three alternatives ?—Whilst you are on that point there is another point that requires serious consideration with regard to the deeds of assignment, and that is the question of costs—especially solicitors' costs. I hope I am not offending the susceptibilities of anyone in saying that. There is no power to regulate solicitors' costs under a deed.

2595. No, but I take it generally, in the view of your committee, that the evils which arise at present from the present state of the law with regard to deeds of arrangement are so great that unless they can be effectually removed your committee would desire to have the whole system abolished ?—That is it.

2596. And it is their opinion that they cannot be effectively removed ?—No. They do not say that.

2597. But they do not suggest, do they, that they can ?—Yes, they make certain suggestions.

2598. For improving them ?—For improving them, but they say, "We are of opinion that deeds of assignment should be abolished."

2600. You personally do not agree with the views which your committee have expressed on this ?—No.

2601. Did you express your views to them ?—Certainly.

2602. Would it meet your view if a deed of assignment were to be brought so far under the administration of the Bankruptcy Law that you would provide protection against fictitious claims, and against the abuse of proxies, and other things of that sort, by a preliminary procedure taking place under the Bankruptcy Act after the execution of the deed, the Official Receiver reporting upon the conduct of the debtor as to whether he considered there was matter for investigation or not, and the court then approving, in the exercise of its discretion, of such deed, and handing the matter over to a trustee ?—You are asking me personally, and personally I would say that I do not think the matter should come under the notice of the Official Receiver at all.

2603. What is your objection to him ?—It is an additional——

2604. Cost ?—Not so much the additional cost; the cost would not be very much, but the trouble that would be entailed upon the creditors would be considerable.

2605. Is not the Official Receiver's supervision effective in securing the results which the Committee are aiming at in regard to correcting evils under deeds of arrangement ?—Yes, it would be.

2606. And would it not be equally effective if it were brought into court and submitted to him for a report ?—My ideas are that there should be two distinct arrangements as existing now.

2607. That the Official Receiver should be kept out of it ?—Certainly, but that the abuses that exist under the Deeds of Arrangement Act should be altered.

2608. I want to get at the real ground of your objection to the Official Receiver's intervention—it is not that he is not efficient ?—A deed is costly under the present procedure, and it would be an additional expense. My ideas are very much in the direction of reducing the expenses of the deed of assignment.

2609. But you agree that a course such as that would commend itself to your committee ?—I would reduce the expenses in every way; I would reduce the trustees' remuneration, I would reduce the solicitor's costs very much, and I would reduce the attendant expenses.

2610. And I take it that on the whole your committee desire to see deeds modified or abolished in the interests of the general commercial well-being of the community ?—That is it.

2611. Even if it involved a partial loss to themselves ?—That is it, a partial financial loss to themselves—that exactly expresses it. There is just another point that may not come within your terms of reference, and that is the appointment of the Official Receivers. I do not think it is desirable to appoint an Official Receiver who is in private practice in the same town where he would act as Official Receiver.

2612. (Mr. Smith.) You mean the appointment of solicitors ?—Yes, or accountants.

2613. You think that the man should devote his whole time to his office ?—I think it is an iniquitious practice for a solicitor or an accountant in the same town to be an Official Receiver as well, especially so in the case of a solicitor.

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 17th October, 1906.

PRESENT.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ROBERT MELLORS called; and Examined.

Mr. Robert Mellors. 17 Oct., 1906.

2614. (Chairman.) I think you are a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, and have been in business for more than fifty years, and are a member of the firm of Mellors, Basden & Mellors, of Nottingham and St. Swithin's Lane ?—I am.

2615. And I think you have been for a good many years secretary to the Nottinghamshire and Midland Merchants' and Traders' Association ?—Thirty-eight years.

2616. I think you have been secretary to the Association of Trade Protection Societies of the United Kingdom ?—I beg your pardon. On the first I have been forty-five years, and on the second thirty-eight years ? I retired several years ago.

2618. And as director of several joint stock companies you have had opportunities of forming a judgment as to the administration of the bankruptcy laws ?—I have.

2619. I think you have read and considered the terms of reference by the Board of Trade to this Committee ?—I have.

2620. Perhaps it would be convenient in examining you, so that you may favour us with your views, if you would take the paragraphs in order. I think that you have formulated what your views would be in relation to the investigation of the conduct and punishment of a bankrupt, and perhaps you would just give them to us. We, most of us, have them before us, but we would ask you to give them vivâ voce ?—It appears to me that the present power which the court has is quite sufficient for investigation. The difficulty appears to be that no use is made of the information when obtained. A man appears before the registrar, or rather before the Official Receiver; he then appears before the court, and information is obtained, a number of questions are answered, but no result follows. What appears to me desirable is, that when a bankrupt appears for his final examination the judge should have the power thereupon to declare that the bankrupt by his conduct has placed himself in one of three categories or classes. The first class would consist of those who have not been guilty of any serious misconduct —who have traded in the ordinary way. The second class would be those who have neglected to keep proper books, as now required, to show their position. By "proper books," I mean a cash book, bought and sold day book, and ledger, and such books should be required to be kept entered up daily. Some people do keep their books, but they are often months behind. If the books are not thus kept, the only substitute I would suggest for it would be that a statement of assets and liabilities should be periodically made, say, every year, or every several years, so that if a man cannot keep books, he should at all events show what he has, and what he is liable for, and failing this he should be liable to be charged before the court. Then the second class would also include debtors who had misconducted themselves in certain respects, such as extravagant living, intemperance, betting, and so on, but which do not amount to fraud, and cannot be called crime. The third class would be those who have been guilty of fraud. Now the first class, I think, the judge should have the power to give a discharge to at once, or discharge early, at such date as he might deem to be desirable. The second class he should have the power to suspend the discharge of, subject to such conditions as he may think reasonable. The system which is in vogue in administration orders in the county courts—payment into court of a certain amount per month—I think might frequently be extended to general bankruptcies, so that if the judge was satisfied that he had something to pay to his other creditors, he should do so. The third class I would suggest that the judge should order the Public Prosecutor to take up—not a prosecution, but an investigation at the public expense, and it should thereupon be the duty of the local representative of the Public Prosecutor to investigate, and, if need be, to prosecute. Now, there are very great difficulties in the way of a trustee in bankruptcy getting the Public Prosecutor to move. I had a case some years ago—a firm of solicitors—and there was every variety of fraud, but after months of trying, I failed to secure action on the part of the Public Prosecutor. In any case, I think, that supposing that the Public Prosecutor does not find sufficient material or sufficient ground for a prosecution, he should, at all events make a report—a public report, in which he would have, if I may say so, to declare the conduct of the bankrupt. Then, I think that all bankrupts in the second or third class should, by virtue of their bankruptcy, be deprived of their voting power for Parliamentary and parochial purposes, but that leave might be given to them to apply for restoration after a given time. You deprive a man of his vote if he has done certain small criminal matters, and a man who does not pay his creditors has no right to be voting for Parliament, or for the spending of the rates and so forth. It appears to me that this is a very reasonable provision, and I think, I am not sure about this, prevails in France. All bankrupts should, until they have obtained their discharge, be liable upon the application to the court of a sufficient proportion of creditors to appear before the registrar at such intervals as may be deemed necessary—I would say once a year—to declare their means. That, I think, should continue for a certain length of time. I do not think they should continue for life. It is no use hanging a millstone round a man's neck for the rest of his life. I think seven or ten years would be reasonable, and would satisfy the justice of the case. In the case of undischarged bankrupts contracting debts and obtaining property, power should be given to the court to make an order as to the division of property between old and new creditors; such order to be such as the court may deem equitable. At present the first trustee claims all assets, but the threat of litigation necessitates compromise. I had a case where a builder in an extensive way was bankrupt and left Nottingham.

2621. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Was that Collison ?—That is Collison. He went to another district, and attained to a somewhat prominent position, and contracted considerable debts, obtained conveyances, granted leases, and incurred all kinds of obligations, whereupon the knowledge of his affairs coming to the creditors under the bankruptcy, the trustee or Official Receiver claimed everything, and thereupon there was a pretty difficulty, because there were a considerable number of creditors, and it ended in a compromise. Now it seems to me that the danger of leaving all the undischarged bankrupts that we have, a great army, I suppose they are, is a serious menace to the trade of the country, and some steps should be taken which would be a protection, if I may so put it, to the newer creditors, because I think the newer creditors are, in such a case, in a worse condition than the old. The old creditors can claim all the assets, and the newer creditors have to do as best they can. With regard to the registry of bankrupts, I suggest that there should be kept at the court in London, a registry of all bankrupts' names, addresses, occupations, etc., and that the public should be able to have a search made upon payment of one shilling. Assuming that there are, as I have said, a vast army of undischarged bankrupts, and no record kept of them anywhere, it is a disadvantage which, I think, ought to be removed. There should be a place to which the traders of the country can send, and have a search made, and thereupon ascertain whether a particular person was bankrupt, and when and where. At present, although a man contracting a debt, he being an undischarged bankrupt, is bound under a penalty to declare the same, yet that is only a small consolation to new creditors who years afterwards incur loss through bankrupts failing to declare a previous bankruptcy, and then are found to be worthless. Occasionally, undischarged bankrupts borrow money upon property or policies of life insurance or otherwise, and are found to have given no title. This was a case I came across recently. I think the court might be empowered to give some relief where an undischarged bankrupt has wrongly charged or conveyed property. Where that has been done in a bona fide way it appears hard that the persons who receive such securities should have to suffer. Some power might be given to the court to deal according to equity rather than law. Every bankrupt should report himself within seven years, or ten years it might be—every twelve months to the Registrar or Official Receiver of the court where he was made bankrupt. This should be done by letter, and would give his present residence, occupation, and means, and would show whether he was able to pay anything, or at any rate would give the means to the Official Receiver of making enquiry and investigation thereupon. I think that is all I have to say upon that point.

2622. (Chairman.) Yes. I think perhaps if you would not mind going through your memorandum first, and then we will trouble you.

2623. (Witness.) Some relief I think is necessary where the mortgagee claims machinery. This refers to factories. We have had a number of cases in Nottingham where a factory was found to hold machinery that was deemed to be attached to the freehold, although it might be merely by means of a screw or by means of a rod, still it was deemed to be the property of the mortgagee, and although the machinery may have been put in to the factory after the mortgage was granted, although the machinery was put in and not actually paid for, I think there was a case where it was a hire and purchase agreement.

2624. (Chairman.) Yes; that is Hobson and Gorringe?—Yes; that is so. My suggestion is that the mortgage deed, if it is intended to include machinery, should be registered in like manner as a bill of sale, and failing that should apply only to the freehold and what goes with the freehold, namely, engine, boiler, shafting, and gearing. That would apply to trades such as we have in Nottingham. Now it is quite possible that there may be in some big engineering places, something that I am not now contemplating, but generally speaking, I think that this principle would be a right one. I think it is due that the law should be amended in that respect. Now then, with regard to married women, this is a very considerable difficulty. Many married women are now trading without any indication that they are married. Credit is given upon the supposition that they are single, and may be sued as such. As the word "Limited" attached to a man's name is a warning word, giving notice to creditors that they are trusting a company, so some word ought to be shown on a married woman's trading sign-board and on bill heads, or a notice be given to the local county court registrar, that the married woman trading is so married. Where a man and his wife are trading together, and this is intended to be relied on as a protection to either party, it should in like manner be declared. If a man trades in his wife's name, whether or not he is an undischarged bankrupt, there should be registered a definite declaration to that effect. Married women in business should be capable of suing and being sued in the same manner as an unmarried woman. I have a case which I call Adams, a case of a deed of assignment where the husband and wife were trading together. The husband's affairs had been wound up under a deed of assignment six or seven years ago, hence the trading name, the name of M.A.—Mary Anne—Adams, the husband's name being Samuel. The lease of the premises was in the name of Samuel. The banking account was in the name of M. A. Adams. Some bills bore the name of "M. A.," and were accepted by the wife as "M. A." Some were signed by Samuel, some by both. Credit was given by some customers to Mrs. Adams, but by some to Mr. Adams. The bill-heads simply said "Adams." The furniture was claimed by the wife. The case ought to have gone into bankruptcy, but their solicitor went to the Registrar, who refused a petition against the wife, and as it was no good taking out one against the husband because she held the assets, the case had to be dealt with as best they could. That is the state of affairs that I say ought to be remedied. Then deeds of arrangement. Creditors usually desire that in ordinary deeds of arrangement there should be as little interference as possible, whether by statutory requirement or official supervision. This, in the case where there is no fraud, is merely a matter as between creditors and their debtor. They want, therefore, the costs to be limited and the realization as quick as possible. This class will correspond with the winding up of a company in voluntary liquidation. Yet there are several evils to guard against for which provision should be made. My own impression is that these evils will best be guarded against by an application to the Court, such application to be made either by the trustee or a creditor as the case may be. The evils I refer to are these (1) A debtor making a deed of assignment to a trustee of his own choice without the concurrence of the creditors. (2) A debtor making a deed to an unsuitable trustee, or with conditions that are not bonâ fide, or which it is impossible to carry out. (3) A creditor waiting until nearly three months have expired before taking any action, and then with a view to securing an advantage over the other creditors threatening to or taking proceedings in bankruptcy. (4) A trustee realizing the assets imprudently and against the interests of the creditors. (5) A trustee failing to realize, or failing to declare a dividend within a reasonable time. (6) A trustee failing within a reasonable time to make a report to the creditors as to the result of the realization. I would meet the foregoing evils as follows:—(1) A debtor making a deed of assignment without the concurrence of the creditors, any creditor should have the right to make an application to the Court to set the deed aside, and the creditors should have the right to meet and choose their own trustee. (2) A debtor making a deed to an unsuitable trustee on unreasonable conditions, the creditors should again have the right of application to the Court. The trustee under any deed should within seven days give notice to every creditor of whom he has knowledge that he has been appointed trustee, and in such notice should state his calling, residence and the circumstances under which the deed was made. The trustee under the deed should make a declaration which should be filed with the deed stating that a guarantee company security has been given equal in amount to the declared amount of the assets. That might possibly be settled by the Official Receiver or the Registrar or somebody on the spot. A cover note by the guarantee or insurance company for such amount should be filed. Now the reason why I suggest this is particularly because I produce several circulars sent out by unsuitable persons to debtors against whom County Court judgments have been registered. The number of deeds made to this class of persons is becoming serious. I should explain here that when a County Court judgment appears in the private trade circulars the debtor against whom such judgment is registered immediately receives a circular such as this one which I will read to you (reading letter).

2626. (Chairman.) Is this one sent signed by any of our friends Armstrong or Afford ?—No. If you will be good enough to look into these "Gazettes" you will see the class of cases that I refer to. One owes £41; his assets are £25. It is an assignment upon trust with a view to the payment of debts in full, the debtor to pay the trustee 6s. weekly, commencing April, 1905, for rateable division every three months. The next case is a very similar one with debts £59 and assets £25. You will see these kind of cases all over the country. They keep creditors at bay. What becomes of the money I do not say, but what I say is that security must be given, and that can rightly be given by a guarantee or cover note accompanying the deed upon registration, and thereupon the creditors would be secured as to the moneys paid into the hands of the trustee.

2627. The next is paragraph 3 ?—Where a trustee has given notice to a creditor that a deed has been made, and that he has been appointed trustee, the creditor should have the right to commence bankruptcy proceedings forthwith, provided the creditor declares that he has a reasonable suspicion of fraud or collusion, etc. If not taken within seven or ten days after notice given, he should have no power to take proceedings in bankruptcy. The right to petition within three months should be withdrawn, but the creditor should have the power to make an application to the Court to annul the deed, or remove the trustee. If a creditor is proved to have obtained an undue advantage over the other creditors—this, I am sorry to say, is somewhat common—he should be debarred from taking any proceedings. (4, 5 and 6.) Where trustees are realising imprudently, power should be given to restrain; this would be by an application made by creditors to the Registrar. A like application should be made by a creditor where there is undue delay or neglect to account. A debtor under a deed should be bound to give the trustee all the information and assistance that he would be bound to do under bankruptcy. We have now a case in hand where three months have expired since the deed was given, and the assets are chiefly contract debts, and the debtor will not give the information necessary to prove the debts. There is no power to compel him, and this seems to me to be an unreasonable state of affairs. A debtor executing a deed of assignment should be debarred from filing his own petition in bankruptcy until the deed has matured. I have a case of that sort where a man having executed a deed of assignment and the trustee having spent considerable money and gone to considerable trouble, the debtor turned round and said, "I shall file my petition in bankruptcy," and that is a condition of things that ought not to be allowed. Now in cases of bankruptcy superseding a deed of assignment the fact of a trustee acting under a deed ought not to debar him from acting as a trustee in the open bankruptcy. The mere fact of being an accounting party is of no practical value for purposes of safeguarding the creditors. A trustee under a deed should render his account up to the date of the bankruptcy in the same way as he would do after bankruptcy. The question of his remuneration might be settled by the Board of Trade. If he is to have remuneration under the deed separate from the remuneration under the bankruptcy, my suggestion would be that the remuneration under the bankruptcy would supersede the other. Costs of deeds, stamps, etc., should be allowed. There are cases where the deed has been made and the stamps have been paid for, the Government have taken the stamps, and it has been out of the trustee's own pocket, and yet the deed has been upset. At present great hardship is incurred by the trustee who acts under a deed in a bona fide manner at the request of creditors, and who after having done considerable work, finds that he is to do such work practically for nothing, and is ineligible for trusteeship on account of what he has already done. In a case in which my son was trustee under a deed at the request of the debtors and of all the principal creditors, and practically all of whom (say £50,000) assented to the deed, yet he was debarred by the action of one creditor who presented a petition. He was thereupon deprived of part of his remuneration, and some part of the out of pockets were not allowed.

2628. (Chairman.) There are one or two little points I wanted, after you had concluded your general statement, to ask you questions upon. Would you mind going back to the third page of your proof at the top—the third class. Perhaps I might tell you that the view that the Public Prosecutor takes is that his duties ought to be lighter than they are, and that he ought not to be ordered to prosecute, but that it should be in his discretion. Therefore the Committee have to consider this matter very seriously, and I was going to ask you, would you suggest that the Bankruptcy Court should order a prosecution direct before a jury, or that the Public Prosecutor should take the matter first before the magistrate, and that the magistrate should decide whether it ought to go before a jury ?—It seems to me rather ugly to have to put a lot of questions to a man, and to take his evidence as against himself at the inquiry before the Judge. It is like asking him to incriminate himself. Therefore, it seems to me that somebody should investigate and say that there is really a bona fide ground for a prosecution.

2629. You see, what is complained of is that at the public examination, or at the hearing of the application for discharge, there are aggrieved creditors who may make an application for an order to prosecute. That application is made very often, supported by the opinion of counsel who knows a great deal about the Bankruptcy Law but nothing about the Criminal Law, and it may be decided by a magistrate who also knows nothing about the Criminal Law, and the Registrar is asked to order a prosecution if the jury are likely to convict. Then it goes before the Public Prosecutor, who takes it before a magistrate. There the prisoner is defended and the magistrate thinks, "Oh dear me, this is only a matter for creditors, and nothing very criminal." However, he commits for trial, but by the time it gets before the jury the whole thing is so filtered down that the jury perhaps acquit or recommend the man to mercy, and he gets one month in the second division ?—It appears to me that in the first place you must not convict a man out of his own mouth, and, secondly, that the order to prosecute should rather be an order to investigate. Then the prosecution would depend on the investigation. If it was found that the investigation did not justify prosecution, then I say make a public report; but if it does justify a prosecution, by all means let it go on, whether the Public Prosecutor would rather not be at the trouble, or otherwise.

2630. But you would not suggest such a proceeding as that the Bankruptcy Registrar or the magistrate should send the man before the Judge straight away ?—I do not think there would be any objection to that if the magistrate is a man capable of judging on the case, but I rather fear going before a magistrate who is, generally speaking, a respectable trader and nothing more. I rather fear that that is not the best way of proceeding, and I do not think that that would sufficiently protect the man.

2631. Looking into the history of the thing, I think most people find that each of the different tribunals want to avoid dealing with this class of offences. The Bankruptcy Registrars say they will not have anything to do with making orders for criminal punishment, and the magistrates in sessions and assizes say, "This is only a matter of debt, and we will not give a heavy sentence," and the thing falls between two stools ?—That is so, but, you see, I take two classes out of that category and simply refer the third class—the class charged with fraud—to that category.

2632. Have you considered in relation to the next paragraph but one how you would deal with a bankrupt after his public examination is over, and how he is to be got to appear before the Registrar at necessary intervals, because, you see, the bankrupts go away to different districts perhaps and take different names, and they are difficult to trace ?—Yes, they are difficult to trace, but not so difficult as would appear. I have been at some trouble to try to ascertain what becomes of undischarged bankrupts, and in my judgment they would be divided into three classes. One-third of them go on trading under the names of their wives, or some near relative. One-third of them become assistants in the very same kind of business which they have been carrying on, and one-third would cover the remainder of those who perhaps emigrate or in other ways disappear.

2633. I suppose you would suggest as a practical working out that at the conclusion of the public examination the Registrar should appoint a day six months hence, for instance, on which the bankrupt should appear in this way, and if he does not appear that the Registrar should have power to issue a warrant for his apprehension, as you do in the case where a debtor avoids a public examination. I mean one has to face what has to be done if the law is not obeyed?—Are you dealing with the case of all bankrupts?

2634. Yes. Your paragraph begins, "All bankrupts should be liable to appear?"—Undischarged bankrupts.

2635. Yes, of course?—All undischarged bankrupts should be liable to appear. I think if a man removes to another district he might very well be allowed to report himself to the Registrar of the district where he resides. He might be allowed to report himself by letter to the Registrar in his own district.

2636. But I mean he ought to be told before he leaves the Court when he is publicly examined what he has to do?—I think so. I think in every case that the proceedings should in some way be concluded. The system of adding to the undischarged bankrupts and making an army of them is, I think, altogether bad. In some way they must be dealt with either in the first, second or third class. I do not think that proceedings ought to be kept open in any case beyond a certain number of years—ten years or something of that sort. I do not think that a man should be kept in suspense or in a precarious position.

2637. Passing on to another matter—the one about the registry of bankrupts—do you suggest that there should be a registry in addition to the one that is already kept and which is regularly searched. There is a registry which is already kept and indexed—in fact there are three search registries which are kept which contain records of all the proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts. There are three search registries for each year—one for the High Court and two for County Court cases?—My point is that there should be a central registry.

2638. (Mr. Smith.) But they are all kept in one office across the street?—Is that accessible on payment of 1s.?

2639. (Chairman.) Yes?—If there is a Bankruptcy Registry and information can be obtained, that meets the point, but I do not think that its existence is known.

2640. (Mr. Smith.) It has been in existence for forty years?—Then I stand corrected.

2641. (Chairman.) A little further down on your fourth page you say, "Every bankrupt should within seven years report himself every twelve months to the Registrar or Official Receiver of the Court"; I suppose you would make it a contempt of Court if he did not?—Yes.

2642. And make it punishable in that way?—Yes, certainly.

2643. Then as regards registering a mortgage deed which includes machinery, you see the difficulty is that that machinery that you have been speaking of passes where it is not mentioned. The mortgagee gets more if nothing is mentioned but freehold than if he makes a detailed specification. Would you register every mortgage of a factory which contains fixed machinery?—Oh no, I should simply register where it is intended to act similarly as in a bill of sale.

2644. Then as regards married women, supposing that the amendment of the law which you suggest was made, but that a married woman did not affix her name, would you render her liable to a penalty in the same way that directors are liable to a penalty?—I think if you amend the law, every legal enactment ought to have a penalty for the breach of it.

2645. Yes, that is very often the difficulty.

2646. Then you would say that married women should be capable of being sued in the same manner as unmarried women, I presume that would include that the property, subject to restraint on anticipation, should be reached, because you see they sometimes trade and they can be sued, but then when you come to issue execution the whole of the property is restrained from anticipation?—That is so.

2647. And I suppose you would give power to the court to release the restraint?—Yes, though that is a legal matter that I think I am scarcely qualified to deal with.

2648. (Mr. Smith.) In regard to your proposed classification, you say as to the first class, those who have not been guilty of misconduct, that the Judge should have power to give a discharge at once. Then in the other cases like the second class you propose that the Judge should have the power to suspend—but is not that so at present?—The Judge has now the power to give the discharge or to suspend — yes.

2649. Do you propose any alteration in the existing law?—I think it would be desirable that the Judge should declare as to whether a man comes under the first second, or third category.

2651. You said that he should have the power, and I am suggesting that he has the power at present?—The Judge may censure, and talk very strongly and so forth, but he has not the power to say "You now pass into the second class or the third class," or whatever it may be.

2652. Yes, I understand your suggestion of passing him into a specific class, but then what has to be done with him when he gets into that class? The Judge may suspend his discharge, but I say that that can be done at present?—Yes.

2653. You do not suggest any alteration in the law in that respect?—Not in the form that you are naming. I simply say as to the third class, the Judge must go beyond the suspension.

2654. Yes, I understand?—And order him to go on to another tribunal.

2655. You would distinguish between the offence of not keeping proper books and other offences mentioned in the Bankruptcy Act. Do you think that that is a more serious offence than the others. Would you treat it differently in fact when dealing with a bankrupt?—I would certainly treat differently the not keeping of proper books and on the other hand the commission of positive fraud.

2656. I understand that, but would you say that it is a more serious offence than the other offences mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890. I will read them over—if the bankrupt's assets are not equal in value to 10s. in the £ unless he has satisfied the court that the deficiency has arisen from circumstances for which he is not justly responsible?—I do not like that provision.

2658. But would you administer the law—what I want to get at is what the ultimate effect on the debtor would be—so that he would fear this offence as much as the offence of not keeping books, because you make a speciality of the non-keeping of books?—I have not defined, I think, in my evidence, the whole of those cases.

2659. No, but would you treat them all alike?—I would.

2660. With certain exceptions?—Yes.

2661. Of which you mention one?—Yes.

2662. You would give the Judge power to suspend. Would you object to the present law which requires the Judge to suspend or qualify?—Oh, no.

2663. You see the Judge is compelled if one of these offences is proved to suspend or qualify?—I think more power might be given to the judge after a given time had elapsed.

2664. But you do not propose to reduce the power given at the present time?—No.

2665. With regard to the after acquired property in the case of a second bankruptcy would you go the length of saying that the trustee of the second bankruptcy should be entitled to property acquired by the bankrupt after his first bankruptcy?—I would rather put it that the Judge should have discretionary power to go upon the equity of the case.

2666. You would leave it to the court?—Yes, because the circumstances might differ so much that it might be a positive hardship to the second creditors, or it might on the other hand be a loss to the first which might be avoided.

2667. Then with regard to prosecution, I am not sure that I follow your suggestion there. At present there is an investigation of the facts and the Official Receiver is required to make the report to the court if there are grounds for prosecution, and then it lies with the court to order one. Do you propose to change that ?—No.

2668. You have suggested in some cases—one within your knowledge—that the Public Prosecutor does not take proceedings where he ought to have taken them ?—It is only fair to the Public Prosecutor to say that the law is very defective in some respects. I will take one case which is very prominent in my mind—that very case where people had taken £500 and put it in the hands of a solicitor. If they had written a letter and said "I instruct you to invest this on mortgage" a prosecution could have taken place, but they left it in the hands of the solicitor without written instructions.

2669. That is a defect in the law which I think has been recently remedied ?—I did not know that.

2670. But apart from that do you suggest that the Public Prosecutor should alter the present system of action and should be required to prosecute ?—I am afraid my experience is somewhat out of date. I do not know what course the Public Prosecutor is now taking.

2671. The Public Prosecutor is not represented on this Committee, and I think it is only right that we should not make any suggestions that he fails to prosecute unless they can be supported ?—Very good, then I will at once qualify that by saying that what I have been speaking f is as to twenty years ago.

2672. Then I will not put any further questions upon that point. With regard to what you have said as to the classification of the debtor's certificates; I think you are probably aware that there was a system of classification under one of the old Acts—1849 was one of them—where the threefold system of classification was given by the Court ?—I had forgotten that.

2673. And it was found not to work very satisfactorily, and it was abolished, but with the exception of that have you any particular objection to the working of any portion of the bankruptcy system ?—No.

2674. Do you think it acts better than the Act of 1869 ?—I think it does.

2675. You would not suggest any material alteration ?—Except what I have suggested in my evidence.

2676. With regard to the public examination of the debtor, do you think that that is desirable in the form in which it takes place at present ?—Yes, I think it is—I think we must have some deterring influence.

2677. And you think it does act as a deterring influence ?—I do.

2678. The debtor does not like to come under public examination if he has anything to conceal ?—That is so, especially when the Official Receiver enters heartily into the case and does his duty as the Official Receiver at Nottingham now does.

2679. And do you think that the public at large have some interest also in the exposure of the malpractices of the bankrupt ?—Yes, that is why I am suggesting in a case where the matter is referred to the Public Prosecutor that there should be a public report.

2680. You think it is in the interests of the commercial community at large that these matters should be exposed as much as possible ?—I do.

2681. And do not you think that if you increased the facilities for providing deeds of arrangement it would interfere with the efficiency of the present system in that respect ?—I do not desire to interfere with the bankruptcy—that is that every creditor has the right and should have the right—whatever I have suggested—to present a petition, and I do not think that it is desirable to interfere with that right.

2682. Yes, but if you give facilities—further facilities for the introduction of voluntary deeds of arrangement, do not you increase the tendency to evade those provisions of the Bankruptcy Law which have been enacted in the public interest and on public grounds ?—I think in every case where there is fraud it ought to go into open bankruptcy, but where there is not fraud then it seems to me that it is not the business of anyone except the people connected with the debtor.

Mr. Robert Mellors.

2683. You have had a large experience in matters of this class—have you found many cases in which it has been possible before bankruptcy took place to find out the facts of the case as to whether there was fraud or not ?—No.

2684. And that naturally in the case where fraud has been committed it would be the object of the debtor to keep back and conceal as much as possible the facts of the case ?—That is so.

2685. Then how do you deal with that state of things in connection with the suggestion that you would increase the facilities for a debtor making out a wrong return which would exclude examination ?—I do not think I do. My point is this, that every creditor has the right, which should not be interfered with, of going into open bankruptcy before the Court, but that in the ordinary case there should be no interference as between the debtor and the creditor. If a creditor says that a case is a case of fraud, that shall go into Court——

2686. I am putting to you a case where the creditor is not able to say that, but he wants to know the facts and the reason for the failure—do not you think he has a right to insist upon its being investigated ?—Yes, but I do not interfere with that.

2687. Would you have any objection to the deed of arrangement being initiated in all cases under the supervision of the Court ?—Yes, certainly. My impression is that the traders of the country desire, so far as debtors are concerned, the least possible interference—that they shall have the right to bring their debtors before them, and shall have the right to meet together and make such arrangements as they think proper, and the more difficulties you put in the way of deeds of arrangement, you do not get rid of those difficulties. There are now many cases wound up with neither bankruptcy nor deeds of arrangement, but simply by a voluntary process which is not registered.

2688. I do not know to what extent that exists. I have heard that it does, but we cannot discuss that because we have no information upon it ?—But I say that that is done, and I do not think that it is desirable that it should be done.

2689. I am speaking only of those cases which are withdrawn from the operation of bankruptcy by the execution of a voluntary deed to which the creditors have assented, and I put it to you that, in many cases there may be facts which require investigation and which would disclose serious misconduct which will not be disclosed, and will not be investigated if the debtor is permitted to execute a private deed of arrangement, even with the consent of the majority of his creditors ?—I do not know whether your suggestion is going to the extent that you would in no case allow a deed of arrangement.

2690. I do not make any suggestion. I do not propose to interfere with the common law rights of debtors and creditors to do anything they like between each other, but as you are putting the case you are compelling other people. You are using the other creditors who have equal claims to insist upon the investigation and elucidation of affairs—you are proposing practically to give the majority of the creditors the power to make a bargain ?—No, pardon me.

2691. I am glad to hear you say that ?—No, I do not propose that a majority should bind the minority. As secretary of the Associated Trade Protection Societies I should think some thirty years ago we obtained an Act which did give the power for a majority to bind a minority and that was enforced for a time. But it was found to have a mischievous effect. Every debtor thereupon owed money to his aunt, his uncle, and his grandmother, and these came in with big claims which swamped the general trade creditors and we found it did more harm than good.

2692. And there was no opportunity of investigating the claims then ?—That is so.

2693. And fictitious claims would be put forward ?—They were fictitious.

2694. You do not propose to encourage that system ?—No, I think it is undesirable.

Mr. Robert Mellors.

2695. But you propose that the debtor and a certain number of the creditors should execute a deed of arrangement, and that then notice should be given to all the creditors mentioned in the debtor's statement or of whom the trustee has knowledge, and if they do not come within a certain time they should be precluded from presenting an objection ?—That is so; that the time should be limited to ten days instead of three months.

2696. I follow that. It seems to me to be an unanswerable suggestion on the face of it, but with regard to the grounds on which you would allow a creditor to petition, would you allow him to petition on the ground that the bankrupt had not given a satisfactory explanation in the course of his bankruptcy, and that his affairs ought to be investigated by the Court ?—I would not interfere with the present grounds—whatever right the creditor now has to come before the Court.

2697. But he has the right at present to go before the Court and ask for a receiving order. You propose to modify that ?—No, pardon me, only in point of time. I say that it is unreasonable that a man should sit on the fence for three months, and then that there should be a threat to the trustee "Unless you give me so much, I shall present a petition." I say that that is unreasonable, and if a man cannot make his mind up within ten days as to his petition, he must thereupon be bound by the proceedings, or, at all events, restrained from taking any advantage.

2698. (Chairman.) As I understand, following up that line, you would say that it was a good answer to a petition that there had been a deed executed and assented to by a majority of creditors, and that the petitioning creditor had not come soon enough ?—Had not come soon enough, had not come within the ten days.

2699. (Mr. Smith.) It would be a good answer that the deed had been executed.

2700. (Chairman.) And that the petitioning creditor had not come in time. That is what I understand he says ?—Just as now, if a petition was presented in four months.

2701. (Mr. Smith.) But if a creditor comes in time ?—He may have his petition if he comes in time. He has rights, whatever they are now.

2703. Does not that imply that the Official Receiver should make his report to the Court as to the conduct of the debtor ?—I think he does.

2704. Only in cases where an application is made for discharge, and those we find represent a very small number of cases in bankruptcy ?—Scarcely any applications are made for discharge. That is my complaint—that we have an army of undischarged bankrupts and I say that the Official Receiver should make his report, and that something definite should be decided by the Court in every case.

2705. Upon that report being made to the Court, would you give the Court power to adjudicate upon it ?—To prosecute; he is adjudicated.

2706. No, I mean with regard to the question of discharge and punishment upon the report of the Official Receiver, should the Court take official knowledge of that, and with other evidence that might be offered deal with the matter, and either grant the discharge, or suspend the discharge, or commit, if summary powers were entrusted to it for the offences that had been brought before it ?—I somewhat doubt that summary power committed to the Judge, because it appears to me that you do not give the debtor a fair chance of defending himself. He is committed upon a report made, or upon questions answered by himself and so forth, so that I prefer the other form of having investigation.

2707. But, at any rate, upon the report you would give the Court power to act ?—I would.

2708. Do you think that the suspension of discharge is a very substantial form of punishment ?—It is a very little one—a very slight one. I have indicated to you how, in my judgment, about one-third of the bankrupts go and trade in their wives' names. Now, to a certain extent, that is no barrier. The reason why they do this is because they have not got their discharge. Then, in the cases of the other third of undischarged bankrupts, where they go back as assistants, it is no barrier, and in the third where they disappear——

2709. If the suspension of discharge is not a serious punishment, do you think that it is adequate where bankrupts have not kept proper books of account ?—No; I think that there should be certainly not only the power of suspending their discharge, but that the power should be more ample and available in the case of not keeping proper books.

2710. Would you amend the Act by requiring that in every case where it can be shown that proper books have not been kept the discharge should be refused ?—Yes, and I would go further than that.

2711. And punish them in addition ?—Punish them in addition—I think every man ought to keep reasonable books.

2712. Then as to the difficulty of finding and tracing bankrupts, especially in the case of a second bankruptcy, does not that point depend on some system like the registration of firms and of traders carrying on business in names other than their own ?—I have always advocated the registration of firms as tending to produce soundness of trading, and as tending to give confidence, and I am of opinion that as regards cost the money would be well spent which was spent in registration.

2713. That would appear to meet the case of a bankrupt who is going about from one part of the country to another and adopting other names in trading—you would be able to trace him by that means ?—Yes; you would be able to trace him.

2715. You have not given any opinion as to the registration of hire agreements or the assignment of book debts—would you favour the Committee with your views on those matters ?—I do not quite see the bearing of hiring agreements or assignment of book debts on some of the matters that I have been considering. What is the point you suggest there ?

2716. It has been suggested in the Order of Reference, paragraph 9: "Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended, so as to include, and apply to, general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration" ?—With regard to registering I think it would be a very serious matter. I disposed of a business some time ago in which case there were 10,000 hiring agreements. It would be a very serious matter to have the whole of those hiring agreements registered—it would increase the expense very considerably.

2717. Would it not have been of some advantage to the creditors of that particular person to know that he had entered into agreements to that extent ?—No doubt it would be an advantage to creditors generally to know. Of course very often people obtain credit upon the faith of their appearing to have a good house full of furniture or machinery. It is found when execution takes place that the machinery is the property of other persons.

2718. Do not you think that that information ought to be recorded ?—I think so.

2719. Are you in favour of the registration of general assignments of book debts ?—If there is a general assignment of book debts I would have that registered in the same way as debentures are now required to be registered. I do not know that that should apply to every individual assignment of a book debt.

2720. Not to single assignments ?—No.

2721. But to general assignments?—Yes, I think it should be limited only to general assignments.

2722. (Mr. Peat.) Just one or two questions. You expressed yourself to Mr. Smith as being entirely satisfied with the Bankruptcy Act as it at present exists subject to your observations, but I think you did not refer to any matters arising in connection with proxies. You have a considerable experience in bankruptcy, have you not?—Yes.

2723. Do you find the present system of proxies altogether satisfactory?—No, it offers a very serious inconvenience to traders.

2724. Have you any suggestion as to alteration in it?—I think there ought to be a modification. Of course one evil that it was intended to correct is the canvassing of proposed trustees for the sake of getting the support of creditors. That was an evil, and at present it is an evil, but I am not prepared on the spur of the moment to suggest how that might be met, but I certainly think there might be a relaxation of requirements as to general and special proxies.

2725. At present I presume you know that the proxy may be given to an office boy, but not to a solicitor?—That is so.

2726. Or to an accountant?—I had to send up the manager of some brickworks to a meeting in London in the present month simply because under the restrictions of the proxies to be now given it was necessary to send a man who must exercise his discretion as to how a vote was given.

2727. I suppose in the result you had to go with him?—My partner had.

2729. Just another question in regard to deeds of arrangement. In your proof you state one evil to be that of a debtor making a deed to an unsuitable trustee or with conditions that are not bona fide or that are impossible of being carried out. It does not appear to me quite what sort of conditions you mean by those that are not bona fide?—I refer to a special class of assignment. There are here four which I think you can see are not bona fide where the debtor has to pay by instalments of so many shillings per week or per month and which would extend over many years. I think that that is not bona fide.

2730. Debtor to pay the trustee 5s. monthly—that is £3 a year?—I say that if the assets are stated correctly the debtor cannot pay 20s. in the £, or cannot pay the dividend proposed to be paid; and where the thing has to be paid by small instalments which would extend over many years it would not be bona fide and possible to carry out. It would cost as much to declare the dividend as the dividend would amount to.

2731. These two cases you mention are oddly enough assignments to the same man?—Yes.

2732. But you instance that matter of paying 5s. a month as probably not worth fighting about, because the trustee might take the whole of it as costs?—Well, I say that instalments spread over many years render it impracticable, it is so costly, and it really in my judgment is not intended to be a realisation, but simply a means for keeping creditors at bay.

2733. That is your explanation of it. I should not have quite said that this case by itself would have borne that construction, but what you say is that a composition which is not bona fide, of the character you have pointed out, where it would take eight or ten years, or a long time, to pay the debts in full is different, for instance, to a composition to pay 2s. in the £, although perhaps more might be got by paying 5s. per month than by paying 2s. in the £?—Yes, but you see that it would be a very costly matter. You would, after receiving the money, have to divide it.

2734. And you say that such a composition is incapable of being carried out?—I think the impossibility of carrying it out would be in a case where the debtor covenants to pay 20s. in the £ and he has not got the assets to do so.

2735. Well, I will accept that answer. In those two cases oddly enough the assignment is to one of those men whose letter is sent. Now I conclude you would say he was an unsuitable trustee?—I would rather you called the official receiver before you ask that question.

2736–7. With regard to those letters. I imagine a great many of these people allege themselves to be members of the Incorporated Society, and give themselves a title which they are not entitled to and which they have no right to?—I am not prepared to give information with regard to any of the parties there. I simply have produced these as showing how a temptation or inducement is presented to a debtor against whom there is a County Court judgment; but the debtor receives notices of that sort, and deeds follow such as I have indicated. But with regard to the parties themselves I am not prepared to say anything.

2738. Neither of those men are members of any recognised bodies of accountants?—That is so.

2739. None of the writers of those letters?—I believe not.

2740. I suppose you are aware that if they did happen to be members of any recognised body they would be turned out for writing such documents?—I daresay, but I cannot say.

2741. I can answer—they would be turned out. You say he is an unsuitable trustee; is it in your mind that a list of unsuitable trustees should be ascertained or that members of recognised bodies of accountants should be appointed?—No.

2742. How would you describe an unsuitable trustee, for instance; you cannot give me information about this man?—I prefer not to.

2743. It is rather difficult to describe who is an unsuitable trustee unless you describe who is a suitable trustee, but that does not occur to you?—No.

2744. (Mr. Richardson.) I take it that in this system which you have brought before our notice of these men writing, the whole and sole object is to prevent creditors getting anything, that is what it appears to me—that these harpies simply send out these circulars and get the debtor into their hands and appoint a trustee?—I would scarcely go as far as that.

2745. They make the arrangement and the creditors never get anything?—I would scarcely go as far as that. I think the object is rather to get business.

2746. And the creditors get no dividend?—Well, and to keep creditors at bay.

2747–9. And the probability is that most of the arrangements they make are never carried out by the debtor at all. When these so-called accountants can get no more money from the debtor the matter drops through?—I should be glad if there were some means of ascertaining that. I think it might be desirable, as some names have been given there, that you would direct that the names should not be recorded.

2750. (Mr. Richardson.) In one part of your note you say in the case of undischarged bankrupts incurring debts, under a second bankruptcy, the trustee should not claim the whole of the second bankruptcy assets. It frequently happens that when a bankrupt starts business again some of his old creditors who probably have been well looked after previous to the first bankruptcy, give this man credit again and give him an opportunity of starting again. Would you penalise them in the second bankruptcy; would you prevent them from sharing in a division in the second bankruptcy until the first creditors have been satisfied?—What I was rather seeking to guard against was where a man has removed to an entirely new district where nothing is known of the first bankruptcy and he has bought property, mortgaged property and so forth. Thereupon it seems to me for the first trustee to step in and claim everything produces a very violent harm or injustice to the creditors under what I will call the second bankruptcy, and therefore I say I would give a power to the Court to adjudicate and to say what is reasonable under all the circumstances between the two classes of creditors.

2751. My question rather deals with another phase of it, namely, the trade creditors. Would you penalise the trade creditors in the second bankruptcy who had been creditors in the previous one. You see the man has failed, but there might be reasons why the creditors feel disposed to give the man help again, such as that they may have done very good business with him. How would you penalise them?—My suggestion does not penalise them.

17 Oct., 1906.

2752. Would you penalise such creditors of the second bankruptcy?—No.

2753. Would you give them the same rights?—Yes, I think so.

2754. Then with regard to the registry of bankrupts it has been pointed out that very frequently the bankrupt trades in his wife's name, his brother's name, or his sister's name. It is very difficult to follow a bankrupt, to penalise him in a sense?—It is difficult.

2755. Can you suggest any way of controlling such a bankrupt—say where the man starts again and trades in his wife's name? You see you cannot penalise the wife because it is really the man you want to get at. Supposing he is trading in his brother's name, you cannot penalise the brother. Now how are you to get at the man? That is the trouble to-day. If it was a family affair and if a man traded in the name of members of his family, should he be compelled to register the fact that he is a trader?—In the first place there is the requirement that if a man contracts a debt of over £20 he must give notice. That would continue. In the second place I suggest that where a man trades in connection with his wife some notification should be given either to the registrar of the local Court, or in some way it should appear on the bill-heads, or be brought to the notice of the trading public that such a man is an undischarged bankrupt and that he is so trading in connection with his wife. Then I suggest that where a man is trading in connection with his wife, or where they are trading jointly, and you now cannot make them bankrupt, that the law should be amended so that you could deal with them.

2756. Here is a case in point. I am to-day a bankrupt and my name is W. M. Richardson and I pass through an examination. I start again in business as P. Richardson, that is as Peter Richardson, who is my brother. Now how can you get at such a man. He says it is Peter his brother who is trading, and he is managing the business for him, whereas those who know him know that it is really W. M. Richardson who is trading as Peter Richardson. That is one of the great troubles of the present Bankruptcy Act. How to get round those people?—I would say that he shall give a notice to the Registrar of the Court that he is so trading. My suggestion is that he should every year report himself, and if you like there should be power to put a number of questions to him such as—"Are you trading in connection with your wife," and he should be obliged to answer those questions. Thereupon there should be a declaration, but no penalty should follow unless he has contracted a debt under a false representation.

2757. He should be compelled to register his name and to declare that he is W. M. Richardson, managing a business for his brother P. Richardson?—Yes, if the point raised as to the registration of firms was carried out that would secure it.

2758. I do not think that would get over it—I think the difficulty would still remain that I have called attention to—it is a very difficult matter?—Very difficult.

2759. Under class one you would give no punishment whatever. May I take it that in the first class you mention you would give no punishment whatever?—No.

2760. Neither disfranchisement nor anything; if a man was unfortunate in business and failed you would say at the final hearing—"Away you go, you are entirely free?"—That would be the case in the first class—I would disfranchise in the second and third but not in the first class.

2761. In the third class—in the case of fraud, would you include in that class the bankrupts who have proved their ability to keep books in previous years but who during the last year or more preceding the bankruptcy neglected to keep books, evidently with a view to cloak over fraudulent transactions. You speak of fraud, but do not you think that is one of the great evils of the Bankruptcy Act, that it covers up a great deal of fraud?—The not keeping of books with a view to covering up the fraud?

2762. That is usually my experience of bankrupts—that they are people who have ceased to keep books although they once did keep them and it is evident that they do so, so as not to supply any evidence of transactions that have taken place?—That is so and I would certainly give the power there.

2763. You would call that fraud?—Yes I should.

2764. In the registration of book debts, in reply to Sir Edward Fithian, you said that in the case of one book debt you would not perhaps agree that it was desirable that it should be registered. Do not you think that in the main the assignment of book debts comes about through the insolvency of the man and that it would be much better to enforce the registration of assignment of book debts in the same way as the registration of Bills of Sale?—I must confess that in our locality we have no complaint to make about the assignment of book debts. We have not had the evil introduced amongst us.

2765. In some parts of the country the creditor comes to the trader and says "Hand over to me your book debts or hand over to me your stock" and that is frequently done?—Yes it may be so.

2766. I know that it is so in my experience?—I have not come across the evil.

2767. You would be in favour of this being registered—the assignment of book debts or the assignment of stock from a debtor to a creditor?—I think that everything that a man does for the advantage of one particular creditor to the detriment of the general body of creditors should be registered.

2768. Both of those systems—the assignment of book debts and the assignment of stock—do undoubtedly prejudicially affect the bulk of creditors?—Then in some way it should be marked.

2769. They should be registered?—There should be registration. But I am not quite certain that that would apply to mortgages—it would not apply to mortgages.

2770. In deeds of arrangement you are not in favour of curtailing the power, apparently, of a single creditor, but you would agree that it was desirable to make it compulsory where the trade creditors are say five-sixths in number and value who agree upon a certain course for the remaining one-sixth to be bound—leaving out altogether the family creditors. The trade creditors are the ones to be considered?—If you could devise a system I should be glad to adopt that, but now take a banker—he is not a trade creditor, and therefore it would seem to me that the definition just now given would be unfair to the banker who has found money. My difficulty is to find any system which would secure the bonâ fide ordinary creditor.

2771. I may say at once that I should take the banker as a trade creditor?—It might possibly be done by a definition excluding creditors who were relatives but it is a rather difficult question.

2772. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Following on what Mr. Richardson has been saying, I take it as a rule at the present date according to the custom of joint stock banks he banker as a rule gets security?—That has become more general. I think there is an unfortunate tendency for the London bankers to do away with all our local provincial banks; our provincial banks did give credit and gave it without security, but now the prevailing system is to require security in most cases.

2773. They have a knack of saying that they would like to give credit as they used to do but their headquarters in London will not allow it?—That is so.

2774. You will understand that a great many of the questions I had in my mind to ask you have been forestalled by other gentlemen, but I should like to have your view fully elucidated as to the assignment of book debts. I understand you to say that you would think it desirable to register book debts—the transfer of book debts—except in those cases where it would be to the manifest advantage of the debtor and his creditors that an assignment should be made. There are cases which you would know in your experience of where shipbuilders or large builders and so on assign a book debt for a specific purpose and carry on a certain contract?—I am rather afraid of interfering with trade. I have seen so many evils arising from interference with ordinary trade that I rather fear interference, and therefore I would limit the registration to cases where it was done for the purpose of obtaining preference by one creditor to the disadvantage of other creditors.

2775. That is what I want to get at?—It would not apply to cases in the ordinary way of business.

2776. Just speaking generally, your opinion is that the Bankruptcy Act as carried out requires a greater amount of imposition of punishment or disabilities than now exist?—I think that the penalties are not sufficiently enforced, if I may so put it, and we have a large number of undischarged bankrupts who have done things for which they ought to be punished but are not punished, and therefore there ought to be an improvement in that respect—with a view to having a deterring influence upon others.

2777. That is your opinion—that the law is right enough but that the administration of it is somewhat lacking?—That is so because it is nobody's business. I think that the obligation ought to be upon someone, whether upon the Public Prosecutor or someone else, and that the administration of the criminal law should be a duty on the part of someone to carry out.

2778. You would desire to differentiate between the man who does not keep books of account for fraudulent purposes and the person who is unable to keep books of account?—In my opinion the requirements should be that every man trading should keep books and that the penalty should follow if he did not keep books. How far that penalty should go I think should rest with the Judge.

2779. During our sittings here almost every witness has told us that in a great many cases—I was going to say in nine cases out of ten—the bankruptcy has been due to the non-keeping of books. Is that your opinion?—In my opinion had the bankrupt kept books he would have seen his own position considerably before he has seen it or professes to have seen it. He now says that he did not discover that he was insolvent until such and such a time, but he would have seen his position sooner had he kept books, and I think it is a reasonable requirement that he should keep books so as to be able to recognise his position. That would allow the creditors where a bankruptcy takes place in the case where a trustee is appointed to trace what has become of the property.

2780. In your opinion, is any amendment required to secure a more immediate realisation of assets?—No, I object to official receivers, except in summary cases, interfering. I think they ought not to realise, and our official receiver at Nottingham does not so realise. We have had official receivers who did realise, and that to the detriment of creditors. I think it would be well if the Official Receiver had the power to convene a meeting of the principal creditors to take their advice as to what should be done in an informal manner. At present it is a month or six weeks before the trustee to be appointed gets into the saddle, and during that time there may be loss going on. I would have a system introduced whereby the creditors should be able to express themselves with regard to the continuance or discontinuance of business. If it were desirable to continue, even although it might be considered that it would be at a little loss, yet the goodwill of the business might be an advantage, and the trustee to be appointed by the creditors ought, I think, to have the right of disposing of the business as a going concern and ought not to be anticipated by anybody interfering and disposing of the assets beforehand.

2781. As a sporting man, you spoke about getting into the saddle. I suppose you would go further and say: taking hold of the reins?—I do not know that I would go as far as that.

2782. With regard to deeds of arrangement, do you know of any important defects in their working?—I scarcely follow as to what your question is leading to.

2783. I will put it rather more bluntly—are you satisfied with the working of deeds of arrangement?—Except as far as I have indicated in my evidence. I think that every trustee ought to give security. I think there ought to be the power of application to the Court, which there is not, and that power of application should be either by a creditor or by the debtor or by the trustee under a deed. I would not interfere, but I would give the power of application to the Court.

2784. Do you know of any improvements which could be made as to the selection of a trustee?—No, you must leave that to the creditors.

2785. (Chairman.) But not to the debtor, as I understand?—But not to the debtor.

2786. Of course under the existing system the debtor very often does select?—Very often. I would require a meeting to be called or a notification to be given by the trustee that he is so appointed a trustee, and then I would give a right of application to the Court to remove him or convene a meeting of creditors.

2787. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Then one word as to the committee of inspection. In your opinion do you think that a committee of inspection should be paid for their services?—Only to a very limited extent, I do not think it is desirable that it should be put as a reward. On the other hand it is a hardship now that a committee of inspection has to travel, unless they get their travelling expenses, but a general system of payment, I do not think would be desirable.

2788. (Chairman.) May I ask whether as secretary you represent the Nottinghamshire and Midland Merchants and Traders' Association?—I do.

2789. Then we may take your evidence as representing their views?—Yes, I have been adopted by resolution to represent their views.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 24th October, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., D.L., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.

W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. JOSEPH HENRY SCOTT, called; and Examined.

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.

24 Oct., 1906.

2790. (Chairman.) I think you are Secretary of the Manchester Timber Trade Association ?—Yes.

2791. And an incorporated accountant ?—Yes.

2792. And I think you have had under your consideration the terms of reference to this Committee ?—That is so.

2793. I think it will be most convenient in asking you to favour us with your views on the matters that are referred to us, if I just take you seriatim through the paragraphs and I will deal with paragraphs 1 and 2. I will ask you if you would give the Committee your views as to those two subjects; that is to say, what one may summarise as the investigation of a bankrupt's conduct, and the punishment to which he should be subjected ?—Perhaps it would be convenient if I read the paragraphs first which I have put into print. "Every trustee in bankruptcy should, upon the declaration of a final dividend, or failing any dividend, upon his application for release, report to the Court fully as to the realisation and administration of the estate, and as to the bankrupt's conduct. A sitting of the Court should thereupon take place before His Honour, the Judge. Of such sitting the debtor and all creditors should have notice, and privilege to be heard. The Court should thereupon decide whether the bankrupt's discharge shold be granted or withheld or granted upon such terms as the Court considered equitable." One of the reasons why I inserted that paragraph was that what happens now is that a trustee receives, possibly years after the case has been in his hands, a letter from the Official Receiver to say that A. B. who was bankrupt so-and-so is about to apply for his discharge—will you as trustee report to me upon the administration of the estate and upon the bankrupt's conduct and so on. It is a common occurrence in my office to have letters like that from Official Receivers. The books of account have been handed over, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, to the Official Receiver, at the time he (the Trustee) obtains his release, and all the documents of the estate, and the Trustee in practice pigeon-holes the whole thing, and wipes it off the tablets of his memory, and it is with the utmost difficulty that he makes any report as to the administration of that estate, and as to the bankrupt's conduct which is of any good. If he were bound to report whilst the matter was fresh in his office, he would give a good deal more information, and so I suggest that this should be done. "If it be proved that the bankrupt has committed any of the following offences, the bankrupt's discharge should be absolutely refused, or in the alternative, the offences should be deemed to be misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869, and the Court should, if it thought fit, order the prosecution of the bankrupt." I would add there "at the public cost." In thinking that over since, it has occurred to me that it might be better than ordering the public prosecution of the bankrupt, to invest His Honour, the Judge of the County Court, with power to commit that bankrupt or to decide what punishment he should have there and then. The offences are: "If he has failed to keep a complete and balanced cash book." I think I would add to that—"Provided his liabilities are at least £250." A very small sum is that, but I think it would be well to put some provision in that it should be a business of some sort of magnitude before you penalise him for not keeping a cash book. "If he is shown to have brought on his failure by culpable neglect of his business through intemperance"—I would interpolate there "gambling"—"or otherwise." "If within three months of his failure he has voluntarily given an undue preference (including any payment by which a surety is relieved) to any of his creditors." I attach a good deal of importance to the words in brackets—"including any payment by which a surety is relieved"—because it is not at all an uncommon occurrence for a debtor to get some relative to be surety to the bank, and before his failure to pay the Bank off. I have had such cases. "If he has within three months of his failure, and at a time when it can be shewn that he was unable to pay his debts as they became due, incurred liabilities, with a view to increasing his assets." I would add another offence: "If within six months of the presentation of the petition he has by means of the presentation of a false balance sheet or figures misrepresenting his real position obtained further credit from any person, or has induced any creditors to refrain from legal proceedings." It is already provided in the present Bankruptcy Act, I believe, that if he obtains credit under such circumstances, he is guilty of a misdemeanour, but it often happens that a man will go and tell his principal creditor that his position is so-and-so, the creditor being about to institute proceedings and he refrains from instituting those proceedings. That seems to me to be as bad as giving the man new and further credit. He does give him further credit, as a matter of fact, but it seems to be as bad as getting additional credit: "The discharge should only be granted conditionally where any of the facts mentioned in Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, are proved, namely: assets not equal to 10s. in the £. Continuing to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent. The omission to keep such books as disclose his business transactions. Contracting any debts without having at the time reasonable ground of expectation of being able to pay. Failure to account for loss of assets over deficiency. Rash and hazardous speculation. Putting creditors to unnecessary expense by frivolous defence to action. Incurring unjustifiable expense by frivolous litigation. Previously been bankrupt or made arrangement with creditors, or being guilty of fraud or fraudulent breach of trust. The condition to be imposed by the Court should not be a mere suspension of the granting of a discharge, but should carry with it in every case where the dividend paid has been less than 10s. in the £, some condition of further payment to creditors, and if the conditions be that the debtor consents to judgment being entered against him, it should be incumbent upon the bankrupt to furnish his trustee with a yearly account of his earnings or profits, verified by affidavit, and it should be incumbent on the trustee to report as to the debtor's position to the principal creditors." I believe it is the fact that, at present, such a bankrupt against whom such an order has been made, on application for discharge, should report to the Official Receiver, but it is not incumbent on the Official Receiver to report in his turn to the creditors and as far as I know it is absolutely a dead letter. If the trustee were compelled to report to his creditors, he would be reminded—his memory would be refreshed from time to time by the creditors—and possibly he would get this information as to where this debtor was, and what he was doing.

2795. Then paragraph 3 we have rather left alone because a Bill was brought into Parliament dealing with this matter ?—I have thought since that it would be quite sufficient if the Law Society were empowered to refuse that certificate.

2796. Now paragraph 4, which relates to the question of whether there would be any improvement as to the method of realising the assets ?—The existing provisions as to realisation seem to work satisfactorily. No estate where the assets exceed £300 should be in any way dealt with until the creditors have met and appointed their trustee and committee of inspection. It might be very damaging to the interests of creditors if Official Receivers were empowered to realise the assets before the first meeting. In the old days, when Official Receivers were paid principally by fee, a good deal of trouble arose through their eagerness to realise the assets, and so get commission before a trustee was appointed. If my memory serves me, there was a case in Lincolnshire where an Official Receiver sold some farms and so on, and caused a regular outcry, and I fancy that the Board of Trade at that time issued some instructions to the Official Receivers calling attention to this, and telling them to be more careful and so on. It is patent, on the face of it, that many bankrupts' estates ought not at all to be interfered with. The business ought to be carried on; it ought to be kept intact; and my feeling is that the Board of Trade and the officials, speaking generally, ought to deal with the public aspect of the case. That is to say, they ought to deal with the debtor and his conduct, and with trustees and with their conduct, and all that sort of thing, but that the creditors themselves are the persons whose money is at stake, and that they ought to have control of the assets from the moment the man files his petition.

2797. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I assume that in this reference to the Lincolnshire estate, these farms were sold under their capital value ?—I do not think that that was alleged, but it would be thought so by some of the outside creditors; no doubt that would be the suspicion. I do not know, but the creditors would say "We have had no chance of having these valued," and that sort of thing, but it leaves an opening there. If any alteration were made I think it would be a damaging thing. Provision ought to be made so that the meeting of creditors may be held within (say) seven days from the date of the receiving order. It would not always be possible to send out a summary of the statement of affairs to the creditors, but the Official Receiver could always get a complete list of creditors and summon the meeting, and in the great majority of cases a statement of affairs would be ready for presentation at the meeting. At present I get, myself, many estates where it is absolutely essential that the business should be carried on. At present nothing can be done except to appoint a special manager. The Official Receiver may receive all the moneys anybody may pay him, but he must not pay, so his hands are tied, and he appoints a special manager, which causes expense, delay, and trouble. Almost any business could be carried on for one week without going to that trouble and expense. If the meeting were held, especially in such cases as that, within seven days, the wages might be found, and the thing could be carried on without going to the trouble of appointing a special manager, and the creditor's nominee, who would be appointed trustee, would be the man to take charge of it. Possibly seven days is short rather than otherwise; it might be well to say ten days, but at any rate within ten days. I am quite satisfied that that could be done.

2798. (Chairman.) Now paragraph 5: that deals with the question of after-acquired property and the hardship that has been suffered by people who have dealt with the bankrupt, and have advanced money and so forth.—I do not know that I have anything to add on these matters to the paragraph which I have already written: "It is a great hardship on creditors who have innocently become involved with a debtor who is an undischarged bankrupt to have their goods seized by a prior trustee for the benefit of a prior set of creditors, and the law should be modified so as to make it only possible for such prior trustee to be entitled to any surplus if such there should happen to be, after payment of the new creditors. With regard to persons who have acquired an interest by way of purchase, mortgage or charge, in an undischarged bankrupt's real estate for valuable consideration and without notice of his bankruptcy, no difference should be made between real and personal estate."

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.

2799. Do you limit that without notice of his bankruptcy because in personal estate a person who deals with a bankrupt even with notice of his bankruptcy bona fide and for value cannot have his title upset ?—I think I should leave it without notice of his bankruptcy. Paragraph 6: "The provisions of the law should be extended so as to render all classes of married women "—"women"—now I should say, "who incur debts on their own account whether trading separately from their husbands or not subject to the Bankruptcy Laws." I suppose the members of the Committee will be pretty well agreed that we have instances of a woman trading where it is possible for her to sell the whole of her estate, and set her creditors absolutely at defiance because they cannot get an act of bankruptcy against her.

2800. Would you make the whole of her estate which is settled upon her without restraint from anticipation liable to her creditors. You see married women generally have settlements made under which property is settled in trustees with a clause restraining them from anticipating, and that makes that property not subject to their debts. If a married woman trades, would you make that property subject to her debts ?—I certainly would, if she trades. Paragraph 7: "The existing law does, I think, afford some protection to creditors, and it would not be equitable to injure bonâ fide purchasers for valuable consideration from the trustees of marriage or other settlements or other assignees."

2801. As regards paragraph 7, there is a point which has been raised here which is this—that persons such as trustees of a marriage trust, to whom a debtor has covenanted to pay a very large sum, come in as competing creditors with the trade creditors. There was an instance rather more than two years ago in which a man, who was not a rich man at all, covenanted with the trustees of his settlement to pay them £24,000, and when the became bankrupt with assets of about £10,000, he trustees of the settlement not only competed with the other creditors, but they were able to carry adjournments of the meeting and all sorts of things ?—That would be a queer position.

2802. And the question is whether persons who are creditors under the marriage trust should be relegated in any way, behind the trade creditors ?—I had not given it any consideration until this moment, but I certainly think they ought to take a second place for voting, etc., to the trade creditors ?

2803. Like the deferred partners ?—Yes, or like a wife who had lent money for carrying on the business. Now paragraph 8: "This Act (Deeds of Arrangement Act) appears to have been intended to take the place of the provisions for liquidation by arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, but it is lamentably incomplete. A common occurrence now is for creditors to be summoned to attend a meeting, where they are told that the debtor has already executed a deed of assignment to his or his solicitor's nominee as trustee; that such deed has been registered, and that consequently they must either adopt the deed and trustee or have the estate administered in bankruptcy. The reason most frequently given for a hurried execution of a deed is the fact that some creditor who is pursuing the debtor has or is about to issue an execution. In order to obviate this, I would suggest: 1. That the notice convening any meeting of creditors should, in every case, be in itself an act of bankruptcy." Since I dictated that I have given the matter consideration, and it seems to me that that is too drastic. I can quite conceive of circumstances where a debtor convenes a meeting of creditors who really in fact is not insolvent and where he only wants time, and if, under such circumstances, the notice of meeting was an act of bankruptcy some creditor out of spite or malice might at once make a man bankrupt. I have added a note which I would put at the end of that paragraph to this effect: "Unless such notice states that the debtor is not insolvent and that he is prepared to find sureties for 20s. in the £, if extended time be given him."

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.

2804. That is to say, that you would say that the notice ought not to be an act of bankruptcy, if it contains this provision?—Exactly, if the notice states that the man is in a position to find security, and that it is only a question of time he wants, then that that should exempt that particular notice from being an act of bankruptcy.

2805. Of course, the present law is that, in effect, a man cannot very well convene his creditors together without its being an act of bankruptcy?—I suppose nine notices out of ten which are sent out convening meetings of creditors do not constitute an act of bankruptcy; so important is that that all solicitors—at any rate in the provinces—know how to draw a notice without making it an act of bankruptcy.

2806. You think they do?—"That such act of bankruptcy should be a bar, as is at present a receiving order, to any execution creditor. 3. That no deed should be valid if executed before a meeting of creditors. At present any creditor whose claim amounts to £50, or a combination of creditors whose claims in the aggregate amount to that sum, can refuse a deed and insist upon the estate being wound up in bankruptcy, and this has given rise to many improper transactions. I had myself occasion some years ago to call the attention of the Board of Trade to the fact that it was becoming a common practice to insert in deeds of arrangement a paragraph to the effect that the trustee might deal with any dissentient creditor or creditors by paying him or them 20s. in the £ or otherwise as he thought fit, and there can be no doubt that many creditors have often succeeded in getting paid in full out of estates from which their fellow creditors have received but a small dividend. I would, therefore, provide that a majority in number and four-fifths in value of the creditors bind by resolution the minority."

2807. Do you mean of all the creditors, or creditors present at the meeting?—I meant of all the creditors, but the word "resolution" there should be altered to read "by assent to the deed," because they might not pass a formal resolution, but might assent to the deed. "Under the present Act a deed may be rendered void by bankruptcy on the petition of a creditor or of the debtor himself within three months of its execution. This long delay is very detrimental to the interests of creditors, as trustees dare not make any distribution, and often the estate is left in the hands of the debtor pending the efforts to get the assents of all creditors. I should suggest that no petition presented either by the debtor or by a creditor more than fourteen days after notice of the execution of a deed, should be good as against such deed. Every trustee under a deed of arrangement ought to give security and account to the Board of Trade as does a trustee in bankruptcy. Every deed should contain a provision that the debtor be not released unless the trustee or trustees and committee of inspection (if any) certify that the conduct of the debtor has been satisfactory, that he has disclosed the whole of his affairs, and given proper assistance in and towards the realisation of the assets." That paragraph, if it became law, would bring the Deeds of Arrangement Act very near to the Bankruptcy Act. I have been thinking that over, and I almost think it is rather too drastic. It means this—that the debts of such a debtor would revive if he did not get that certificate. We had a case a little while ago in Liverpool where one of the creditors insisted on a provision being put in the deed that unless 15s. in the £ were paid the debtor should not be released. In that case the debtor's solicitor agreed to it; the debtor executed the deed and only 10s. in the £ was paid, and the debts have revived against that man. This would militate against the execution of an assignment; that is to say, many solicitors would advise their clients that it would be better to go into the court of bankruptcy than sign a deed which would leave them at the mercy of the committee of inspection or trustee, so that that is a matter that requires a good deal of consideration. Now, speaking generally about these deeds of arrangement and bankruptcy, I should like to make one or two observations which are not pointed out in this paper of mine. Speaking as a trustee, I prefer to administer an estate in bankruptcy rather th n under a deed of assignment for many reasons. There are many good sections in the Bankruptcy Act which help a trustee, and make his work light. He can deal with claims against the estate, and he has settled law upon which to work, and then there is a splendid section in the Act—that is Section 27—under which a trustee can haul up anybody to give evidence before the court on oath, a very useful section indeed. These things are missing when we have a deed of assignment, but, unfortunately, the Bankruptcy Act is not liked by creditors. This is my experience—I speak for myself only—but many a time I have been at a meeting of creditors where I have felt "this debtor is a bad lot; this debtor ought to be made bankrupt; if there could be any punishment brought upon the man, this is just the very case," but I have hardly dared to suggest bankruptcy in that meeting of creditors, because I knew perfectly well that every creditor in the room would get up and say, "Do not let us have a bankruptcy, by any means; it will all go in costs; we shall not get a penny," and so many of these bankrupts, bad bankrupts, escape. I have put the question to myself not once, but sco es of times, "How is it that there is such a prejudice against the Bankruptcy Act?" and I think I have found one or two reasons for it. One is, as I have said, that creditors desire to have unhampered control of the assets of a bankrupt when he becomes bankrupt. They will not brook any interference with their dealing with the estate. That is one thing. Another thing is this: that the solicitors get very badly paid for filing a debtor's petition. There is not the slightest doubt that the scale of costs attached to the present Bankruptcy Act is what solicitors call "lean," especially with regard to the filing of a petition for the debtor. If they file one for the creditor they get a bit better paid, and if they act as solicitors for the trustee they get fairly well paid. But their costs are taxed. Under a deed of assignment their costs are not taxed, and I get all sorts of bills from solicitors. In Manchester, for instance, I had two cases, I think it was the year before last, which were just about the same thing, just about the same amount of work, and one solicitor's bill was, say, about £10, and the other solicitor's bill was over £50, and if I had attempted to tax that bill—if I had come to the Taxing Master here—it is very doubtful, it was so skilfully drawn, whether I should have got one-fifth off, and I should probably have been mulcted in costs. At any rate, it was not worth while; it was better to pay than have it taxed.

2808. (Mr. Smith.) Was that under a deed or in bankruptcy?—Both under a deed of assignment, so that solicitors can make out their bills pretty much as they like. I should not, for a moment, suggest that the legal profession as a whole would, but a number of solicitors in different parts of the country would be moved by these considerations; there are those who would take this fact into consideration, the fact that under a deed of assignment their costs are not taxed, but that under bankruptcy they are. My feeling is that solicitors, speaking generally, have advised their clients who were debtors: "Do not go into bankruptcy; you will have to undergo the ordeal of a public examination; you will have to apply for your discharge, and you must avoid bankruptcy at any cost." On the other hand, in advising their creditor clients, they say: "The costs of bankruptcy are very heavy; you had better not let it go into bankruptcy; try to get some sort of composition or deed or something of that sort." Another thing is the difficulty of getting a composition through in bankruptcy. The roundabout and costly process of getting a composition approved by the Court is, to my mind, perfectly absurd. I have had cases myself, almost parallel cases, where one man has got a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £ through the Court, and it has cost his friends and the people who were supporting him half as much again to get it through. Another man, almost under the same conditions, will be made a bankrupt, will buy his estate from the trustee and avoid all these costs, and be just as well off and so much the better by the saving of costs. The process of approval of the composition ought to be modified altogether so as to make the costs less. Those are some of the reasons to my mind why the present Bankruptcy Act is not in such good odour as it might be with traders up and down the country.

2809. (Chairman.) But if you were to raise the scale of costs in Bankruptcy that would make good the objection, if it be a good objection, that Bankruptcy is more costly than a deed of assignment. It would aggravate the objection?—It would, unless you could allow a little more to the solicitor under such circumstances and less to the Board of Trade, but how the Board of Trade are going to save money I do not know.

2810. Could you just tell me whilst we are on that subject as to your suggestion that the trustee ought to give security? What would be your view? If he did not give security—would you make the deed void?—Under a deed of assignment?

2811. Yes; if the law was that every trustee under a deed of assignment should give security. At present the trustee in bankruptcy must give security, and if he does not to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade his appointment is void and another man is appointed. You could not do that under a deed, could you?—I do not see why you should not.

2812. Because the trustes's name is in the deed, and the estate is vested in him. Is not that to be considered?—That would be a difficulty with a deed under seal.

2813. A deed under seal conveying the estate to the trustee. I mean the deed is not only under seal but it is registered and it is stamped and there have been all the costs of doing that?—I think it would be quite sufficient to give power to the Board of Trade to refuse to appoint, to give public notification somehow that that person was not eligible for trusteeship under a deed of assignment again. Could not you do something of that sort?

2814. Of course that seems to be the difficulty, that the person who is chosen as a trustee is either chosen by the debtor himself or, in some instances, at a meeting of creditors with the debtor's assent. It would not be easy, would it, to make a provision? One has, you see, to see how these things are to be reduced into a practicable working shape?—Would it not be possible, Mr. Chairman, to so arrange that no deed should be registered until the trustee nominated under that deed had given the security?

2815. You would have things rather hung up in the air pending the period?—It might mean a little longer time to elapse between the signing of the deed and the registration of it.

2816. We will go to paragraph 9?—"All security given by a debtor should be registered in the county court in the district in which he carries on business, viz.:—(1) Mortgages on personal estate. (2) Assignments of book debts. (3) Hire and purchase agreements of all kinds. (4) Gifts of furniture to wife or others. (5) Purchase of any property by wife or any other member of family from husband who is a trader, and in fact all and every security. The registration should show to a vigilant creditor how the debtor stands in relation to his property. If the debtor did not trade in his own name both names or all names should be registered and names of partners in firms ought to be registered for the same purpose." I do not know that I have anything to add with regard to that.

2817. Have you considered at all how that should be paid for? So many building estates have quantities of mortgages. Have you considered whether that is to be paid by a fee on registration? Officials do not conduct a registration office for nothing?—It would mean some more remuneration to the registrar of the local county court, that is all. There would have to be some scale of charges fixed. It should be little.

2818. I see you have considered besides some matters which are cognate to those which we are inquiring into in relation to the procedure and public examination, and therefore perhaps you would give us them?—"The delay experienced by creditors in getting into a position to present a petition after they have found out that the debtor cannot pay his debts as they become due is often very prejudicial. It not infrequently happens that a debtor will squander his estate on the eve of his failure. To quote one case in point the debtor after judgment had been obtained against him for a large sum sold the whole of his valuable assets, which included stock and a life interest under his father's will, and subsequently stated that with the money he went to a race meeting, and lost it all in horse racing. I would suggest that the following should be additional acts of bankruptcy:—(1) Where a creditor has obtained a final judgment against a debtor for £50 or upwards, and such judgment remains unsatisfied for three days. (2) Where a returned cheque, bill of exchange, or promissory note drawn for £50 and upwards, and held for valuable consideration, has been returned, the holder may petition immediately three days have elapsed from the date of dishonour. "Public examination of bankrupt." The public examination should be held before his Honour the Judge, and not the Registrar." I do not know whether that, Mr. Chairman is a practicable suggestion because I understand that the Judges of the County Courts are already very hard worked and have more to do than they can get through and so on. It might not be possible to have these examinations before the Judge in every case, but if it were possible I still think it desirable they should be. "It frequently happens that registrars practise as solicitors and they cannot practice in the Bankruptcy Court. In the event of one of their clients becoming insolvent he is handed over to another solicitor who acts on his behalf, and subsequently comes before the registrar, who is his first legal adviser. The preliminary examination of the bankrupt before the Official Receiver should be taken on oath, and put in as part of the public examination. The questions should not be reiterated at the public examination causing the unnecessary expense of shorthand notes and transcript. It should be possible for the creditors, at the first meeting, with the sanction of the Official Receiver, to dispense with the public examination of the bankrupt if it is clear that his conduct has been satisfactory. Then as to trustees, it would be well if it were prescribed that trustees' remuneration should in all cases be fixed by the Committee of Inspection, unless the creditors, by resolution of the first meeting, otherwise determine which is just the reverse, of course, at present, unless at the first meeting the creditors say that the Committee shall fix the remuneration another meeting has to be called. Trustees ought, upon the passing of their final accounts by the Board of Trade, to receive a certificate that such accounts are accepted, but the estate should not then be handed to the Official Receiver—the trustee appointed by the creditors ought to remain trustee so long as he remains in business." There are several reasons for that. He has been in touch both with the creditors and the debtor. If the creditors want to know about a debtor they write to the trustee, and it seems to me that the trustee ought to have that responsibility left upon him to keep an eye upon the bankrupt. Supposing it should happen that the debtor applied to have his discharge and a condition for future payments were imposed the trustee would be the man who should see that he did get reports as to where the debtor was, what he was doing and so on, and in his turn he should report to the creditors who had appointed him. I suggest that members of the committee should be paid for the time engaged in attending meetings of the committee, and that a scale should be drawn and approved by the Board of Trade. At present members of committees of inspection are entitled only to their out-of-pocket expenses. It has been many times suggested to me by committees when we have had our final meetings that they should have something. I have never paid one of them in any case except what is allowed by the Board of Trade, but I believe that it is not an uncommon occurrence for committees to get paid now, and if they do the trustee's remuneration, I assume, will be increased in order to allow for that. These members of the committee are frequently useful men who know something of the particular business and who make themselves useful to the trustee, and I think they ought to be paid in accordance with some reasonable scale which should be fixed by the Board of Trade. "Claims of moneylenders. In order to enable official receivers and trustees to deal effectually with the claims of moneylenders, it should be enacted that the claim of a cash or money lent creditor should not bear interest of more than 5 per cent., and all payments made on account by the debtor should, after allowing interest at the rate of 5 per cent., be taken as on account of principal." When we have a claim from a moneylender he maintains that the moneys which he has received on account have been received by him on account of interest and not on account of principal. "Proxies.—The form of proxy under the Bankruptcy Act with its distinction between 'general' and 'special,' and its stipulation as to the handwriting of the creditor, etc., is far too intricate, and should be simplified."

2819. (Chairman.) Would you mind telling me, under that heading of trustees at the top of the page, do you mean that the trustee should remain trustee whether he liked it or not ?—I do. I think that having taken the trust he ought to remain a trustee as long as he remains in business.

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.

24 Oct., 1906.

2820. As regards paying members of a committee of inspection, that would be adding an additional cost to the cost of administration ?—It would.

2822. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it from what you have said to the Committee that in your opinion the Bankruptcy Act works very well ?—Yes, personally I like the Bankruptcy Act.

2823. Of course we are summoned here to see how the Bankruptcy Act can be amended ?—Yes.

2824. We are here to improve it ?—Yes.

2825. Do you with your vast experience give it as your opinion that the Bankruptcy Act works very well ? —I scarcely think it fair to put that construction upon it. I say that there is great prejudice against the Bankruptcy Act in the minds of creditors, as far as I know, up and down the country. I do not know that I share fully in that prejudice. I see advantages in the Bankruptcy Act in the winding-up of insolvent estates and in dealing with bankrupts. I see certain advantages to the creditors in the law constituting the Bankruptcy Act. On the other hand there are many things about it which are not mentioned here but which are open to criticism—the costs—the delay in these things which we have been talking about now—the delay in holding meetings of creditors—and the scale of costs are open, of course to criticism. For instance, take the absurdity of a case like this. Here is a bankrupt with 150 creditors, and he has £150 assets. It is possible, it is quite likely —there are many such cases I have no doubt—that an Official Receiver sends out notices of a meeting of creditors, and he charges 150s. for sending out those notices; and then he has a room and ten of the creditors come, but he charges 150s. for the use of the room. The costs of some of those things are perfectly absurd. The creditors see them and know about them, and especially in small cases the costs of bankruptcy weigh very heavily.

2826. Then may I put it to you that in your judgment the Bankruptcy Act is a beneficial Act, but that there are defects in carrying out that Act ?—Yes, I think you might say that.

2828. You say that a bankrupt's discharge should be absolutely refused under certain conditions. Do you consider that the non-granting of a discharge is in itself a punishment ?—That is just the very difficulty that is before this Committee, there is not the slightest doubt about it, namely, how to bring a real disability upon a bankrupt and inflict a real punishment upon him. As it stands now it is no punishment. You can drive a coach-and-four through the present Bankruptcy Act as far as the punishment to a bankrupt is concerned—he alters his initials and his sign, he trades in his wife's name, he alters his name from Brown to Jones and knows that anything will do to evade and escape the present Bankruptcy Act. I take it that one of the things which this Committee will try and bend itself to do will be to invent something which would amount to a real disability. One man says this, writing to me on this topic: "A man who does not pay 20s. in the £ and becomes bankrupt ought not to be allowed to vote until he is once more an honourable honest citizen, and until he regains that position he ought not to take a part in public affairs." That might punish some men and it might not, but there ought to be some sort of control of the man who does not get his discharge in bankruptcy. He ought to be so watched that if he does earn any money and if he does get into a position to pay anybody anything, the set of creditors which has not been paid in full ought to have some claim upon him.

2829. Now as regards that, you speak about some condition for further payment of creditors—how long would you keep that over a man's head ?—I think some time ought to be fixed when the thing should come to an end. There are about 70,000 bankrupts now, I suppose.

2830. Undischarged ?—Undischarged, and nearly every one of them is trying to get credit by hook or by crook. The fact is that when a man has been in business for himself and been his own master he takes ill to taking hold of a pen and sitting in an office as a clerk or going into a shop, or doing anything else in a subordinate position.

2831. Have you any suggestion as to the time that this penalty should hang over his head ?—I think I should say ten years. I am inclined to think I would give a man his discharge at the end of ten years by effluxion of time rather than have all these bankrupts.

2832. I use a term which has been employed in this Committee Room several time by witnesses—do you think that it is for the benefit of the community that we should have a large army of undischarged bankrupts ?— —No, I do not—anything but that.

2833. You made a statement about solicitors' bills under bankruptcy being taxed, and that under deeds of assignment they are not ?—Yes.

2834. Would you suggest that any such arrangement should be made that solicitors' bills under deeds of assignment should be taxed ?—Most certainly; I regret that I did not say that at the time. I certainly think that all solicitors' bills under deeds of assignment ought to be taxed precisely as in bankruptcy.

2835. (Mr. Richardson.) In the first paragraph of your statement you say: "of such sitting the debtor and all his creditors should have notice"; do you say that the debtor ought to be compelled to attend ?—I certainly do —it was an omission not to have said it.

2836. Not merely that it should be his privilege to be heard, but that he should be compelled to be there ?— Exactly, I certainly think so.

2837. Then in paragraph 5 with regard to second bankruptcies it happens that in the second bankruptcy there may be creditors who were creditors in the first bankruptcy and who have assisted the bankrupt. It often happens that when a man has failed and he starts again in another person's name that there are several creditors of the original bankruptcy who have had a very good time with him when he was in business for the first time, and that whatever loss they may have sustained in the first bankruptcy they have more than covered by their previous trading with him and therefore are always ready to assist the man again although he may be trading in another name. Would you in the second bankruptcy bar those from any benefit in the assets until the other creditors have been satisfied ?—On the ground, I assume, that they knew that this man had previously failed.?

2838. On the ground that they have encouraged him ? —And have encouraged him—that is a very serious question, but it is quite possible for circumstances like those to arise.

2839. They frequently do ?—Then I think those creditors who knew that and encouraged the man to start again ought to be barred until the creditors who were innocent have been paid.

2840. I see you are absolutely in favour of the assignment of book debts being registered ?—Yes.

2841. And also a hire-purchase agreement ?—Yes.

2842. It frequently happens that a debtor—a trading debtor—will assign or hand over to a particular creditor goods ?—Yes, and debts.

2843. Yes, but frequently goods ?—Yes.

2844. Would you have also those registered. Take this example. I am a creditor and you are a debtor. I come to you and say: "You owe me a lot of money; you have not stock in your place to satisfy it; give me a quantity of your stock," and you hand over a quantity to me. Should not that be registered just in the same way as the assignment of a debt, because you are giving me an advantage over other creditors?—It was occurring to me that under the provisions of the present Act a transaction of that kind would be void.

2845. In bankruptcy, but not under deeds of assignment. It is frequently done under deeds of assignment. In bankruptcy a debtor cannot do so, but under deeds of assignment there is no provision for protecting creditors against a sharp creditor doing that to the disadvantage of the rest?—Yes, that is another of the weaknesses of deeds of assignment.

2846. Do not you think that that ought to be registered?—Yes, the registration of goods.

2847. Say, for example, I am selling you timber; you are a timber merchant and I come to you and say: "You owe me £1,000; I know very well you have only £750 of stock; give me a lot of your timber"?—Yes: "I will buy £500 worth," you would say.

2848. Now where a trader takes stock from a person he is dealing with do not you think that that should be registered?—I do.

2849. (Chairman.) Would you make it clear for my benefit what it is that should be registered, because the stock might be handed over without any document at all. You can only register a document.

2850. (Mr. Richardson.) What would be registered would be the sale or the transaction.

2851. (Witness.) I do not know whether it would be possible to do that. My answer would be that it is very desirable indeed that such a transaction should be registered wherever possible, but at the present time I fail to see just how it could be done.

2852. (Mr. Richardson.) You buy from me to-day £1,000 worth of timber and I as a merchant say, "You can sell me back £500 worth to-morrow. I find you are not worth credit for £1,000," and I get that £500 back from you, say, to-morrow. There is no reason for a creditor getting back from you the timber that he has supplied to you other than for the purpose of securing himself against other creditors. Do not you see that?—Yes, such a transaction is not a transaction in the ordinary way of business.

2853. In ninety-nine cases out of 100 those transactions are purely for the sake of securing one creditor to the disadvantage of another?—Yes, they are fraudulent, and if it were possible I quite agree that you should devise means by which such a transaction should be registered. I think that ought to be done.

2854. (Chairman.) Would not you rather set such transactions aside?—Is that possible?—That is my difficulty. The Deeds of Arrangement Act is outside the Bankruptcy Act as it stands at present. We are talking about modifying it and making it better and modifying the Bankruptcy Act, and making it better, and so on, but they are two distinct and separate things. Would it be possible to put a provision in the Deeds of Arrangement Act which would be as strong as the provisions in the Bankruptcy Act for setting aside undue and fraudulent preferences? If it would be possible to put such a provision in in the Deeds of Arrangement Act I would suggest that it should be put in.

2855. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to the Committee of Inspection, you suggest that they should be paid according to scale?—Yes.

2856. It would be extremely difficult to make one scale to suit all trades?—Yes, the Board of Trade now are asking trustees to submit the accounts sent in by Committees of Inspection for their charges before the trustees pay them; otherwise the Board of Trade reserve the right to strike it out of the trustee's account. I have had a case in point. I remember the member of a Committee of Inspection who was mayor of his town. He was a man who liked a good dinner and a good bottle of wine with it. He came over to Manchester to a meeting of the Committee of Inspection and I allowed him his first-class railway fare, and I think it was 10s. 6d. The Board of Trade took exception to the 10s. 6d. I wrote back and told the Board of Trade that that particular man had probably paid more than 10s. 6d. for his dinner. I knew the hotel he went to at Manchester and I will guarantee that he did pay more than 10s. 6d. for his dinner. On the other hand, another man might go and get his dinner for 2s. 6d. It is difficult, but I think a scale might be arranged. For instance, if a man goes out of his own town such a scale might be allowed as is allowed to the official receivers for travelling—that is the sort of scale I mean.

2857. I am afraid that would not do. One trader—for instance a fruiterer—if he had 10s. for his day would probably think he was well paid, whereas a leather merchant might say five guineas was not too much for him. Would you not rather be in favour of the scale being from so and so to so and so?—Yes, and not to exceed a certain amount.

2858. And to be fixed at the discretion of the Board of Trade?—I should think that would meet it.

2859. (Mr. Peat.) You suggest that a debtor or bankrupt should be prosecuted if he fails to keep a complete and balanced cash book, and I think you limited that to a man whose transactions or whose assets were not less than £250?—Yes.

2860. First of all, do you mean that only a trader should be under that disability—a private person does not keep an exact and balanced cash book?—I only mean a trader.

2861. It is rather difficult, is not it, to keep a complete and balanced cash book because, you see, details might necessarily be somewhat curtailed? I do not know how far you would consider the words "complete and balanced" should go. For instance, if a man entered £2 or £3 for petty expenses would you call that a sufficient explanation?—I think I should allow a good bit of rope there so long as the book was balanced—that is to say if he put in an amount like that for petty expenses I should be guided by the circumstances of the case and of the business, but at present we ask for proper books of account and one of the offences against a bankrupt—one of the stereotyped offences which means a suspension of two years—which is nothing—is that the man has failed to keep proper books of account. There has always been some difficulty surrounding the word "proper," but I would get out of that and I would say this, that if a man has a cash book I would always forgive him for not having any other. I am speaking now as a trustee. If a bankrupt comes into my hands and he has a cash book I can get to know what the man has been doing, and whether he has anything left and all about him. It is the absence of the cash book which is the difficulty.

2862. How about the stock?—Well, the stock is there—such stock as there is when the man fails.

2863. But you do not find details of how he has disposed of his stock at all?—No, that is an awkward feature, but I would rather of two evils choose the lesser—that is to say that even if a man did not keep a proper set of books—and I am speaking of the small ones now—at least he might keep a cashbook. Even a grocer can have a diary on his desk and he can put down his takings and what he has paid out each day.

2864. Probably you mean that he should keep such books as properly disclose his business?—Yes, as properly disclose his business, more especially his cashbook.

2865. More especially his cashbook, but chiefly the books which properly disclose his business, a stock book and a statement of how he has disposed of his cash, and what cash he has received?—Yes, and I would suggest more stress being laid on how he has disposed of his cash.

2866. You suggest that the meeting of creditors should be within seven days in your printed statement and within ten days in your observations just now; surely that would be impossible in the case of a big estate?—It would be impossible in the case of a big estate, I grant.

2867. It would be impossible to get out a statement of affairs within that time?—But it never would be impossible to send out the notices and have the meeting, because that would only require the names and addresses of the creditors. In the case of a large estate there is certainly a ledger, or there are ledgers, and either the cashier or accountant or somebody can be called in and can always provide the official receiver with a list of creditors, and the official receiver on the receipt of the list of creditors with the names and addresses—never mind the amounts—ought to convene a meeting of the creditors, and the creditors can then wait to find out how the thing stands.

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.

24 Oct. 1906.

2868. What could the creditors do under such circumstances?—They could have a meeting, and they would know one thing, namely, that this was an insolvent estate and that the man was unable to meet his liabilities as they became due and that he had failed.

2869. They would know that because of the receiving order?—Exactly; they would know that one fact, and then at the meeting, they could appoint a trustee and committee of inspection and they could wait then.

2870. In paragraph 6 you mention, or did mention in your evidence, that a lady's settlement should be liable to her debts. Do you mean that really—that, as regards money settled by a father on his daughter for instance, which she is not entitled to anticipate, it should, if she goes into trade, be put at the disposal of the creditors—that the settlement should be upset. Is that your view?—I mean that if she goes into trade and does not pay her creditors, that money from every source, however it has come to her, ought to go to pay her creditors.

2871. And that even a settlement should be reduced?—I do think so. I do not see why she should avoid payment. She knew of her settlement when she took the risk of carrying on a business.

2872. Do you mean the income of the settlement or the capital of the settlement, or both?—Both. If the income of the settlement is sufficient to satisfy her creditors, well and good, if it is not, then go to the capital.

2873. What you are saying, if carried out, would result in a rather remarkable change in the law. However, that is your answer to the question?—Yes.

2874. Then you come to paragraph 8. You suggest that a notice concerning any meeting of creditors should constitute an act of bankruptcy?—Let me assume that the man wishes to see his principal creditors, not all his creditors, or we will say one of his creditors or two of the creditors—half a dozen of the creditors and invites them to a meeting to discuss his affairs. Imagine the case of a man who wants to see three or four of his principal creditors. He has not gone to his solicitor, he is going to ask them himself.

2875. Supposing he goes to a solicitor?—So much the better if he goes to a solicitor. The solicitor would then write to the creditors asking them to meet his client, and would be very careful to insert in the letter what is stipulated here, that the debtor only desired further time for payment—that he could pay 20s. in the £ and find security for it.

2876. Let me assume that the solicitor did not see his way to say so or had no facts which enabled him to say so?—Then it is an act of bankruptcy.

2877. Even if he had two or three of his creditors to discuss the position with him?—Yes, if he calls them together formally, I think so.

2878. Now then if you will kindly look at No. 8. At the end of No. 8 that deals with deeds of arrangement—You say "Every deed should contain a provision that the debtor be not released unless the trustee or trustees, and committee of inspection (if any) certify that the conduct of the debtor has been satisfactory, that he has disclosed the whole of his affairs and given proper assistance in and towards realisation of the assets." Would you for the purpose of release be willing for the creditor to assist his debtor?—A willing creditor could release his debtor in spite of that provision. Supposing a creditor had assented to a deed of assignment which deed contained a provision like that, and that the debtor in question failed to get the certificate, the debts against that debtor would revive. The willing creditor would have to sue his debtor in the court for a return of that money, and if any creditor felt disposed to let the debtor off all he would have to do would be to refrain from suing. It would only be the creditors who were not satisfied who would sue the man.

2879. Would not that produce an inequity between one creditor and another?—No. I do not think so. One creditor might very well say to himself "I have got 5s. in the £1 from that man. It is a very hard case."

2880. I rather understand your present answer to be that you would make it optional for the creditors to release their debtor or not, but you would not make this provision statutory that every deed should contain a provision to that effect, because your present statement is that the willing creditor may release his debtor?—My feeling behind this paragraph is this, that speaking as a trustee again, I would like to have some hold upon the debtor during the administration of the estate. It is conceivable that a man should execute perforce through his creditors—that the creditors should force the man to execute a deed of assignment to a trustee, and that the debtor himself should be very averse to that and be inclined to kick over the traces practically, and not come near the trustee's office or communicate what the trustee wanted to know and so on. If there were some such provisions as this, the debtor would feel that he was well advised in giving every assistance to the trustee to investigate his affairs, collect his assets and all that sort of thing. That is the real reason behind that paragraph.

2881. Supposing the debtor has been a fraudulent debtor would you then say that the creditor may not release his debtor if he chooses?—Yes, he could release him in spite of that provision.

2882. I will take that answer. Now then take paragraph 9. You speak there about the registration of the assignment of book debts. If a man assigns one book debt, do you consider that that ought to be registered. Supposing a man owes another man £10,000 and he goes to his bank and wants to realise £5,000 on that book debt, would you say that that ought to be registered?—Yes.

2883. The assignment of that one debt?—I would.

2884. Now hire and purchase agreements. Perhaps you know that hire and purchase agreements extend to very many large trades such as locomotives and railway waggons and machinery of all sorts?—Yes, they do.

2885. Do you consider that in every one of those cases they ought to be registered, whatever the magnitude?—Yes, I do not see where you could draw the line.

2886. You do not think it would make a difference. Have you considered whether trade could be carried on, for instance, if every assignment of a debt was registered. Take a shipbuilder—have you any experience of the shipbuilding trade?—No.

2887. A shipbuilder builds a vessel which costs £50,000. He may get advances at various times. He goes to his banker for an advance or a loan, and he assigns what is coming to him from the owner of the ship. The registration of that would very seriously affect the position of a man who was absolutely solvent. Have you considered that?—I have not considered that.

2888. You not only have it in the case of a shipbuilder, but you have it in many other cases—it would be a serious thing, but you have not considered it?—No.

2889. Now take hire and purchase agreements in the case of railway waggons—they run into millions of pounds?—Yes.

2890. And they are indulged in by people who are absolutely solvent?—Yes.

2891. Have you considered what the effect of the registration would be of these hiring agreements?—At the moment I fail to see where the hardship would come in to the solvent man—to the big firm—if it was generally known that that was a custom of trade—that that was the way in which business was done, and that a part of it was that those things should be registered. It would become just as much a matter of common knowledge as is now knowledge of the fact that they do this sort of business and buy waggons in that way.

2892. Supposing "The Times Encyclopædia" came into your house under a hire purchase agreement, would you object to that being registered, because I want to know where you would end and where you would begin?—It is not without its difficulties is the question of hire purchase agreements.

2893. Would you suggest that gifts of furniture to a wife and others should be registered?—Yes.

2894. That is very difficult, is not it—have you considered that sufficiently?—Yes, I think so—I certainly think that a matter of that sort ought to be registered. A debtor is given credit on the assumption that he lives in a house the rent of which is £100 a year and that he has in it furniture to the value of £2,000 or £3,000. The creditor assumes all those things, but when it comes to the crash it may be found that it is somebody else's property altogether ?

2895. Then I would just take you to the next stage of procedure—acts of bankruptcy. Do you suggest that an act of bankruptcy is committed where a cheque or a bill of exchange is returned for £50 and is not paid within three days ?—Yes.

2896. Have you experience of a little longer time being necessary for a perfectly solvent man to pay a bill ? You see you would put him in the hands of the bankruptcy court when more than three days from the dishonour of the Bill had elapsed, whereas at present you can get judgment on the Bill and serve him with notice. Probably you are acquainted with many cases of the sort ?—Where the man might pull round.

2897. Not only might pull round but where he is quite solvent and able to pay, only he wants a little time to turn round ?—The present process is too cumbersome and too lengthy. That is the point—whether, on the other hand, three days is not too short a time may be a debatable point, but that the present process is too long is my feeling strongly.

2898. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I have no questions.

2900. All the wedding presents a woman gets on her marriage ?—No, what I mean is surely patent on the face of it—here is a trader——

2901. I merely want you to answer my question—you do not mean to include those ?—No, I would exclude those.

2902. All gifts except wedding presents ?—Gifts of money or gifts given by a trader to his wife I would have registered.

2903. Given by a trader to his wife, but I mean by other people. I thought you included gifts given by other people to a wife ?—No, I think I would amend that by traders.

2904. Is not a marriage fund settled, or a fund generally settled by other people than the husband ?—Yes, as a rule —a woman's furniture is settled under her marriage settlements.

2905. Yes, you have used a general expression that all gifts to the wife should be registered. What I am asking is do you really mean that ?—All gifts by a trader I would alter it to : "All gifts of furniture to wife or others," it reads here. I would alter that to gifts of furniture by a man in trade.

2906. Do you mean as a trader—supposing her father gives it ?—I do not see how that comes within the scope of these words "gifts of furniture to wife or others." If the father gives it, it would be the father who gives it to the daughter.

2907. No, I am rather addressing myself to the answer you gave to Mr. Peat, and I thought you had expressed yourself rather widely when you said that all gifts to the wife should be registered ?—What I said here was "Gifts of furniture to a wife or others," and if a wedding present consists of furniture it should be registered.

2908. You represent the Timber Traders' Association, do not you ?—I do.

2909. In Manchester ?—Yes, and Liverpool.

2910. Is that a local association ?—Yes.

2911. Has this matter been considered by them ?—It has.

2912. Have they passed any resolutions on the subject ? —No, they have gone through these suggestions of mine and discussed them.

2913. But you do not represent those views as the views of the association, do you ?—Yes; I do not see why I should not represent them as the views of the association.

2914. Are the Committee to be satisfied that those are the views of the association ?—The committee of the association have been through the paragraphs with me seriatim as we have gone through them to-day; they have discussed them; and they have approved of both what is printed here and what I have told you to-day. I have told you to-day what practically is the gist of what I have said to them.

2915. Have they put that view in the form of a resolution—have they approved of what you have said by a formal resolution ?—I do not know whether there was a resolution about it or not.

2916. Can you produce any evidence to satisfy the committee that those are the views of the association ?—If they have not passed a resolution already they will pass a resolution and I can send it to you.

2917. A resolution approving of everything that is here ?—A resolution approving of everything that is here.

2918. But you told us to-day that there were a good many things here that you do not approve of, and that you have withdrawn on reconsideration ?—Yes.

2919. Is that the view of your committee also ?—Yes, what I say is that the committee or the sub-committee have discussed this printed document with me, and that I have pointed out the amendments, the alterations, the modifications, which I have pointed out to you to-day and that is what they approved. I am telling you now what is approved by the Sub-Committee of the Manchester Timber Trades' Association.

2920. But upon many of these questions I understand that you yourself have not made up your mind ?—Exactly, neither have they.

2921. And the statement you have given here in evidence is not to be taken as your evidence on the subject so far as you have to-day qualified it ?—I understand this Committee is sitting to endeavour to make a report which will be the basis of the next legislation with regard to bankruptcy. The Manchester Timber Trades' Association and their committee and secretary—the secretary being myself—desired to make any suggestions if we could which would assist this Committee to that end, and we have been through those in the way I have told you and we have discussed these questions generally. Some of the points unquestionably are debatable and they will be debatable, I assume, when this Committee has done its work and has made its report, as to whether any particular suggestion is the very best that could be made, but those are suggestions which are thrown out for discussion. If they are of any assistance, of course, so much the better. We say as traders that we should like so and so, and those are the things we put before you.

2922. Then you put them forward as conclusions for the Committee but not as definite conclusions on the part of yourself or on the part of your Committee ?—Quite so.

2923. And does what you have stated to-day constitute all or the principal defects of the Act ? Have you set out all the principal defects of the working of the Act in the evidence you have given to-day ?—No, I do not know that I have considered the question of all the defects of the Act. That would be another long story if we went into all the defects of the Act. I have considered the terms of reference more than anything else.

2924. But these embody your views with regard to the terms of reference ?—With regard to the points raised in the terms of reference.

2925. There are one or two points I should like to make a little clearer. You said, I think in answer to the Chairman that the Official Receiver is in the habit of asking trustees for a report at the close of the administration. That is long after the dividend has been paid and the estate would up. Is not that done immediately the trustee has himself reported at the close of his administration and after he has handed over the estate to the Official Receiver ?—No.

2926. When does the request come in ?—It just depends when the man makes his application—four or five years perhaps after the bankruptcy.

2927. But what is the occasion of the Official Receiver's request for a report, is it not the application by the trustee for his release ?—No, it is the application by the debtor for his discharge.

2928. By the debtor for his discharge ?—Exactly.

Mr. Joseph H. Scott.
24 Oct. 190.

2929. I beg your pardon. I thought you meant the report upon the administration of the estate?—Oh no, it is the application for the debtor's discharge which occasions it.

2930. But the Official Receiver does not surely ask you to report upon the conduct of the debtor?—He certainly does. He asks us to give him all the information we can with regard to the debtor, his conduct, realisation and the administration of the estate in order that he, the Official Receiver, may lodge his report.

2931. You have not got the form of the Official Receiver's request here, nor have I, but, as I understand it, what the Official Receiver does is to give you, as trustee, the opportunity of expressing your opinion on the conduct of the bankrupt if you choose to do so before he makes his report to the Court. The Official Receiver does not ask you to assist him in enquiring into the conduct of the bankrupt but merely that you should have an opportunity of putting your views through him before the Court. Do you see any objection to that?

2932. (Mr. Peat.) I think that is the case, Mr. Smith?

2933. (Mr. Smith.) That is the case.

2934. (Witness.) And the Official Receiver writes for figures. He goes beyond that, he asks what were the liabilities.

2935. (Chairman.) He asks what the estate has realised very often.

2936. (Mr. Smith.) But that is at the close of the administration of the estate.

2937. (Chairman.) Yes, I know.

2938. (Mr. Smith.) But what I want to point out is this, if he is asking for information with regard to the administration of the estate he does that the moment the trustee applies for his release, therefore if there is any undue delay it lies with the trustee. If he sends a request for a report on the conduct of the debtor it is merely a notification to the trustee that the debtor is applying for his discharge and for the purpose of giving the trustee an opportunity of submitting any facts within his knowledge which he wished to bring to the knowledge of the Court.

2939. (Chairman.) But I certainly thought in London that a debtor applies for his discharge long before his release and that the Official Receiver generally invites the trustee to inform him how the assets have been realised.

2940. (Mr. Peat.) That is before the release?

2941. (Chairman.) Certainly, long before the release.

2942. (Mr. Smith.) Then there is no delay there?

2943. (Chairman.) No.

2944. (Witness.) With all due deference to you gentlemen my recollection is that the nature of the letters which come from Official Receivers to my office—and we have many such—is this: "So and so is about to apply for his discharge. Will you please answer the following questions?" and usually in the letter are these questions "liabilities, what is the dividend paid?" and so on, and then the letter will go on: "Will you let me have your observations as to the debtor's conduct?"

2946. You said it was incumbent on the debtor to report to the Official Receiver but you said that the Act was practically a dead letter in that respect—that it was incumbent on the debtor to report himself—to report on his earnings, I suppose, you meant?—Yes, in the case of an undischarged bankrupt against whom, on his application for discharge, an Order has been made, a condition is imposed, that condition being that he shall consent to judgment being entered against him. I think, but I am not quite sure about this, that there is a provision that the debtor under those circumstances shall report himself to the Official Receiver.

2947. (Chairman.) I think you are mistaken. I think it is that he shall send once every year an account of what the result of his earnings has been. That is Rule 244 but I do not think he has to report himself personally.

2949. But you have not come here to ask information, you have come here to give it?—Yes, but it would be interesting to know whether the Official Receivers do get this report from debtors.

2950. You referred to the practice of Official Receivers in realising estates before the first meeting. Do you know of any cases where estates have been realised except under very special circumstances? I think you referred to a Lincolnshire case. In what year may that have been?—Many, many years ago.

2952. You have no later case in your memory, have you? I do not think the Official Receivers after that——

2953. For the last fifteen years?—I do not think they were so eager to do that, but even yet I suppose there are some cases.

2955. Do you think it is quite fair to make such a suggestion?—That is for the Committee to consider. At the moment I could not point to a specific case where an official receiver has attempted to realise.

2956. You also spoke of the delay in calling meetings and suggested that ten days ought to be sufficient—seven days, you stated in your proof, but now you say ten days. Do you mean that a meeting should be held within ten days?—Yes.

2957. And how long notice would you give?—A short notice.

2958. Do you think that in all cases the Official Receiver would be in a position to call a meeting and get a list of creditors, say, within three days?—I do.

2959. Have you had any experience of large estates?—Yes.

2960. Of complicated estates?—Yes.

2961. Where it would be necessary to employ an accountant to frame a statement of affairs and get out a list of creditors?—Yes.

2962. And where it took much more than three days to do it?—No.

2963. You do not know it—very well. You suggest that the meeting should be called, although the official receiver is not able to give any report to the creditors on the position of the estate?—Yes.

2964. Then I have only one more question to ask you with reference to a suggestion about the deeds of arrangement. First of all, I think you said that in your opinion the Bankruptcy Act was very unpopular amongst creditors?—Yes.

2965. Have you any evidence of that?—Yes, my own evidence—the evidence of my own experience.

2966. But apart from your own evidence of the general unpopularity, have you any evidence amongst traders generally such as in their proceedings at their meetings?—No.

2967. Or from any trade protection societies?—No.

* Note—Two letters from Official Receivers to witness asking for information as to the Bankrupt's conduct during the proceedings under his Bankruptcy, in view of the Bankrupt's application for discharge, were subsequently forwarded by the witness.

2968. Or by any public bodies of creditors ?—No, I can only tell you the evidence which I give as the result of my own experience.

2969. Meetings you have attended when creditors have shewn hostility to the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes.

2970. The majority of them ?—Yes.

2971. Do you sympathise with that view —I think you said not ?—It depends entirely on the circumstances of the case. There are some cases where a debtor ought to be made a bankrupt.

2972. But speaking generally, do you think that that unpopularity is justifiable in your own experience ?—I think I have said pretty well all that I think about that particular question. The Bankruptcy Act has a lot of faults in it. I have not tabulated all those faults.

2973. You are now telling us what you say is the public opinion of the Bankruptcy Act. You have told the Committee that in your opinion the public are hostile to the Bankruptcy Act. I want to know whether you have any evidence of that apart from your own statement. Can you point to any evidence—any action taken or otherwise, at meetings of creditors expressing their hostility to the bankruptcy law ?—They express their hostility to the Bankruptcy Act by persisting in having a deed of arrangement in some cases. I say that I personally, were I a creditor myself, would say: "make this man bankrupt." But so averse are they to the Bankruptcy Act and to the procedure thereunder that they prefer a deed of arrangement, notwithstanding its weaknesses and its limitations, and all that sort of thing.

2974. And, I suppose, notwithstanding that the bankrupt may have committed all sorts of offences ?—Yes, possibly even to that extent, so great is their hostility, that even to that extent will they go to let a man off who palpably and clearly has done wrong things rather than they will lose, as they think, the rest of their money.

2975. Do you think that that is a satisfactory state of things ?—I do not—I do not like it a bit.

2976. And yet you propose to give a certain majority of creditors power to bind the minority to come under that ?—Yes.

2977. Then you propose to facilitate this very practice which you yourself object to ?—I only say that in some cases personally I have come to the conclusion that the debtor who is there at the meeting under examination is a bad lot, but then I think myself, " What punishment can we bring on the man by bankruptcy ? " That is what I am always faced with. If I get up to advocate bankruptcy in a meeting of that sort the creditors will turn round and say to me: "Supposing we make this man bankrupt, what advantage is it going to be—can we punish him ? " That is the question they ask me. Then I say there is the Debtors Act, but under that Act you must prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the man intended to defeat his creditors.

2978. I do not want to lead you into these questions. I merely wanted to elicit any evidence of any real defect or any real unpopularity in the Act ?— Well, I will tell you a defect. A defect is that the Debtors Act, which should be a means of punishing a man, is practically valueless. You have to have evidence which it is almost impossible to get before you can get the man convicted, so that you cannot say that bankruptcy will punish a man.

2979. You have to prove a crime, in fact ?—You have. There was once a man who had bought a ticket to go across to America and who had absolutely got the creditors' money in his pocket. He was at Liverpool with a ticket in his pocket to go to America. He was arrested, but when he came back to York counsel argued for him that we could not prove the intention of this man, and so we lost our case. That is the Debtors Act.

2980. I think you have had the advantage of being in the official receiver's office, and you know the ins and outs of it ?—That is a case that happened when I was in Hull.

2981. I am glad that notwithstanding that experience you have not been able to substantiate any larger defect in the Bankruptcy Act ?—If I was here for that purpose I would be able to give further instances of the weaknesses of the Act, but I am confining my attention to these particular subjects of reference. There are one or two other matters I should like to mention outside of what I have said. Buildings under contract—that is to say, where a builder is building under contract, it often happens that the proprietor stipulates that the goods sent on to that job shall be his. Now, my feeling is that the materials which are not brought into the building ought to belong to the creditors. That is a very important point in cases in which I am interested. Often a lot of timber and bricks, and so on, are there lying on the job which have not been paid for and they are not built in, and I think the creditors ought to have them. Then there is just one other point which occurred to me, and that is with regard to preferential payments—rent. If a landlord, as you know, distrains before the receiving order he can have his rent up to the Statute of Limitations, and it sometimes happens that a landlord being friendly with the debtor will allow his rent to run up and will distrain just before bankruptcy. I do not think he should be allowed to get more than six months' rent, whether his distraint is before or after the receiving order—in fact, it is a question whether either the landlord's rent or the rates and taxes should be paid in full. I have not quite seen yet why it should be so.

2982. (Chairman.) That is a matter with reference to another Act of Parliament—the Preferential Payments Act of 1888, and it applies also in company cases. It is, however, a little beyond the scope of this inquiry.

2983. (Witness.) As to Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, I made a note.

2985. (Chairman.) Yes.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, October 31st, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE (Chairman.)

Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary.)

Mr. SYDNEY J. PORTER; called and Examined.

Mr. Sydney J. Porter.

31 Oct. 1906.

2986. (Chairman.) I think you are a solicitor carrying on business at 41, Waterloo Street, Birmingham, and in this matter would you tell me who you represent ?—The Birmingham Jewellers and Silversmiths' Association, being an Association under the Companies Act with the ordinary dispensation of the Board of Trade, not for profit.

2987. Can you tell us the composition of the body; I mean as regards the number of constituent firms and so forth ?—At the present time between 400 and 500 members; I may say that it is affiliated for the purpose of working with the London Association, which is a much smaller and comparatively recent body. Of course the numbers in the membership of the London Association would be extra.

2988. And the views that you have furnished to us which have been circulated among the members of the Committee, and which they have considered, are the views of the Association ?—They are.

2989. I mean they have been submitted to a Committee of the Association ?—They have, prior to submission to you.

2990. Before your memorandum was prepared had you seen the terms of reference to this Committee ?—I had not.

2991. Have you considered the terms of the reference to the Committee ?—I have looked at them.

2992. Those are the questions we have to consider ?—I have looked at the document since I drew my report.

2993. Because you see it limits the subject with which we have to deal ?—It has an extremely wide scope, sir.

2994. Has your Committee, or the Association, or any members of it, considered those terms of reference do you know ?—They have seen them.

2995. Of course, some of the subjects are dealt with in what has been furnished to us by you, but I should like rather to get, for the information of the Committee, your views in reference to the specific questions if it would not trouble you to give them ?—The first question deals with punishment. That is a question to which I have particularly addressed myself.

2996. And I think, to put it shortly, that you are in favour of an increased stringency rather ?—Distinctly, and, if I may so, of a special jurisdiction for the Court of Bankruptcy to deal with certain of those offences.

2997. Do you mean by that that the Court should have the power of imprisonment ?—I do in certain cases.

2998. I suppose I may take it from that that, in your opinion, the present system by which the punishment takes the form of suspension, or refusal of discharge, is inadequate ?—Absolutely.

2999. And I think the particular offences that you would punish are improper and reckless trading and failure to keep books ?—And pawning.

3000. May I ask, would you be in favour of the Court imposing such punishment as it is to have power to impose immediately after the public examination or at a subsequent sitting ?—After the public examination.

3001. And would you give the power to the registrar only, or to the judge in the county court ?—I say distinctly to the registrar. He hears the public examination. I do not know whether I am in order in saying this.

3002. Please do; it is just what we want to know.—He sees the demeanour of the witnesses, he has the whole of the evidence before him and he knows exactly what takes place. At the present time he has absolutely no power whatever except to report to the judge. May I add, sir, that I would give him the power of dealing with the bankrupt on his discharge.

3003. Keeping to that question, would you leave the law as it at present stands by which the bankrupt applies for his discharge if he chooses, or does not apply, or would you make every bankrupt come up at a particular stage of the proceedings for the Court to deal with him ?—I would make him come up at a particular stage of the proceedings.

3004. And as you are acquainted with legal procedure might I ask would you make it part of the duty of the Court at the conclusion of the public examination to fix a date for him to come up ?—I would distinctly.

3005. Now if I may just leave that for the moment, do you consider the existing provisions of the Act as regards the realisation and administration of property require any amendment in the direction of facilitating a more speedy realisation of the property of the bankrupt ?—No, I see no reason to alter them except in special cases when application to the court could be made.

3006. It has been suggested that sometimes an undue delay—not from anybody's fault—does occur, in fact, so that a business may get greatly depreciated before it is realised ?—In twenty-three years' experience I have not seen such a case.

3007. Then as regards a bankrupt who is undischarged and who trades, do you think the law requires amendment so as to protect people who have honestly dealt with him ?—I do. I think the provisions at present in force as to the creditors in the first bankruptcy taking all the assets is unjust.

3008. That is to say that the traders in the second bankruptcy should have something like a lien on the after-acquired assets ?—After a certain time, and on that would turn the question of the bankrupt applying for his discharge.

3009. Then it has been represented that there are great evils from the impunity which married women practically have in trading on credit. Would you be in favour of making married women subject to the bankruptcy laws without restriction ?—I would.

3010. And as regards property in which they are restrained from anticipating, would you make that subject to administration in bankruptcy if they traded ?—I would.

3011. That is to say if it was a married woman with her income restrained from anticipation you would enable the trustee to take the income ?—If she chose to trade.

3012. Then the 7th paragraph relates to the law which deals with marriage settlements. It has been pointed out both here and elsewhere that trustees of marriage settlements, or beneficiaries under marriage settlements, are very often able to compete with trade creditors and swamp them, as it were ?—I have found it so repeatedly.

3013. Would you amend the law on that subject ?—I would; I would make any settlement of the bankrupt's property on his marriage void for six years at least if bankruptcy supervened. I have a case at the moment —one which is on at the present time—where in March, 1904, the debtor entered into a marriage settlement whereby he settled a large sum of money said to be invested in his business upon his wife.

3014. Was that after marriage ?—No.

3015. Before marriage ?—Before marriage; and now we have a competing claim of several thousands. I can give you the exact reference if you desire it: No. 1069 of 1906, in the London Court, liabilities £14,900; a deficiency on the debtor's own statement of nearly £12,000; and a claim of £2,000 on a marriage settlement executed in March, 1904. I may say here, sir, that I see no way of avoiding the terms of that settlement under the law as it at present stands.

3016. Then you would alter the law by enabling an ante-nuptial marriage settlement to be avoided if the settlor became bankrupt within six years ?—I would.

3017. And of course it would follow that the covenant to pay money would be equally avoided ?—That is so; as you are aware, a covenant to pay money has been held not to be within the 48th section.

3018. Yes, I know.—And that is how these bankrupts so frequently do it, they covenant to pay money and then their claim competes—there is no way of avoiding them except under the statute of Elizabeth —which is practically defunct for all purposes.

3019. Now comes one of the most important subjects with which we have to deal, which is as to the provision relating to deeds of arrangement and composition. Now generally—might I just take it in steps—assuming that the law remains what it is, would you be in favour of an official audit of trustees' accounts under a deed of arrangement ?—I see no reason for that when the Committee of inspection—as they always have—have the power of going into the trustees' accounts.

3020. Do they do so ?—They do in my experience and very rigidly.

3021. And would you give any official control over the trustee such as that he should give security ?—He should give security.

3022. A trustee under a deed ?—Yes; he should give security.

3023. And have you worked out in your own mind at all how it would be done, I mean who he would give it to and so forth ?—I should say through the Board of Trade; he has to submit his accounts now.

3024. But what I meant was this:—the trustee having been appointed and the estate conveyed to him, suppose that he was required to give security and did not, would you void the deed ?—I would.

3025. Or give power to substitute another trustee ?—I would give power to substitute another trustee.

3026. I mean one has to think of these practical considerations ?—That is so. There was a case in London within the last year in which I was unfortunately myself interested, the case of a well-known accountant in London, whose creditors lost large sums of money through this very point.

3027. In what respect would you amend or extend the present law relating to deeds of arrangement ?—I would undoubtedly give the large majority of creditors the right of binding the small minority. In experience, sir, we have found almost invariably that small creditors stand out for the purpose of getting a preference.

3028. Would you make it a ground for dismissing the petition of one of those creditors that there had been a deed of arrangement to which the vast majority had assented ?—If he had been summoned to the meeting, yes, certainly.

3029. Have you considered with respect to that view how to deal with the question of who are creditors, because sometimes a debtor out of spite, or something like that, omits some very large creditor ?—The ordinary rule, sir, is followed in my experience as in bankruptcy. Creditors are advertised for in a specified manner.

3030. But I mean at the meeting which is going to settle upon having a deed which is the one majority at which would bind. I agree as to sending out for proofs of claims, but I mean the meeting which is to decide whether it is to be a deed or whether it is to be bankruptcy. Have you considered how you could ensure that you had got the voices of all the creditors ?—I should say that the deed would be of no effect unless the statutory majority as I would call it, had assented.

3031. I was thinking about persons whose claims to be creditors might be disputed; I mean a man might go into a meeting and claim he was a creditor for £10,000, and when contested in a Law Court, he might be only a creditor for £1,000 ?—Under such circumstances as those I would say the deed would be upset if his vote constituted the majority of the other side.

3032. Would you reserve it to the Court of Bankruptcy to determine whether, in case anybody disputed it, the deed was to be binding or not ?—No; I would not; I think the creditors have to pay the piper and they should call the tune.

3033. But what I meant was supposing that a person said that the notice of the meeting had never reached him, and that if he had been there he would have voted against the deed ?—That is a mere matter of the registration of a letter, I take it. For all creditors beyond a certain sum, if they were large, there might be some provision of that kind put in.

3034. In the first instance, for the purpose of calling a meeting, the debtor's own statement of what is contained in his books is the source of information ?—Yes. That could easily be met by the debtor having to file a list of his creditors. He would file a list of creditors by which he would be bound.

3035. (Mr. Smith.) He does that at the present, does not he ?—No.

3036. Under a deed of arrangement ?—No, he merely hands the list to the trustee, or to the person whom he consults, and that person calls the meeting.

3037. (Chairman.) But there is a list of creditors when the deed is registered ?—Yes, afterwards.

3038. How would you work it ? The debtor is insolvent, and goes to his solicitor, who sends out a circular convening a meeting. The meeting appoints a chairman. How is the question to be determined of who is a creditor, and for what amount, for the purposes of voting ?—It has to be determined in the first instance by the list filed by the debtor, which is handed to the chairman. If subsequently it transpires that the creditor, who had not been summoned would have altered what I call the statutory majority, that creditor would have the right of turning the estate into bankruptcy.

3039. I see. And he could petition ?—He could petition.

3040. That is as regards the initiation of the deed. Then about the selection of the trustees—I am speaking to a lawyer. The deed derives its vitality from the act of the debtor, and not from the act of the creditor ?—That is so.

3041. Would you give the debtor, as he has now the power, to choose his own trustee ?—No, I would not. I would say of the persons voting at the meeting, there should be a statutory majority in favour of a particular trustee.

3042. And that the deed would not be binding unless it was made in favour of that trustee ?—Yes, that is so.

3043. Then you would make the trustee give security to the Board of Trade ?—I think so.

3044. Then you would not have any further official control over him ?—I would not.

3045. Might I ask as regards any question relating to the administration, such as is now dealt with by an originating summons in Chancery—would you give the Court of Bankruptcy power of deal with summary questions of wrongful refusal to admit a proof, that now are dealt with by the Court of Chancery ?—I would.

Mr. Sydney J. Porter.

31 Oct. 1906.

3046. As under the Act of 1869 ?—Yes, as under the old Act.

3047. Lastly. Have you considered at all the question of the registration of assignments of book debts and hiring agreements ?—I am strongly in favour of their registration.

3048. As regards book debts would you be in favour of their registration to the extent of the registration of the assignment of particular book debts, such as instalments which are paid to a builder ?—Certainly.

3049. And to hiring agreements ?—And to hiring agreements. I would not allow future book debts to be assigned at all—only present ones.

3050. There was a question about deeds of arrangements which I intended to put to you, which I did not ask. Perhaps I might just go back to that subject Do you think it at all a disadvantage in the system of deeds of arrangement that it excludes the power of setting aside fraudulent preferences, and excludes the operation of the doctrine of reputed ownership ?—I do not know that it does so. The trustee would repudiate a claim, is my answer to that.

3051. But I am supposing a person has made a payment by way of fraudulent preferences to a creditor ; you can get some money from the creditor in bankruptcy, but you cannot under a deed ?—You can in theory, but not in practice. I find it absolutely impossible. I have found that it is merely a figment.

3052. At any rate, you would not extend to deeds those kind of bankruptcy provisions which enable other property to be brought into the net, as it were ?—I would allow a deed to be upset if a fraudulent preference could be shewn distinctly.

3053. Have you considered in registering instruments of that kind whether they should be registered in the district as well as in London ? Bills of sale and deeds of arrangement are only registered in London ?—I think they should also be registered in the district.

3054. That there should be a different registry, or that merely a copy should be sent ?—That a copy should be sent to the county court.

3055. (Mr. Richardson.) You say that you think that all bankrupts should come up for discharge ?—I do.

3056. That they should be compelled to come up ?—I do.

3057. What often happens is the assignment of stock as well as book debts. I suppose you would be in favour of the former being registered ?—Yes, any transaction of that kind.

3058. And as regards hiring agreements—every kind of hiring agreements ?—Yes, every kind.

3059. And furniture ?—Yes, because unfortunately a custom, or I should say a so-called custom, is creeping in and taking the place of the law.

3060. It was not necessary forty years ago ?—No.

3061. And it is not necessary to-day ?—No.

3062. And you are in favour of the compulsory appointment of the trustee by the creditors ?—I am.

3063. And not that the debtor should have the right ?—No.

3064. You think that it would have a deterrent effect. As regards bankrupts starting again, in the case of a second bankruptcy, would you be in favour of debarring creditors in the first bankruptcy from sharing in the proceeds until the new creditors were satisfied ?—So far, certainly as after-acquired assets were concerned.

3065. To-day I fail. You have been a creditor of mine, and whatever you may have lost by the first bankruptcy you have covered many times over by the trade you did with me previously. Therefore you will give me help again. Other people come in and do not know anything about my previous bankruptcy and give me credit. You think that those who have been creditors in the first bankruptcy should be debarred ?—Do you mean altogether—if they have given credit again ?

3066. Until the other creditors are satisfied ?—Oh no, distinctly not. If they have had fresh dealings with the bankrupt, distinctly not.

3067. You would not ?—No, I would not.

3068. I myself certainly find that a majority of men who start in business again have been helped by those who have had good transactions with them previously, and they are helped in that way to go into bankruptcy again. Others who have no knowledge of the first bankruptcy have to suffer as the result ?—The law imputes knowledge at the present time, because the bankruptcy is considered as registered. That is why first creditors come in before the second now. You would have to alter the law altogether, so that any creditor in the first bankruptcy was deferred if he dealt with the bankrupt again until the new creditors had been satisfied.

3069. That is what you mean ?—I think that would be unfair to the creditor. He has lost in this instance, but he only, after all, backs his opinion, "I have lost 15s. in the £ by this man. I believe him to be an honest man, and I am prepared to trust him again."

3070. You would not penalize him at all ?—I would not.

3071. You are in favour of a majority in the case of a deed of arrangement ?—Of a three-fourths majority at least.

3072. In value, or number, or both ?—Three-fourths in value, representing half in number. I should go on the lines of the Companies Acts throughout.

3073. In the case of pawning you say—"for pawning transactions by persons insolvent and within six years of bankruptcy." Is not that going rather a long way back ?—Experience has shewn us this, that the pawnings are always managed just outside the statutory periods—three or four months. We have seen cases often where pawning stops within three or four months of the bankruptcy. With regard to pawnings, if I may say so, every man who pawns goods—especially in the trade in which I am interested, the jewellery trade, where they are so readily disposable—I would make keep an account of the goods pawned ; from whom he purchased them ; at what price ; when he pawned them ; to whom ; and what price he received on that pawning. For we find it often the case that a man purchases goods, pays for them by a bill, which is not met, and he immediately pawns them. Now under decisions I think it is well settled law that if the debtor has given a bill, he is supposed to have paid for the goods. That works very hardly on the creditor, for the debtor gives a bill well knowing he cannot meet it, and then pawns the goods. We find that repeatedly.

3074. But six years seems to me to be rather too long ?—It is only four months now. Of course, at the root of the whole matter, if I may say so, is the non-keeping of books. Of course if it were made a statutory offence for a bankrupt not to keep books disclosing his position, I think there would be very little trouble with regard to defaulting bankrupts. But it is so well known amongst dishonest men now that almost without exception we find in a very bad case that a man has not kept books.

3075. Especially during the last year ?—He had not kept books in the case I referred to. I have a case now which I may mention, in Burnley, Lancashire, No. 14, of 1906 : Liabilities on the bankrupt's statement, £7,700 ; deficiency £4,700 ; no cash book ; no accounting for pawning. Pawnings since last November occur to the extent of £3,132 ; no statement whatever ; in my judgment quite impossible to prosecute.

3076. (Mr. Smith.) With regard to trust deeds, you have had a considerable amount of experience in bankruptcy matters, I suppose, in connection with the Jewellers' Association ?—I have had hundreds of cases.

3077. Have you had much outside that connection ?—Outside the Jewellers' Association—yes, certainly.

3078. And when you say that it is desirable to give the majority of creditors the right to bind the minority, have you considered the abuses which arose from a similar system under the Act of 1869—perhaps you had not much experience ?—I had no experience under the Act of 1869. I was not admitted until 1882.

3079. Your attention has not been directed to that side of the question ?—I have not had experience.

3080. With regard to the Chairman's question about how you test the list of creditors. I think your answers were given rather with reference to the omission of the debtor to mention some creditor ?—Yes.

3081. Supposing there was collusion between the debtor and some creditors, how would you attempt to deal with that ? You see the whole thing lies in the hands of the debtor and his solicitor at the beginning. Supposing he puts forward a claim by his uncle or aunt—and we have heard on highly competent authority that it is a very common practice for family claims to be put forward, and that it is impossible for the creditors to deal with them. A resolution is carried very often against the voice of the trade creditors. How would you deal with a case of that sort ?—If I were a trustee I would not admit the claim.

3082. But this is before the trustee is appointed ?—Do you mean as to the appointment of the trustee ?

3083. Yes, as to the approval of the deed and as to the appointment of the trustee ?—If it were shown afterwards that the trustee's appointment was improper, or was not carried by the proper majority, I would have him removed. I see nothing to prevent it.

3084. But it would be very difficult to show that the abuses did arise ?—I do not think it would be any more difficult than in bankruptcy at the present time.

3085. Are you aware that in bankruptcy there is an independent investigation by the Official Receiver ?—Yes, I am aware of that.

3086. Do you see any objection to the initial procedure in deeds of arrangement being brought before the Registrar of the Court. ?—Only on the ground of expense.

3087. Yes, but when you consider the serious abuses to which the system was exposed under the old Act, and to which it must always be liable in the absence of any check to it, do you think it would be a good protection to make the initial proceedings come before the Registrar, and to give him the controlling power as to who is to vote ?—No, I see no necessity for it, My own experience is that there is much less fraud under deeds of arrangement than there is in bankruptcy.

3088. That is your experience ?—Distinctly.

3089. In connection with initial proceedings ?—I do not know about initial proceedings, but in connection with the whole matter I have never seen a case under deeds of assignment where there was a question of fraud on the proof—I mean since the Act of 1883, of course.

3090. We have had considerable complaints made to this Committee as to the abuses to which deeds of arrangement are subject ?—I have not seen them.

3091. Have you had any experience of cases coming before your Association in which the debtor had committed a series of offences under the Bankruptcy Act such as the not keeping of books and trading with the knowledge of insolvency and that sort of thing ?—Under deeds ?

3092. Under deeds ?—Certainly, our Association deals with them in this way. Before our members assent to deeds of assignment they require an independent investigation to be made by their clerk.

3093. And if they find that the man has committed a number of these offences ?—They throw it into bankruptcy invariably.

3094. I thought that was the case ?—They have done that many times.

3095. I thought that the Birmingham Jewellers' Association had always taken that course but do you think that that is a general practice ?—I think it would become the general practice.

3096. I have come to the opposite conclusion ?—You see nearly all the large trades now are ruled by Associations and it is becoming more general every day.

3097. Where you have Associations such as you have in Birmingham, I think the system works remarkably well, but in the vast majority of bankruptcy cases they are not ruled by Associations ?—I think except—if I may say so—amongst professional men, they are now. Nearly all the large bodies have Associations now.

3098. If you inquire of the Official Receiver at Birmingham you will find that the great majority of those bankruptcies are not ruled by formal Associations ?—No. I do not know whether I am in order in saying it, but I should like to say here that we find a great deal of difficulty under the present bankruptcy law arising from alleged losses by betting. Some years ago I had a case—I do not know if I may put it before the Committee, Mr. Chairman ?

3099. (Chairman.) If you please ?—I had a case at Liverpool. In that case there was a deficiency of £3,964 according to the debtor's statement, of which £1,920 was given as losses in betting. The Birmingham Jewellers' Association were intimately connected with that case, and its members were heavily hit, and I was instructed to probe the matter to the bottom. Our instructions were that the bankrupt had never raced at all, had never been at a race meeting and was a most careful man in the way he spent his money. I accordingly went to various racecourses in the country and examined the contour of the courses, and I put the bankrupt through an examination. The sort of question I addressed to him was: "You are standing on the stand at Ascot. In the mile race do the horses run from right to left or from left to right?" I had twelve cases and in nine of those cases the man gave the wrong answer. He had never raced at all. That man said he had kept no books. I mention that case because it is such a very strong case.

3100. (Chairman.) Most useful.

3101. (Witness.) And we were unable to do anything. He merely said he put £500 in his pocket, he went to racecourses, and he lost his money. He had no record of his losses.

3102. (Mr. Smith.) I want to ask you a question about your suggestion as to the extended jurisdiction of the Registrar. Would you apply that to all Registrars whether they are salaried men or whether they are men in private practice ?—I should much prefer if it were possible that Registrars should not accept private practice.

3103. But in the great majority of cases they do practise. Do you think it advisable to give a man in that position power to deal with a bankrupt's discharge ?—Most distinctly if he were debarred from accepting practice in bankruptcy as he should be.

3104. May there not be cases—many and frequent cases—where a bankrupt comes up before the Court who has employed the Registrar of the County Court as his private solicitor, and may it not give rise to a suspicion of partiality if you appoint a man in that position in the capacity of Judge especially if you give him power to imprison ?—I think that the chances would be infinitesimal of a Registrar having a private client being influenced in favour of that client in the event of his becoming a bankrupt. It might occasionally occur, but it would be a rare thing. I daresay in your great experience you have had such cases but the percentage would be very small.

3105. I take it you would extend that jurisdiction to all Registrars ?—I would certainly. If a man is appointed Registrar I do not think he is appointed unless he is a man of some position and an honourable man.

3106. Would you give the right of appeal—supposing the Registrar sent the man to prison for misconduct—would you give the bankrupt a right of appeal to the Judge ?—That is a point I have not considered—it is a point rather of practice.

3107. I do not know whether you are aware that under the old Act one of the great complaints that was made at the time when the Act of 1883 was under discussion, especially in London, was that jurisdiction in bankruptcy was exercised by inferior Judges and that there was a very strong appeal made to the Government to provide a higher class of Judges to deal with bankrupts ?—But the Judge who deals with the bankrupt knows nothing about him.

3108. Yes, but he comes as an impartial Judge, whereas in the case of the other man his mind is charged with prejudice in consequence of what has taken place in the course of the examination ?—I should say in my judgment that no man is capable of judging of the bankrupt's offence unless he has seen his demeanour in the box and the Judge has not under the present law. He is merely reported to by the Registrar.

3109. (Chairman.) I am afraid that in London where the Registrar holds the examination and also gives the discharge, the lapse of time between the two brings it very much to the same thing—I mean the Registrar does not seem to recollect very much about the public examination?—He would if the discharge were brought forward as it should be.

3110. Quite quickly?—Quite quickly.

Mr. FREDERICK WILLIAM BIDDLE, called; and Examined.

Mr. Frederick W. Biddle.

14 Nov. 1906.

3111. (Chairman.) As we all know you are a partner in the firm of Messrs. Phelps, Sidgwick & Biddle?—It used to be. It is now Biddle, Thorne, Welsford & Sidgwick.

3112. You have had, I think, a very large experience under this Bankruptcy Act and the preceding one too, I think?—Yes, I have been at it for some thirty-four years.

3113. And I think in particular your experience has taken you a great deal into the large trades such as the Wood Street trade?—Yes, principally the Wood Street trade—the Manchester warehousemen. I act for a number of them.

3114. So that besides experience in the actual administration of the Bankruptcy Act you have had a great deal of experience in insolvencies generally under deeds of arrangement and so forth?—I have had a great deal.

3115. Dealing with the matters which have been referred to us I should like to ask you whether you would favour the Committee with your view as to how the provisions for the public examination and discharge of a bankrupt have worked?—As to the public examination I should think that the working has been quite satisfactory. Every bankrupt is brought up before the Court, as in my judgment he should be, and is publicly examined and very thoroughly examined.

3116. But as regards the result that follows what is your view?—Unless the bankrupt applies for his discharge the result is, of course, from the commercial man's point of view, almost nil. The bankrupt is examined by the official receiver. When the Act first came into operation he was a good deal examined by creditors, but I think the number of creditors who attend a public examination grows less and less. Creditors are a good deal discouraged in their attempts to examine bankrupts. They have not sufficiently technical knowledge and they do not care to increase their loss by instructing a solicitor or counsel to examine on their behalf. I hope I am not straying from the subject, but one so frequently notices this sort of thing; a creditor gets up full of zeal with the intention of examining a bankrupt who he thinks has defrauded him and generally, or very frequently, the creditor commences his examination by making an accusation. He does not ask a question at all, but he makes an accusation. Then he is pulled up by the Court and he is told: "You must not make a statement of that sort, you must ask the debtor what you want to ask him." Then he endeavours to do so. He fails; he is discouraged and sits down. When that has happened to a man once or twice I do not think he comes any more. The certainty is that the number of creditors attending public examinations is much less now than it was when the Act first came into operation. None the less, I think that the bankrupt is thoroughly examined and as far as his dealings with the estate are concerned they all go down on the shorthand notes. Then the misfortune seems to be that, if a man does not apply for a discharge, there the notes remain, and nobody takes the trouble to read them. There they are—and the thing is at an end. When the creditor comes to the Court to a public examination he frequently says to you at the end of it "Now what is going to happen." You say, "Well, the bankrupt has passed." "Passed what? He has not given any satisfactory account at all. You have asked for accounts and they have been refused. What has he passed?" "Well, he has passed this examination." Then he says, "I do not understand that—what is going to happen?" "Nothing is going to happen; unless he applies for a discharge the thing is at an end." I am supposing a case where the debtor has not committed any fraud for which he could be punished under the Debtors Act by a prosecution. The net outcome of a public examination where a man does not apply for his discharge is extremely insignificant.

3117. Leading from that, as regards the powers of the Court when a debtor does apply for a discharge, do you think that they are sufficiently stringent to act as a deterrent to debtors?—No, I do not think they are. I do not think they act as a deterrent. I do not think the ordinary debtor cares about the suspension of his discharge. A very large number of them do not trouble about the discharge at all, and do not make any attempt to get it. I should think that a very large proportion of debtors never make any application in the matter at all. I think it is rather unfortunate for one thing, that the debtor has to deposit money to obtain an appointment for the consideration of the question of his discharge. I think that some debtors would perhaps make an application if it was not for that. Where the number of the creditors is large the deposit is to a man in that position considerable—perhaps a man without friends. That is rather a difficult matter to compass, and that may deter some. Then, on that subject, I think the view of commercial men generally is that the utmost—I am speaking again of cases where there are no grounds for prosecuting a man—that the Court awards in withholding a discharge for a period is altogether insufficient. It does not tempt creditors to come to the Court—there is no attraction for them to do so. If they could feel where they had some strong ground for complaint against a debtor that he would get some adequate punishment, I think they would be much more ready to come to the Court than they are.

3118. Do you think that the easy way in which debtors get off has an influence on the amount of composition which insolvent debtors will offer to creditors. I do not know whether I have made my meaning clear—I mean that a debtor can very often defy his creditors when he meets them and offer them a small composition because he knows they can really do nothing now ?—Yes, I constantly hear in the mouth of a debtor or his advisers this sort of thing by way of threat. A composition is offered and creditors, perhaps, consider it insufficient, and are loth to entertain it, and the threat is held out to them. "If you do not accept it we will go to the Bankruptcy Court, and there our position will be a more pleasant one than it will be in paying a large composition," because, after all it is the large composition that punishes a certain class of debtor more than any other punishment.

3119. Taking what you have told us about the existing administration, would you be in favour of a recommendation that a debtor should in every case have a date fixed on which he should come up for the consideration of his conduct ?—Yes, I think I should, but it would not be, I suppose, until after the public examination was concluded.

3120. No ?—And I would rather prefer it to be somewhat postponed until some progress had been made in the realisation of the estate.

3121. So that there should be a report upon the realisations ?—Yes, a debtor's view of his assets, on a statement is sometimes very misleading.

3122. Have you considered whether certain offences such as failing to keep books and reckless trading should be punished more severely than they are now ?—I think so, I do not think the present punishment is at all adequate—particularly in the failure to keep books so far as a trader is concerned, because of course I am talking of traders. I consider that failure to keep books is a very grave offence because it is impossible to make any investigation into a bankrupt's affairs who has not got any books. If you apply to the registrar for instance, as one does, at these public examinations, apply to the registrar, for a cash account, or for an account of goods bought or sold for four or six months past, if the man has got no books the registrar says, "what is the good of my making an order; the man cannot remember it," and it is quite true he cannot. The result is that the public examination is reduced to very little because there is no material for anyone to work upon.

3123. Would your view be that those two particular offences, not keeping proper books, and trading with knowledge of insolvency, should be made the subject of punishment ?—Trading with a knowledge of insolvency is, to my mind, a grave offence, particularly when it is continued with that knowledge—a very grave offence I think it is.

3124. And would you be in favour of including such offences amongst those that can be prosecuted by the machinery of the Debtors Act ?—I should prefer that they should be dealt with by a summary form of procedure, if possible, I should like them administered by the Court. You see the failure to keep books of account, you can actually get from the bankrupt's own mouth. The registrar has it before him at the moment. There is no question to try there. Then the question of trading, with knowledge of insolvency, really comes out of the debtor's own mouth. Where you proceed under the sections of the Debtors Act the machinery is rather elaborate. You have to get the order of the Court to prosecute, and that is more or less costly until you get the order, and then the operation of going to the Public Prosecutor is elaborate and takes time—a great deal of time.

3125. And you think that it would be practicable for the judge or registrar in London to award a punishment which would have to be, I suppose, imprisonment ?—Yes.

3126. In a bad case ?—Yes. I really say so with great reluctance. I feel very unwilling to inflict imprisonment in cases of this sort on any man, but I do not see what other penalty there is which could have any effect. You cannot fine a man who is bankrupt altogether. My idea is that a very short term of imprisonment would be adequate. I believe if it were in the power of the Court to inflict a punishment of that description, that would be a disgrace which would be keenly felt. If when a man comes up for the examination of his accounts he is shown to have so misconducted himself that the registrar or County Court Judge considers he should inflict the punishment he is authorised to give in such cases that would, I think, be a great disgrace, and I think the debtors would feel it so.

3127. And it might ultimately act as a deterrent ?—Yes. It is from the point of view of it being a deterrent that I consider the matter.

3128. Then if I may take you a little further the procedure which, at any rate, you think would be the most effective would be an order by the Court that the debtor's conduct be considered on a fixed day, and that the Court should have the power to inflict that punishment upon him and then there would be an end of him ?—There would be an end of him.

3129. So that he would not be undischarged ?—No.

3130. Nor be carrying on business in somebody else's name ?—No. I do not know whether I should be right at this point in saying it—I do not know whether I shall have an opportunity afterwards—but I think that the present system of automatic suspension of two years has not been successful in its results. I think a great many men get a punishment of two years' suspension who do not deserve any punishment at all. They have been simply unfortunate, but perfectly respectable, tradesmen who have over-stocked themselves, or with whom trade has been slack, or who have found that trade has left the neighbourhood in which they conduct their business. There are dozens of cases which anybody familiar with trade will readily call to mind, where a man finds that he is behindhand with his debts. He calls his creditors together, or perhaps he does not. Perhaps he files a petition straight away. He may be showing perhaps 15s. or 16s. in the pound on paper when he comes to the Court; but directly he gets into the Court automatically his assets are practically halved, and the possibility of paying 10s. is gone by the mere fact of his coming into the Court, and yet the man may have done no moral harm at all. I see numbers of tradesmen to whom that happens, or have seen numbers, and sometimes I have thought it has been a great hardship.

3131. And it also becomes sometimes a matter like a tariff as regards those two years ?—Yes. Then you know, when all people are reduced to equality in that way, why should an honest man who finds that he has got, we will say, 16s. in the pound on paper hurry himself to come to the Court; why should not he say: "I will go on for another year, I may pull round the corner, anyhow I shall only get two years which will be the same thing as if I go to the Court now" and so on, for the next year. You discourage a man from going to his creditors.

3132. Then the effect of that would be to re-establish the system that there was before the Act of 1890, and give the Court discretion as regards that ?—Yes. But do you say the Court had discretion before.

3133. Before the Act of 1890 which prescribed the 10s. limit ?—Oh, yes, certainly. I was considering the discharge was in the creditors before that.

3134. As far as questions by me are concerned, I have done with paragraph 1 and 2. Did you consider at all the other paragraphs of our order of reference ?—I have read them.

3135. Did you read paragraph 4 which relates to the provision for the realisation and administration of the bankrupt's property ? Do you think that they can be in any way managed so as to produce better results than they do ?—I do not think so except in isolated cases. I can imagine cases—at least I have come across cases—where a prompt realisation has been greatly in the interests of the creditors. I do not know whether you, Mr. Chairman, will remember it, but it is a case in point—a case that happened very soon after the 1883 Act came into operation when Mr. Harding was official receiver: It was before Parker's Case. The case I refer to was the case of Bollen v. Tidswell. They were large warehousemen in Wood Street. They came to the Court and Messrs. Copestake, Moore & Company, as they were then, of Cheapside, desired to purchase their business as it stood. I acted for them. I prepared the contract agreeing to purchase for a specific sum. It was a large sum. I forget the amount. I took the contract executed and a substantial deposit in notes and handed them to Mr. Harding. I said: "Now, will you sell us the assets at the price that is named in the contract ?" He said "It is a very good proposition. I will not take the responsibility upon myself, I will have a meeting of creditors." He had a meeting of creditors and they said: "Yes, by all means accept it, it is a very good offer," and thereupon he made application to the Judge. I remember you made it, and that is why I say it was before Parker's Case. That sale was carried out. That was a very good sale indeed for the creditors. They received a very substantial dividend—I think something like 13s. in the £, whereas they would not have received anything like that amount otherwise. That was evidently a case where the creditors were the best judges of what was a good sale and what was not a good sale. A sale made in that way with the concurrence of the creditors, I think was a good sale and was a good proceeding, and power to do that, I think, would be an advantage.

3137. (Mr. Addison.) Before the appointment of the trustee you think there might be a power with the concurrence of the creditors, or on notice to them, for the Court to sanction a sale ?—Yes, with the concurrence of creditors. I think the concurrence of creditors is a very important matter.

3138. You think it would be a useful power ?—Yes, I do.

3139. (Chairman.) Our fifth question is the much vexed one of protecting people who have become the creditors of a bankrupt since his bankruptcy, or purchased or taken mortgages over after-acquired property. Do you think that the position of the law requires alteration in that respect with special reference to real estate ?—That question is intended to include the question of the trustee in the prior bankruptcy seizing everything and shutting out the subsequent creditors.

3140. Yes, that is what is meant ?—It always has seemed to me a hardship on the subsequent creditors. Without going deeply into it it has always seemed to me that the right of the old creditors in the bankruptcy and the right of the creditors in the fresh bankruptcy exist equally in reference to the actual assets available.

3141. That is to say you would give the new creditors a lien on the new assets ?—I would make them all come in equally. I think anything otherwise would be very difficult to work out.

3142. The next question in paragraph 6 is not one that has been very much discussed here, and that is as to whether married women who trade should be put really on the same basis as single women ?—I think that all married women who trade should be liable to the bankruptcy law whether they are trading separately from their husbands or not. I have been defeated on several occasions, and had my petitions dismissed in the Bankruptcy Courts on several occasions, where a woman was apparently trading separately from her husband. She traded under her own name, she buys goods upon her own credit, everything is conducted in her name. Then she gets behindhand and has a petition brought against her. Then immediately her husband is interested in the business and she is not trading separately from him and the Court dismisses the petition upon the ground that the husband and the wife are jointly interested in business. It is a very difficult thing to prove a negative. You have no means of getting behind them to know what the real arrangement is. For instance, you appeal to the books and you say : "Show me in the books that the husband has ever divided any profits." The answer is : "Well, there have been no profits and he could not take any share in them." Then you say : "Show me that he has been debited with a share of the losses " ; and the reply is : " we did not do that, but we were conducting business together and I took one-fourth and he took three-fourths," or whatever they choose to say. I have had my petition dismissed as against the wife in that way. I have a very distinct recollection of one case, because we were pressing the petition—it was some time ago—with a desire to set up an act of bankruptcy because there had been a distress for rent and there was a question whether the Landlord should get the whole amount of his rent or only six months. My petition was dismissed with costs because the husband and wife swore that they were jointly interested in the business, and having been dismissed, within a week she filed her own petition.

3143. The subject of our second question is that mainly of proofs by trustees of the wife's under marriage settlements and the coming into competition with the proofs of genuine traders. Would you go as far as to suggest that they should be made postponed creditors, or have you any suggestion to offer on the subject ? One knows of a case where the debtor's wife had a proof equal to all the trade creditors together ?—I have always thought that where there is simply a covenant to settle without anything being brought in that a claim arising on a covenant of that sort should be postponed to the creditors.

3144. Sometimes one comes across a trader who has covenanted in his marriage settlement to pay £20,000 or some very large sum to the trustees of the settlement, an altogether illusory sum ?—That is what I am referring to, a sum which he never had or never had any prospect of having, and to allow that to rank in competition with bona fide creditors I think is very hard.

3145. And you would postpone it ?—Yes.

3146. Paragraph 8 relates to Deeds of Arrangement and the question we are asked is whether the debtor and the trustee should be put under control so that there should be official audits of the trustee's accounts and an official control over the assets in his hands. Could you favour us with your views on that ?—I am afraid that my views on the subject are likely to be very much affected by the fact that I act chiefly and principally on behalf of a particular trade and a trade which has worked out a system under which it has its debtors under much better control than most trades have. Perhaps I should not be going very far from the point if you will allow me to say what the practice of the drapery trade is.

3147. With pleasure, that is just what we want to know ?—The trade has always, as far as I remember, encouraged its debtors to come to it when they find themselves insolvent and they say : "The sooner you come the better ; we will always deal fairly and kindly with you." Now then a debtor comes to one of the houses and says : "I am behind hand and I do not see my way to discharge my liabilities when they mature." It is then the duty of that house to call a meeting of the creditors. They send round to the houses ascertaining who are the creditors, or perhaps the debtor supplies their names from his own books. A meeting of the creditors is then held. The principal creditor takes the chair and explains to the meeting what the debtor has said to him, and then they pass a resolution appointing an accountant to investigate the affairs of the debtor. The nomination of the accountant is left to the largest creditor, and the largest creditor also, if occasion arises, nominates the solicitor who is to advise the general body of creditors. Those regulations were made because it was found that accountants sometimes competed for the investigation and that a number of creditors coming to a meeting brought a number of solicitors where possibly the presence of one was sufficient for all purposes of advising. Then as soon as the accountant has furnished his investigation, he calls a meeting of the creditors again, and he reads and explains the statement that he has prepared. He always takes the stock and he prepares a trading account and a deficiency account. He explains the position to the creditors and the debtor is then asked if he wishes to offer any composition. If he does, the creditors consider his offer. They usually, in a composition, give time for the payment of the composition—generally a year, though rarely more. It is generally done by four instalments of three, six, nine and twelve months. They prefer to have security of some kind, but not necessarily a security of the kind which is asked in the Bankruptcy Court for instance. They will be content, perhaps, with cash creditors standing aside and not ranking in competition with them or something of that kind. If the debtor makes no offer, or if his offer is not an acceptable one to the creditors, the creditors then ask him to execute a deed of assignment. I am supposing it is a case where the debtor has not committed any misfeasance, or has not behaved in a way which makes the creditors think that he is deserving of some punishment. If that is the case, they ask him to execute a deed of assignment and the deed of assignment is generally executed in the room to a trustee, always an accountant, and always with a committee of inspection consisting of two, three or five of the largest creditors according to the amount. The trustee then at once goes into possession and he realises under the direction of the committee. His accounts are audited by the committee, most carefully audited, and at the end of the realisation a statement is sent out to every creditor signed by the trustee and the committee explaining the result of the realisation, showing the amount at which the assets were taken in the original statement, the amount which they produced, the amount of expenses in realisation and the percentage that that leaves on the amount realised. That is circulated to every creditor. The debtor in the case of his executing a deed of assignment gets a discharge from each creditor as the creditor executes the deed.

3148. That is how it works out?—That is how it works out. That system has been in operation a great many years, and I am bound to say has been found to be a very satisfactory one and a very popular one. The great attraction of it is its speedy operation. The debtor is at once divested of his estate and the trustee placed in charge of it, and he proceeds at once to realise.

3149. You have no difficulty about creditors who are not trading creditors?—Very rarely. Occasionally, of course, we are troubled with the money lender. The money lender will say, "I will not come in under your arrangement because I put all these matters into bankruptcy" which really means that he is wanting to be bought out. He is not bought out; he is never bought out. If he will not come into the arrangement then it goes into the Bankruptcy Court, but in the trade they never allow any creditor to have a preference. One of the most astonishing things, if I may say so, is the way in which large numbers of creditors will come into a voluntary deed. I could, if it were necessary, give you names of cases where 400, 500, or 600 creditors have all come in under a voluntary deed quite willingly. They believe that a committee representing the largest of the creditors is satisfactorily superintending the realization of the estate, and that they can do no better. Therefore, they voluntarily come in.

3150. Would you give the judge or registrar power to refuse to make a receiving order on the petition of a creditor, when it is shewn that he is simply standing out, and that the large majority of the other creditors have assented to a deed?—I think I would, but I think the proportion of assenting creditors would have to be very large in such a case. I do not think our old three-fourths would do. It should be a larger majority than that. I should make the majority a very large one.

3151. Then is the upshot of what you tell us that, assuming a deed of arrangement to be initiated, you would not wish for any official control?—I would not.

3152. (Mr. Addison.) What about the three months act of bankruptcy?—I suppose in the realization of these estates we always go on with the act of bankuptcy swinging over our heads, but it does not inconvenience us much. We know our people, We know they will all come in, and they do all come in. Let us suppose the estate goes into bankruptcy, I know that in the drapery trade it would be impossible for a trustee in bankruptcy to shew that we had not realised the estate to the best advantage. It must be realised to the best advantage by people who are engaged practically in nothing else, all their lives, than in realizing these estates—people who are experts at it, and who have the great advantage of the advice and supervision of the creditors in these matters. You will bear in mind that many of these large warehouses have clerks, men of position and great experience, who practically do nothing else than look after these debtors. They are constantly attending meetings of trustees and committees, and they are really able to offer exceedingly good advice as to when and where an estate should be realised, who is on the look out for stock of that description, and so on. I think estates are always realised to the best advantage in that way, and I do not think any subsequent trustees would be likely to say: "Oh I shall not adopt what you have done. You are a trespasser." In fact I have not known it done. I have never known it to occur.

3153. (Chairman.) Would you in any way shorten the period of relation back, so as to make the standing-out creditor agree to come sooner if he is to come at all—?—I should prefer that he came sooner. I think it is very unfair for an outstanding creditor to sit on the fence for two or three months, and when the estate is practically realised, to say: "I am not coming in." The object is almost always the same one, namely, the desire to obtain preference. Your straightforward creditor, who is really angry at the treatment he has received, goes to work at once. He attends the meeting and says, "I am dissatisfied with this; I will not come into such an arrangement; and will instruct my solicitor to proceed in bankruptcy," and he does so.

3154. I do not know whether you have considered our last paragraph about whether assignments of book debts and hiring agreements ought to be registered?—I have heard an expression of a desire that assignment of book debts should be registered. My own experience is that assignments of book debts are by no means common. I have very rarely given creditors assignments of book debts, and I think the tendency is not to take that form of security. I think it was more popular a little time ago than it is now. I think that the act of bankruptcy, consisting in the statement by a debtor that he has suspended or is about to suspend payment of his debts, operates very much against the assignment of book debts. The ordinary plan is this: A debtor wants money, and he says, perhaps to his principal creditor, "I will assign so many of my existing book debts, or future book debts to you, but you must not give notice to the other creditors until I give you word that I have got into difficulty." So the intimation is generally made by the debtor to the creditor who has advanced the money to the debtor just before his getting into a difficulty. The debtor may in the meantime have been talking to other people about his financial position. I remember a case very well where a client of mine made an advance to a debtor on book debts worth about £4,800. He advanced a considerable sum upon them—a sum of about £3,000. He was to give him notice directly pressure was made upon him that he could not go on. He came in late one afternoon, and he said: "These notices ought to go out," and, therefore, I remember I kept up the clerks almost all night sending out an enormous number of notices to the debtor's creditors. A trustee was appointed, and a private sitting was held, and I remember that you, sir, examined me to see what the debtor had said to me, and whether it amounted to a notice that he had suspended, or was about to suspend payment. I do not think you got much out of me upon it, but you so frightened my client who was present that he came to me the next morning and said: "If they are going to examine me like that I cannot stand it; I will give it up." And he did. So the effect of that act of bankruptcy is very much against that particular form of security. I should think that really once a year is as often as one comes across an instance of it. Of course hiring agreements stand on a different basis altogether. I do not myself see why hiring agreements should be registered at all. As to the other point, the number of assignments of book debts is so small in my experience that I should not have thought it was worth while troubling about it.

3155. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I have just one or two questions to put to you. You say that the working of an estate under a deed of assignment is very popular in the City?—Yes.

3156. I take it that it is much more so than working under the Bankruptcy Act?—Much more so.

3157. I see that you are connected with the wholesale warehouseman's business. Do not you think, in your experience, that there are a large number of bankruptcies caused by the over-trading of the warehousemen themselves, and by the long credit that they give. I dare say you well understand the expression "dating forward"?—Very well.

3158. The custom of the wholesale drapery trade in London, and I believe it also applies to the provinces, is for credit to be very much enlarged as compared with what it once was?—Yes, that is so.

3159. And a man is pressed to buy more goods than he wants or can pay for. It is rather a pointed question, perhaps, but you would not mind giving me your opinion about it?—No. I do not think so. I have heard that discussed many times. I do not think that the draper over-buys himself on that ground. I think he overstocks himself because he has a sanguine disposition. If he is of a sanguine disposition he may avail himself of the very lengthy credit that is offered to him, but what it amounts to is that the houses are really finding him in capital to a certain extent, and that is a great convenience to a tradesman who has small capital, and many of these men have very small capital. I do not think it does induce him to buy more largely than he otherwise would, and I do not think it ought to.

Mr. Frederick W. Biddle.

3160. My experience in the City has been exactly the same as yours. The wholesale houses combine together, and they pass similar resolutions to those that you have been speaking about, and it works very satisfactorily; but there is always the difficulty of a few creditors standing out, and trying to be paid in full. Have you made up your mind as to what should be done to meet that state of things ?—I very seldom find a man in the trade standing out. If I do, we get in all the assents we can. I ascertain who are standing out and I say to the principal creditors: "Do you know any of these gentlemen ?" They nearly always do, then I arrange that the creditors shall go and see them and explain the position. I find that very efficacious. They are much more likely to come in by being asked by their fellow sufferers than by being asked through professional people.

3161. Assuming that there are some who stand out, will you give us some idea of what sort of majority ought to bind the minority as regards proportion ?—To tell you the truth I am not very keen upon that point at all. I find that the difficulty of getting creditors into these arrangements is not such as to make it at all a strong case in respect of binding minorities. To tell the truth I do not know that I am keen about taking away the right of a man to go to the Court if he wants to go. I do object to a man who will not decide one way or another, but if a creditor thinks he has good cause to go to the Court I think he should have the right to go, and I do not think we ought to put much of a stumbling block in his way. That is his distinct decision and he has as much right to come to that conclusion as another creditor has to come to a contrary one.

3162. I suppose that you agree with every other witness we have had here that the principal cause of bankruptcy is the non-keeping of books ?—Yes, I should think that defective accounts have more to do with it than almost anything.

3163. Of course in the class of business that you are brought into contact with they are first class businesses as a rule and books of account are always kept ?—Yes, but by no means always, and for myself I should like to see not only the keeping of such books as will adequately disclose a man's position being required. but I think every trader is bound to make an annual balance sheet if he intends to understand the position in which he is and what he is doing. A trader who does not do so, as a rule, has very good reason for not doing it because he knows on what side of the account the balance is coming.

3164. Do not you think that there are a large number who are not competent to keep books of account—especially amongst small traders ?—No; you do not want a complicated system of accounts. I do not much care what the accounts are as long as they represent the position. About three or four books does it, you know.

3165. One question as to the registration of assignments of book debts. You will have often come across in your experience a case where a man in a large way of business who is engaged on a contract assigns a certain portion of his book debts to some bank or financier. Do not you think that the registration of such an assignment would be very prejudicial to him ?—Yes to him.

3166. And also a preventative to business ?—Yes, certainly. You see, I said when I began that I had heard of this question of registration of assignment of book debts discussed. What the ordinary commercial man likes to have is a registration of some sort which will get into his trade papers so that they will come round to him, and sitting in his counting house he shall be able to see that so and so, who is a customer of his, has made an assignment of his book debts. But he can arrive at that by a little enquiry on his own part equally well. What he wants is—he does not like to have to put these awkward questions to a debtor, and therefore, he prefers the registration being put into a trade paper, but he can arrive at all these conclusions by a little enquiry.

3167. As regards the working of the Bankruptcy Act itself would you encourage the application for a discharge from the bankrupt ?—Yes, I think the number of bankrupts about without a discharge is very undesirable and I would have every one of them, whether he gets his discharge or does not, come up to have the question of his discharge considered.

3168. What is the object of giving a man something that he does not want ?—No, it is an opportunity for the Court to consider his conduct and decide whether he is entitled to his discharge or not. You know he ought to want it.

3169. Do not you think that it is more important to look after legislation which will protect persons from the bankrupt after he has become a bankrupt ?—You can do that too. Having the one provision would not prevent you having the other.

3170. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to the non-keeping of books, I think it often happens that people who are well able to keep books and who have kept books cease to keep books six or nine months before they go into bankruptcy ?—Yes.

3171. Would you make that absolutely a penal offence ?—Yes, I would.

3172. There should be no doubt about it that a man should be punished in a case like that ?—Yes.

3173. There are thousands of cases like that every year, where a man has kept books eight, ten or twelve years, but who for the last twelve or eighteen months of his trading has ceased to keep books of any description ?—There can be no mistake about the reason for his doing that.

3174. Would you make that absolutely penal ?—I would.

3175. That there should be punishment without any doubt ?—Yes: as regards a trader. I should like in all these cases to limit it to a trader.

3176. On the other hand you are in favour of discharging bankrupts without any penalty where there is no accusation ?—No offence. Yes.

3177. Where there is no idea of fraud ?—Yes.

3178. Would you give power to the Court after the examination to give such a discharge ?—Yes, on the application being made.

3179. By the debtor at the end of the examination ?—Yes, I would make the question of discharge quite, so to speak, automatic like a public examination now. I would have the day fixed for it if possible.

3180. Would you not do it at the same time so as to avoid any further expense ?—I think we would not know enough about the estate. I should prefer, as I said to the Chairman, that he should come at a rather later period. I have heard it discussed whether an application for discharge should not always come after the trustee has certified that he has realised the estate as far as he reasonably can. When we wind up a company we have a meeting at the end and the accounts are submitted by the liquidator. The creditors pass resolutions closing the liquidation. Something analogous to that might be a very convenient thing for a debtor who wishes to apply for his discharge when the trustee in the bankruptcy has arrived at that position. Then you would know exactly what the estate had produced and it would not necessarily keep the bankrupt from getting his discharge for a very long time.

3181. You told us of a case where you had effected a sale before the trustee was appointed ?—Yes.

3182. Who would you be in favour of that power being given to ?—If necessary to the official receiver.

3183. And you said such powers should be with the creditors' concurrence ?—There might be a special manager but whoever was in the position during the time that intervenes between the Receiving Order being made and the meeting to appoint a trustee.

3184. Would you be in favour of a majority of the traders binding the minority ?—Yes.

3185. What majority would you be in favour of there ?—I mean a majority in value.

3186. Not a majority both of value and number ?—No, I should think I would say a majority in value. It is a question of what their interest is in the matter.

3187. I find that it is very useful to proceed in that way sometimes, because you would sometimes run round to the principal creditors and get their views on the matter.

If they were in favour of a sale the sale would be held straight away ?—And the good will is maintained.

3188. Yes, and there is no depreciation of stock ?—No.

3189. No leakages of any kind come in ?—No.

3190. But you must have some majority of the creditors to carry out such a system ?—Yes, it must be a majority. I confess I have never much applied my mind to consider what that majority should be.

3191. You seem rather inclined not to interfere with the power on the part of one, two or three who want to stand out, and act on their own behalf, but do not you think that the law should be that the majority should compel the minority. You might have a big majority such as five-sixths or nine-tenths ?—Now you are talking of another thing—you were talking of what the majority should be of the creditors who authorise a sale by the manager or the special trustee before the appointment of the trustee. As to that I say that I think the bare majority in value would be sufficient.

3192. And not number ?—I should be indifferent as to number, I think.

3194. In deeds of arrangement would you say specifically how long you would allow outstanding creditors to decide as to proceeding in bankruptcy—would you say a month ?—Yes. I think a month is ample for a creditor to make up his mind in.

3195. And would you also be in favour of a large majority ruling the minority ?—I should accept it thankfully if I found that it was the law, but I cannot say that there is a very strong case for it.

3196. You see your business may be different to others ?—Yes, I admit that.

3198. With regard to the registration of book debts. You say that traders can easily know whether a man has assigned to another trader a quantity of book debts. How is he to know ?—He can ask the question.

3199. Yes; but it is a very serious matter. I remember myself putting a question in a very round-about way to a customer of mine and I know what the result of it was. A creditor goes to a trader and he begins to fish about to know whether he has done something which indicates that he is short of money, and that trader as a rule resents it very much. It is very difficult to get to know ?—Yes. I agree that debtors do resent questions being put to them.

3200. Do not you agree with this: that the assignment of book debts is fair evidence that the trader is in some difficulty ?—Yes.

3201. Why should he assign his book debts ?—He would not unless he was in need of money, that is clear.

3202. And he usually assigns the book debts, as far as my experience is concerned to his largest creditors, and there is an object why he does it. He assigns them to him because he has some sort of tacit agreement that if he does fail six, nine or twelve months hence he will get some assistance from this trader again. He gives him a preference with an ulterior object ?—I have not remarked that he assigns to his largest creditor.

3203. Do not you think it would really be better for all that the whole of the creditors should know that the books debts are assigned ?—Yes. I think, if I may recall what my answer was, it was that as far as my experience went, the thing prevails to so small an extent that it did not call for any active remedy.

3204. Excuse me, in your business it may be, but in some other businesses there is a great deal of it ?—Is there ? Then it is merely that I have not come across it. I do occasionally, as I mentioned in a case, but not very often.

3205. (Mr. Chamberlin.) It is very rare in my experience.

3206. (Mr. Richardson.) Do you find that a transfer of stock takes place between a debtor and a creditor, and that the debtor hands back to a particular creditor a certain amount of stock. Do you find that that takes place ?—Very rarely. I have come across it.

3207. Would you be in favour of such transactions being registered ?—No, I think not.

3208. Hiring agreements. Are you in favour of their being registered or not ?—I think not.

3209. (Mr. Peat.) You expressed the view that a bankrupt having traded with a knowledge of insolvency should be specially punished. Have you in your own experience, found it difficult to say when a bankrupt did know when he was insolvent ?—Yes, frequently, but I am, of course, supposing a discretion in the Court and not that all bankrupts who traded with knowledge of insolvency are to be punished. It is to be a question for the discretion of the Court. Of course, there is an immense difference between the case of a man who has kept proper accounts and who prepares a balance sheet, and finds himself a little bit behind, and who has a reasonable expectation that he will make it up—it would be very unjust to punish that man—and that of a man who goes on year after year until he comes to the Court with practically nothing.

3210. That answer so supplements what you have said that we need not pursue the subject further. Your experience chiefly, as you have told us, is in the drapery trade ?—Yes.

3211. In connection with deeds of assignment ?—Mainly in the drapery trade, but not merely with deeds of assignment, in all sorts of windings up—in bankruptcy.

3212. You expressed an opinion based upon your experience that all creditors come in to the deed of assignment ?—I say they generally do.

3213. Just so; but in other trades, and under other circumstances where creditors are not so ready to come in, and where you might come to the conclusion that they were standing out for better terms even if it was a month that they were standing out for, would you in such cases give a large majority power to bind a small minority ?—I think my answer was this:—That in the particular trade that I have referred to, there was not a great difficulty in getting the creditors in. Of course I could not say that one condition of affairs was to prevail as to one trade and another as to another trade, and, therefore, I must take your question not as applying to some case outside the drapery trade, but to all cases. You ask me really do I think that a majority ought to bind a minority.

3214. You are satisfied with the standing out of a small minority for a better payment than the rest of the creditors ?—You raise a very important question there. Who is to be the judge as to whether the minority is justified in holding out or not. Who is going to decide that question ?

3215. I am rather asking your opinion ?—I will just say this. I do not think a minority should be bound if they can show good cause why they should not come in.

3216. Yes, that is a sufficient answer ?—I do not want a minority automatically bound by numbers. They ought to have a right to show just cause against coming in.

3217. (Mr. Addison.) Just one question on that point. Where there is a large majority an application to the Court to confirm it might be desirable—should you object to that ?—No

Mr. Frederick W. Biddle.

14 Nov. 1906.

3218. You think that the Court ought to be entitled to consider circumstances?—I do not object to that, in fact, I think if you are going to have a minority bound by a majority you must have that in justice. The minority may have a perfectly good reason for declining to come in under the arrangement and I do not think that it would be fair to bind them.

3219. This question of assignment of book debts we must look at from all sides. In your experience in the City it is a small matter?—Yes, quite small.

3220. Have you known many cases where they have been assigned to secure past debts, or where the assignment has been for money lent?—No, they have almost always been where a debtor wants a present advance and then the creditor, if he makes him a present advance, takes care to put in his past debt.

3221. But the money goes into the business?—The money goes into the business.

3222. And in that respect you find that it is very infrequent?—Yes, I find that it is very infrequent.

3223. That is my own experience. Have you anything to say about the delay in making a man a bankrupt after you have got a judgment against him. Do you think that the delay is too great?—That is to say after you have got judgment against a man you serve him with a bankruptcy notice. There are proceedings on the bankruptcy notice. The creditor petitions and then the debtor appears on the petition.

3224. Is it your experience that undue delay is created by giving the opportunity to the debtor to contest the several stages?—It does in some cases occasion delay and, of course, one frequently complains of the delay, but it is very difficult to suggest a means by which to get rid of it. There may be a perfectly good ground why the debtor should meet you on the bankruptcy notice. He may consider that he has a good defence. He may want to raise all that defence over again when you come to the petition and then you would be going over the ground, I admit, twice, but the fact that it has been considered on the bankruptcy notice is no reason why it should not be considered again on the petition. These delays are very vexatious, but very often the points raised are quite good points and worthy of consideration.

3225. Putting it generally, take the case of a judgment for a trade debt. The debtor does what he can to prevent getting into liquidation. How long do you think he could keep you at arms length?—I have got a judgment. A man opposes me all through and I issue my bankruptcy notice. There go eight or ten days. Then I present my petition, or he meets me on the bankruptcy notice. Then I have to get an appointment and that appointment will certainly not be within less than a week, and I daresay it may be a fortnight. I really think that a great part of the delay is due to the fact that the appointments one gets are always rather a long way off. Then we will suppose that his objections on the bankruptcy notice are to be heard. My petition is on the file and I get a day for hearing that. That will not be less than a fortnight off and it may be three weeks. Then he meets me upon that and that is adjourned. He raises an objection there and the registrar thinks I should have further evidence. Then it will be adjourned for a fortnight and it may be adjourned again. In that case it will be adjourned for another fortnight. That is where the time runs away of course, in the adjournments. If you could get shorter appointments we should get on very much faster.

3226. So that as the procedure now is conducted even where you have a clear judgment debt you cannot get the administration of the debtor's assets before six weeks or two months?—If you start from a judgment for a trade debt it is not very likely that there will be so many adjournments, because, of course, the registrar is quite capable of forming an opinion pretty quickly as to whether there is any good ground for adjourning or whether there is not, but there are cases where the bankruptcy petition does not rest on anything so stable as a judgment for a trade debt and then there is abundant opportunity.

3227. But still the shortest time would be a month even if you hurried everything through?—Yes, certainly.

3228. Do you think the expenses are too high—the initiatory £5 stamp for instance?—Yes, I always think that the £5 stamp is too much.

3229. Do you find that a deterrent?—Yes, the £5 stamp and the £5 deposit—there goes £10 before you do anything. A creditor often says: "I am not going to that expense."

3230. I take it from what you have stated that you consider that all bankruptcies ought to be brought to some legal and definite termination?—If possible.

3231. So as to get rid of the enormous number of undischarged bankrupts that exist at the present time?—Yes.

3232. Would it meet your view if the official receiver was in every case to report on the conduct of the debtor and that upon that occasion the Court should deal with the question of discharge?—By "debtor" you mean bankrupt—we are talking about bankruptcy; he does that now.

3233. That is when he makes application for discharge, but I mean in every other case?—Yes.

3234. And that that should be the occasion on which the Court should deal with the discharge?—Yes, I really have not worked it out. I confess I should like, if it were possible, for the Court to have before it the view of the creditors on the question of discharge in every case. I suppose it would be impossible without having a meeting, but I think the Court would receive a great deal of guidance from any expression of opinion by the creditors. The creditors recognise an entirely honest case very readily and they hold very strong views about such a case and I think the Court would derive considerable guidance and help if we could get it in. Of course it would mean another meeting of creditors and in that respect there would be a difficulty. If when the application was made for the discharge the trustee called a meeting of creditors to consider whether they would support an application, or would not, or what representation they desired to make on the subject, and the trustees were bound to convey the creditors' view to the Court, and bring it up before the registrar when the application was heard, I cannot but think that it would be of great assistance to the Court and that it would materially help to have the debtor justly dealt with.

3235. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Do you think that the creditors would take the trouble to come?—There is not that difficulty in the City. Yes, I think they would because they would recognise it as part of a system, but, of course, when you get outside a trade which takes an interest in its debtors and go to casual people then—no, they would not come in.

3236. (Sir Edward Fithian.) With regard to the question of punishment I take it that you are in favour of the Court having power to administer punishment where offences have been proved under the Bankruptcy or Debtors Acts?—Yes, in certain cases—I do not say the Debtors Act. I do not think the registrar could adminster the Debtors Act.

3237. You mean the Bankruptcy Act?—Yes, I am only referring to specified offences. When you come into the sub-divisions of the 11th Section of the Debtors Act I am clear that you want a jury. You could not have a series of trials in the Bankruptcy Court. I do not think you could possibly have them and I do not think you would do justice to the debtor either. The debtor is entitled to be tried by a jury. We were referring, I think, to the question of non-keeping of books and to trading with knowledge of insolvency. Those are things which are much more easily ascertained. As I said before you get a great deal of what you want out of a man's own mouth.

3238. And there you would give the Court power to inflict punishment?—Yes, it would not be giving the registrar or the county court judge larger power than stipendiary magistrates have who are certainly not men of superior position to the registrars or county court judges. With regard to the question of imprisonment I know some people have a strong feeling against it, but under the existing Act if a man who is an undischarged bankrupt gets credit for £20 he commits a misdemeanour, but that seems to me to be a much lighter offence than going on for years without books or with a knowledge of insolvency. It is a case really of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

3239. Would you give a man the right to appeal supposing he is convicted of one of those offences which you have mentioned?—Yes, if it is decided by the registrar, I think I would.

3240. (Chairman.) He would have it under the existing Bankruptcy Act. Every order of the registrar may be appealed from.

3241. (Mr. Peat.) Or that of a county court judge.

3242. (Chairman.) Yes.

3243. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Then with regard to the assignment of book debts generally. I presume that you will agree that it is very important that creditors should know that a transaction of that kind has taken place?—It would be a great convenience to the creditors.

3244. Is it not rather more than that because in the event of bankruptcy arising practically a very large portion of the assets are swept away?—Yes, only, as I say, in remarkably few cases. The gentleman opposite who examined me said that his experience was that those cases have been much more frequent than they have in my experience. Directly he establishes that I am wrong and that they are much more frequent than I think, then I shall be disposed to modify my opinion.

3245. You think that in that case there would be a justification for the registration of these assignments?—There ought to be great justification. I confess that I am affected by this: what is it going to be? Is the mere assignment of one debt given as a pledge to be registered, because if so that would work very hardly I think.

3246. I spoke of the assignment of book debts generally?—But if you are going to apply the principle at all must it not be applied whether the debts are many or few. Would not the same principle really come into operation?

3247. Not altogether. I think that the distinction could be drawn. If a man assigns his book debts generally he is practically denuding himself of a large portion of his assets for the benefit of one creditor and that is practically a case of preference?—Pardon me asking you a question. Do you say that if he assigns numbers of his book debts it would require registration but that if he only assigns one or two large ones for a specific purpose that it would not require registration?

3248. There may be a difficulty with regard to single assignments; it is quite possible. But where there is a general assignment made and the person to whom the assignment is given takes practically the whole of the sums owing to the debtor, do you not think in a case like that the assignment should be registered?

3249. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You find that bankers take pretty good care of themselves, do they not?—Yes, I do.

3250. (Chairman.) I think, Sir Edward Fithian, that Mr. Biddle has already given us his opinion of this question.

3251. (Sir Edward Fithian.) With regard to hiring agreements, can you give us any reason why you think they should not be registered?—I confess my difficulty is in seeing why they should be registered. Why should the fact that a man has obtained his furniture on the hire system be published to all the world.

3252. It is a very much larger question than that of furniture obtained from hiring companies. It affects machinery. There are many mills in the manufacturing districts where the machinery is provided in that way. Surely it is important that the creditors should know whether such machinery belongs to the person in whose possession it is, or whether it is merely hired?—Yes, I agree, but I have not any very strong views upon that point. I should have thought that the registration of such hiring agreements would be a fair thing to have.

3253. The registration might exclude hiring agreements in respect of goods for a less amount than £30, for instance?—Take clerks who get their furniture on hiring agreements. It would be very hard on them to placard the fact that they were getting their furniture in that way in all the trade journals.

3254. Would not a limitation such as I suggest cover many of those difficulties?—Yes, perhaps it would.

3255. (Mr. Smith.) You stated that your evidence would be coloured, to some extent, by the fact that your connection is to a great extent with the drapery trade which is a highly organised trade in respect of the collection of debts and bankruptcy proceedings?—Yes. Mr. Frederick W. Biddle. 14 Nov. 1906.

3256. Do not you think that there would be some danger in applying some of the principles you have mentioned to other trades which are not so highly organised and also to non-traders?—Yes, to non-traders, as regards some of the subjects you have been discussing, certainly.

3257. Take the case of deeds of assignment, and the majority binding the minority. I daresay you know that we have had large numbers of cases of speculative people, company promoters and others, who have come in with very large liabilities and who have practically got no assets. Yet they have had resolutions passed by creditors almost unanimously to wind up under deeds of arrangement?—Yes.

3258. If you are going to give power for the majority to bind the minority in the case of deeds of arrangement would it not be liable to the same abuse?—I think in most cases the creditors are the best judges of their own affairs.

3259. I am referring to those cases that have come into the Bankruptcy Court of speculative people who have brought about their failure with the result of entailing heavy loss on other people and other classes of people. Those people had often had arrangements passed by their creditors which the Court would not sanction, as their conduct was such that the Court would not for a moment listen to the release of the debtor?—Yes.

3260. There have been a number of cases in the High Court where deeds of arrangement have been set aside by the Court on account of the conduct of the debtor. Would not there still be that danger in cases of that class?—There would be still that danger and that danger must continue. May I say that I think creditors in many cases would be much more disposed to come to the Court, and the Court would be much more attractive to the creditor if he thought that by bringing his debtor here he would get a punishment of some kind. He now says: "I will not go to the Court—what is the good of going to the Court—nothing results from it." The machinery is put into motion and at the end there is nothing gained. I so often have that sort of thing—in fact I had an instance of it yesterday.

3261. Is not that subject to this qualification. You said before that the refusal to discharge was no great penalty, but are there not a large number of cases where refusal to discharge is a serious matter—in that class of cases that used to exist under the old Bankruptcy Act of which there have been comparatively few recently, cases I mean of large merchants carrying on business in a reckless way—exporting and importing merchants in Liverpool and London carrying on very large businesses and then coming to grief by reckless trading. Do not you think that that class of business has been very seriously checked by the power to refuse a discharge?—No, I should not have thought so.

3262. Do not you think that there has been a large diminution in that class of failures since the present Act came into operation?—I should not have thought so. You remember that the penalty as administered by the Court for reckless trading is not generally a heavy one.

3263. No, simply I mean the refusal of discharge on the public examination of the debtor. The fact that when he comes up and applies for his discharge and for leave to trade again he does not get it as he used to get it under the old Bankruptcy Law, and thereby create the scandal of a man who had failed under scandalous circumstances being allowed to trade again and become a wealthy man, has resulted in that sort of thing being hardly possible now?—Yes, it may be so.

3264. I think that your evidence is coloured to some extent by the interests of the retail class of traders, but there used to be, though I do not think there have been lately, the large class of failures such as the failures of banks and mercantile houses, and those have been very largely checked by the mere refusal to discharge?—Is it not possible that those cases have been worked out many of them by private arrangement, and that that would tend to lessen the number actually coming before the Court.

14 Nov. 1906.

3265. I think not, the failures themselves do not exist. I am not giving evidence, of course, but I am putting it to you that that may be the case ?—Thank you.

3266. I think that that is so to an enormous extent. In fact, I think that that accounts in a very large measure for the diminution in statistics in bankruptcy. We have now a different class of traders ?—Yes.

3267. I think I have got from you all I can fairly ask in regard to deeds of arrangement. You have had some experience in liquidation by deeds of arrangement, and perhaps you know about deeds of arrangements under the old Acts ?—Yes.

3268. I suppose even if the suggestion as to a majority of three-fourths, or whatever the number may be binding the minority were carried out that you could not distinguish between such a system and the system under the Acts of 1849, 1861 and 1869 ?—No, if we had power where a debtor voluntarily executed a deed to bind the minority it would bring the debtor very nearly into the position that he was in under the Act of 1869.

3269. And, therefore, the difficulty is to re-establish a system of that sort which has already been condemned and which has failed, unless some safeguards could be introduced to guard against these abuses ?—Yes.

3270. Nothing has occurred to you has it—perhaps you have not studied this subject sufficiently ?—Yes, I have.

3271. Does it occur to you—I am very anxious to get evidence of this kind if we can get it—as to whether any checks could be devised which could secure the public interest against the abuses which arose under the Act of 1869 by going to the Court in the initial stage of the examination and having proofs of debt examined by the registrar or official receiver ?—The only thing is that directly you get the matter put to some extent into the hands of an official you necessarily get the delay which is the very thing you want to avoid. You rob the method of procedure by assignment of half of its advantages.

3272. The other plan would be to endeavour to hasten the bankruptcy procedure if that were possible Have you any suggestion to make on that head ?—I do not think I have. I do not think I could suggest any means. You must give the debtor an opportunity of raising his defence if he has got one. The great objection to the liquidation by arrangement under the 1869 Act was with regard to two points. I think the trustee did not give security and there was no sort of going into his accounts.

3273. Of course there was the question of proxies also, and the use of proxies and fictitious debts ?—Yes, and on the other hand there is a great deal to be said on the subject of proxies. It is very difficult for creditors to be really represented at a meeting now. It is rather a large subject to go into, but I do not regard the proxy system as satisfactory at the present time.

3274. But you admit that under the old Act there were abuses practiced ?—I do with regard to proxies.

3275. And otherwise ?—Yes.

3276. And you are not in a position to suggest any method of obviating those abuses if the power of the majority binding the minority is stopped ?—I think not. I see great difficulty in making a trustee give security, the trustee is already in existence. May I say this, that under deeds of arrangement I cannot help noticing in the Board of Trade Report that the number of trustees who do get into difficulties is extremely small.

3278. That is practically due to the fact that the Board of Trade have power to refuse to appoint on certain grounds ?—Yes.

3279. By the way, you would be disposed to increase that power of the Board of Trade and give them a wider discretion in the approval of trustees ?—You are speaking of bankruptcy now, in what direction ?

3280. Simply refusing to certify trustees whom they considered incompetent. They have not that power at present ?—Yes, I think I would. I think it is distinctly in the interest of creditors that the trustee should be a competent person—very distinctly so.

3281. I would like to ask you this question again about the Drapery Association for which I may say that I have a very great respect. I know a good deal of its worth and I am entirely satisfied with it. Has any suggestion ever occurred to you whereby cases in which such a highly organised trade as the drapery trade could be distinguished from other cases where there is no such organisation, or from non-traders ?—No.

3282. You do not see any way of distinguishing it ?—No.

3283. One or two questions with regard to the penalties. On the subject of the non-keeping of proper books and trading with the knowledge of insolvency, you suggested that those should be dealt with by the registrar summarily, and that then the debtor should go free. Would you apply that to all cases of bankruptcy ?—No.

3284. Would you abolish altogether the question of suspension and discharge ?—Oh, certainly not. The registrar should have the same discretion as he has now except this, that there should be no automatic action with regard to the two years. May I say in that connection, I have not had an opportunity of saying it yet—that I do think under the present Act that a limit of 7s. 6d. for compositions is too high. There are many cases where creditors would be glad to take 5s., and where it could be quite properly offered in the case of a man such as I have mentioned who has really done no wrong. In such a case creditors would be glad to take a composition of 5s. sooner than have the affairs of such a man wound up; 7s. 6d. is a high rate.

3285. Of course any limit of that kind, I suppose, you would admit must be a matter of conflicting opinion amongst the various classes in the community. It was very fully discussed in the House of Commons what the proportion should be ? The legislature was in a rather stiff humour just at that time over those two things, but the 10s. and the 7s. 6d. almost seem to me to be high.

3286. (Mr. Addison.) Few members I may take it have had your experience ?—Perhaps they have not.

3287. (Mr. Richardson.) Have you found any difficulty with regard to the debtor—the bankrupt—appointing his own trustee.

3288. (Chairman.) You do not mean the bankrupt.

3289. (The Witness.) Are you talking about a bankrupt ?

3290. (Mr. Richardson.) We have had this brought before our notice from the North of England, where the solicitor and the debtor have appointed trustee ?—Under the Deeds of Assignment Act.

3291. Yes ?—I frequently have that.

3292. Would you be in favour of preventing that ?—We always do prevent it because we never accept the nomination of the debtor.

3293. In the North of England we were told that it very frequently happens that the trustee is appointed before the creditors are brought together ?—Yes.

3294–5. Would you be in favour of no trustee being considered permanently trustee until he is approved of by the creditors ?—Yes, I should, and we invariably do that. We say: "Now you have got an assignment there, and you have got it executed, we will not adopt that assignment unless you transfer the estate to the trustee who has been nominated by the creditors." We never will have a trustee nominated by the debtor.

EIGHTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, November 21st, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq. C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY ATTLEE, called; and Examined.

3296. (Chairman.) Just to get it down on our notes I think you are President of the Incorporated Law Society and a member of the firm of Druces and Attlee?—Yes.

3297. And the Law Society has favoured us with the Report of their Special Committee as to matters included in the Reference to us?—Yes.

3298. I should propose if all the members of the Committee have read this Report not to read it now, but to take it as read and print it as part of our appendix. (Agreed.)

3299. We may take it that this Report represents the views of the council?—Yes, the council have adopted that. It is not necessarily an exhaustive view of theirs, because the Committee probably would understand, and you, sir, would understand, that in a Report you can only put in such things as the Committee and Council agree upon or are unanimous upon. There is no minority report, but you may take it that all that is in that report is agreed upon.

3300. Then I think that as an additional matter with which to help us you have dealt with this subject in your address to the Provincial Law Society?—Yes, very slightly.

3301. It is on pages 39 to 41 of the address and it has occurred to me that it would be very useful if we extracted that, and had it printed with the report, because it deals also with those matters.

3302. (Mr. Addison.) If Mr. Attlee has no objection?—No, I have no objection.

3303. (Chairman.) Then I may take you, in order to ask you one or two questions myself, to page 4 of the Society's Report?—Yes.

3304. I observe in the second paragraph that "The Committee are of opinion that without any application on the part of the bankrupt his conduct should at a convenient stage of the proceedings be brought before the court for its consideration, preparatory to the bankrupt's discharge." Might I ask was it the view of the Committee that a day should be fixed on which the bankrupt, if he did not apply earlier, should come up to have his conduct considered?—In that clause we had in view the fact that a very large number of bankrupts do not apply for their discharge at all and especially those who have most cause to fear that their discharge will include some severe remarks probably from the court. Therefore we thought that it was desirable that that question of enquiring into the conduct should be a matter separate, as it were, from the discharge and that at a very early stage of the bankruptcy the bankrupt's conduct should be separately enquired into.

3305. Would you leave it, as it is now, optional to the bankrupt to apply for discharge, or would you make him come up so that the point should be decided one way or another, and that in that way the number of undischarged bankrupts should be reduced?—The view of the Committee was that the number of undischarged bankrupts should be reduced. I should like to explain that a great number of us do not consider that the withholding of the discharge is the best method of punishing a bankrupt. It appears to us to be exceedingly injurious in its effect on that part of the Act, and I shall be prepared presently to give some reason for it.

Mr. Henry Attlee.

3306. Does that come under that part of the Report which is on the top of page 5, which says, "in other cases should be in the discretion of the Court but should be refused only in special circumstances and that the punishment of the bankrupt should in general be other than the withholding of his discharge"?—Yes.

3307. Then perhaps you would not mind favouring the Committee with your views on that, because it is really one of our most important questions?—Yes. Of course we are dealing now with Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890. One of the mischiefs, if I may so call it, of that section is that it gives so very little discretion to the judge. I should like, if I might, to give my experience among various classes of traders and show the Committee in what way that section and the consequences of its being carried out in regard to the bankrupt, operate injuriously. First, I will take a small trading section, that is to say, the small village trading community. I dare say the Committee are all aware that in nearly every village in England there are one or two shops which I may call general shops where a man is grocer, baker and linen draper, all in one. The amount of capital which a trader of that class has is generally somewhere lying between £500 and £2,000. Very little misfortune operates to render a trader of that kind insolvent. The case of scarlet fever attacking his children has come before me in several instances. The man has had to pay a heavy doctor's bill, he has lost trade by the fact that scarlet fever is in his house, and children have been told that they may not go to his shop to buy things and have been warned by the schoolmaster and schoolmistress, and so it has come about that a man is reduced to being obliged to file his petition. Then what takes place is this: Nearly always you will find in that case there is an active pushing trader who has to supply him wholesale, who seizes or tries to get that shop snatched away from him. If he succeeds probably in showing that the man cannot pay 10s. in the pound there is an end of it. The fact that you plead illness they try to meet by saying that it was neglect of the man's premises, that he had been warned over and over again that he would have fever. In cases where the clergyman and people in the parish have tried to give a man 10s. in the pound then there is another point started against that village trader. There is a sort of, I was going to say, spite apparently, because they bring up the fact, and you will find that the lawyers in all the country towns are very keen upon this, that he does not keep his books properly. There the people succeed very often in being able to show that the books are not well kept. Of late years there has been quite a new zeal, if I may say so, apparently born in the country for pushing that clause in Section 8 of the Act, which, of course, you all know, as to the books not being properly kept so that, quacunque via, they manage to prevent a discharge being granted. And these people not being able to get their discharge the wholesale trader is able to get that shop into his own possession. The trader is prevented from starting again and a man whose children take prizes in the National school, and so on, and who is looked upon by the clergymen as perhaps one of the best parishioners in his district, is prevented from trading. I can only say this, that if you now go through the villages of Hampshire, Surrey, or any of the home counties, you will find that these villages traders are being excluded and in their place is put a branch of the larger trader. I mention this because I have been appealed to again and again by clergymen and others who have asked, "Is there no way by which the rigour of the Bankruptcy Act as against these poor people can be mitigated." Now let me just say one word with regard to bookkeeping. The class of people who keep those shops are people who cannot be expected to keep their books in a very methodical way. What takes place practically is this. During the ordinary days of the week to a very large extent the business over the counter is carried on very easily, but on Saturday night a number of people come in to do their shopping. Of course the shopkeeper cannot get extra hands to assist him in the shop for the Saturday night alone. The people come in in a great hurry. They have had their wages paid and the goods they purchase they pay for over the counter. It is impossible for the shopkeeper to keep accurate accounts under such conditions with regard to what he has sold. He hands the goods out; somebody takes the money in exchange for them, and he has no time to book it as he would do in other shops under other circumstances. In that way the question of the keeping of books operates very very harshly. You will find that the county court judges have had cases before them where they have expressed themselves as being exceedingly sorry to be obliged to come to the conclusion that the bankrupt's books have been imperfectly kept; and on that ground have withheld his discharge. That is one reason as regards that clause why we think that there should be some larger discretion given. May I just remind the Committee of this fact, that it is on proof of the facts as they are stated before him that the judge is obliged to withhold the discharge? That presses upon a very deserving class of village traders, which I think it is a pity should be interfered with to the extent that it is. You have only to take a drive through any of the home counties in order to see the change that is coming over village life through the cause that I have referred to. Then the operation of the section is injurious in another way. Perhaps this is more a matter of political economy, but there is a question whether it is better to have one large trader supplying a village, or whether it is desirable to encourage the peasant trader to continue to carry on business. So much for that class. Now I will take another class coming nearer to town. Of course these are only typical cases which I am giving to you. Now let me take the case of firewood dealers. Now firewood dealers have again exactly the same difficulty with regard to their ability to keep accurate accounts. I know of the case of one large firewood dealer, who has attempted to have his books kept by chartered accountants who prepared a most elaborate set of books for him. These firewood dealers are mostly illiterate men and they are almost bound to be men of a somewhat coarse fibre, if I may say so. This is the way in which they do their business. Their capital is nearly always found by some wholesale importer of timber from whom they buy what is called firewood. It is shipped from Norway and Sweden and enters this country as firewood but it is really a part of timber cargoes which is not fit for any other purpose. The firewood dealer we will say has a mill in which he saws his timber. Out of a part of it he makes pieces of wood fit for box making and the rests he cuts into little billets or packets which are taken round in carts supplied by him, and he goes round the country and round the town supplying stores and so forth. Now in consequence of this inability preventing a man getting his discharge, of recent years firewood dealers have not often been made bankrupts. I have had case after case, and I could give the names of them if necessary, in which the different merchants who have had transactions with the firewood dealers have combined together so as not to let the man, when he gets into difficulties, become a bankrupt. They do that because they consider that it would not result in any good whatever if he became a bankrupt. He would not get his discharge, however desirous he might be to obtain it. I have a case where a fire occurred on the man's premises which reduced him to such a condition that he could not pay his creditors although he had been trading all his life. That man could not produce such books as would satisfy the requirements of this Act of Parliament. A solicitor is often employed, and I mention this without any desire of saying anything about the solicitors, to do the very best he can to prevent a particular man getting his discharge in order that his business might be snatched away from him and transferred to the hands of some of the large suppliers. The result is that the man is sent out into the world and becomes a wanderer on the face of the earth. He is not able to be employed for want of the discharge as a principal, and it may be that he is too proud to take a subordinate position. Some of these men are very proud, although they are very poor and very rough, and when they have once been masters they go down in the social scale, as they are disinclined to become servants. I have known such cases come before the judge, but notwithstanding the honesty of the man the judge has felt bound to refuse the discharge. He says: "What am I to do? The Act says if you find such and such a thing proved you have no discretion left." Such a man leaves the court with a feeling that he has been very hardly dealt with and that the law is very unjust to him. Then may I just say this as bearing upon that point. To treat all men alike who just happen to keep their books badly without making any discrimination between them is to render what was intended to be a punishment no longer such. A man says to himself: "My discharge is withheld but so also is so and so's" and he gets the sympathy of a great many people who have known him to be a good man. The rogue and the professional bankrupt, if I may say so, who comes every year, and who, as was once said, comes as regularly as his birthday comes round, does not care a bit about having his discharge refused. It is no disgrace to him, because he says, "so and so is a good man and he did not get his discharge either." It is this wholesale withholding of the discharge without any discrimination which tends to prevent that which was meant to be a punishment from being a punishment and which also tends to prevent people who have any sort of interest in the bankrupt letting him go into the bankruptcy court. I have spoken of poorer people. I should like to give you an illustration of how it operates with regard to merchants. There was a gentleman of very considerable means who met with some misfortune. A firm which was very well known at the time, failed very suddenly, with the result to this unhappy gentleman that he lost some £80,000 by the failure. He was expecting to receive and treat that amount as a perfectly liquid asset. That was a failure which took everybody by surprise. The principal member of the firm died suddenly—I will not stop to enquire whether there was anything suspicious about his death, but it is sufficient for our purpose to say that he died suddenly. The gentleman owed large sums of money to the bank, and I was asked for the first time to represent him. I went round to the banks because one of the Scotch banks sent for me. They were talking about whether he should go into bankruptcy or not. At once we said: "Here is a man who cannot pay 10s. in the £," and it shocked them to think that in such a case as his there should be no discretion in the court. I was pointing then to that subsection 8, I think it is, which says "that unless the court shall be of opinion that the bankruptcy has not been due to his conduct," etc. I consulted counsel in connection with the case and he advised me: "You know the judge will not let him go through for this reason, that he will say at once that it was improvident on his part to have had such a large sum of money with a firm of this kind." The result was that we wound up that man's estate without any deed or anything else of the kind. The banks paid a large number of the people who were small creditors, under £400 or £500, and we took the estate and managed it. That is not an isolated instance by any means. The assets administered in that way were very large. It so happened that we ultimately managed to realise a very big sum for that estate extending the administration over four or five years, and we succeeded in obtaining a surplus which was a very unexpected result. If he had been made bankrupt he would have been for some time an undischarged bankrupt, and I need scarcely say that, being an old man, his books were not in an absolutely perfect condition. It is a very common thing for bankers, merchants and others who are interested in a man to say: "We shall not let this man be made a bankrupt. We would rather wind him up separately. If he is an honest sort of man we will not have him made a bankrupt at all. If there are any creditors who will not come in, let us deal with them and pay all the smaller creditors under £100 and get rid of them." Now,

I have got several cases coming on in my own office where we are winding up the estate without any deeds or anything of the kind. All that I am saying tends to show—and this is my point—that there must be some wide discretionary power. I should like, if I might, to say with regard to this, that the old principle of the bankruptcy law was that as soon as a man gave up his business to his creditors the assets of the insolvent person were regarded as the property of the creditors, and it has only been in recent years that this attempt to punish a man by withholding his discharge has been enforced. It shocks the consciences, if I may say so, of the trading community that one of their number who has gone in and out among them for years bearing a high character should, because he has failed to pay 10s. in the £, have meted out to him exactly the same consequences as are meted out to a man who is a rascal, if I may put it in that way bluntly. Therefore, we all feel, I am quite sure the whole of the society feel, and I certainly do so, from my own experience, that some different methods of punishing the bankrupt should be adopted. It is to the interest, surely, of society that such men as I have described should be at liberty to get their own living, and be able to get it as quickly as possible. If it is thought that the bankrupt's conduct has been such that he should be punished it should be a punishment apportioned to the blameworthiness of his acts. He should be called before the court and he should receive a reprimand which should mark him in society with disgrace. There could also as part of the punishment be inflicted a considerable fine, I suggest to you, because I have tried to think the matter out, and I would suggest a fine similar to that which would be imposed upon a man who had been guilty of improper conduct with regard to licences. Take the case that used to occur frequently where there had been a fraud on the Inland Revenue and where fines had been inflicted. There the man went on carrying his business on as a malt dealer, or as a bonded warehouseman, but he had to pay the fine, or, if he did not, there was a possibility of his being sent to prison. If in bad cases a fine were imposed, not necessarily, nor ordinarily, of such an amount as would prevent the bankrupt trading, but as should make it an extremely unpleasant thing for him unless he paid it and caused him to come before the court from time to time until it was paid, that would be calculated to have a good effect, especially where he had the fear of imprisonment hanging over his head. That is the view which I think should be taken. To have this question of discharge simply dealt with in the way it is now is to take away from bankrupts anything like the sort of feeling that because they have not got their discharge they must have done what is wrong. The way the thing is managed at the present time is a mistake. The good and the bad are huddled together, and no one knows from the outside who is good and who is bad, and the operation of the Act in its penal aspects in that way is made use of by designing traders who use the severity of the section for their own purposes to destroy a man's trade and to get it into their own power. In that way the smaller businesses in this country, and even the larger ones, are passing into the hands of the large capitalists and the wholesale people who farm out and deal in these matters. So much on that point. Now, perhaps you would like to ask me a question on some other point.

3308. (Chairman.) Thank you, that covers a deal of what is stated here, but I observe that it is said that it would be in the interests of the community that the bankrupt's discharge should be granted in all cases in which it is supported by a substantial majority of the creditors ?—Yes.

3309. That, I suppose, you would recommend in addition to the powers conferred on the Court ?—Yes, because the traders, who are the injured people to a great extent, know all about the man and whether he is a good man or not. You would find, if you were to examine country creditors, I do not hesitate to say, that they were all very keen for this Section 8 being applied in its stringency so far as regards the keeping of books, because it is one of those things that cannot be helped. and they use it so as to exclude the debtor from trading again. You will find that people will come to a small debtor and supply him with 10s. in the £ if they think that that will help him to obtain his discharge. Creditors (except, in the country, those who wish to get rid of the trader) are all anxious to promote any measure that will prevent the little trader from going into bankruptcy.

3310. There is just one small matter of detail that I want to clear my mind about. It is on page 5, if I might refer to it, that the Committee suggest that: "A complete list of undischarged bankrupts, and of persons against whom administration orders have been made, should be published annually as a supplement to the London Gazette ?—Yes. Mr. Henry Attlee. 21 Nov. 1906.

3311. You would exclude from that, cases where the operation of the receiving order had been stayed ?—Certainly.

3313. Exactly. I observe, going to page 6, that the Council are of opinion that Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act has been beneficial in its operation ?—Yes.

3314. And they would extend the limit to £150, or even to £200 ?—Yes.

3315. Is there not an objection which is sometimes urged that the debtor never gets quite free under that section. I mean he has the instalments hanging over him with the possibility of committal if he does not pay them ?—Yes, there is that objection, but, speaking generally, I do not think you will ever get anything quite perfect. We think that that section has acted very well. I may just say that no doubt you are aware that the Bill which we prepared with regard to the certificates of solicitors has been passed. I can tell you how we are dealing with that. With regard to that we are refusing certificates to a great many undischarged bankrupts. We are adopting a course which has the approval of the Master of the Rolls, and that is that we should still grant the certificates of those undischarged bankrupts who have been in the habit of taking out certificates for some years. We have been trying to get that Bill, but could not get it for some time. All persons who have been bankrupt in 1906 we are refusing for the present unless they can show that they have got adequate means of carrying on their practice. Before that we tried hard—I want to say that to the credit of my society—year after year, and if you refer to my address you will see there the number of times that we brought forward the Bill before Parliament with the object of giving us this opportunity of dealing with bankrupt solicitors.

3316. Now page 6 deals with Section 122 ?—Yes; that we thoroughly approve of.

3317. Have you any views with reference to the fees that are charged. It has been suggested that the fees charged by the Treasury are rather too high ?—That is a matter I cannot deal with. We have felt that the bankruptcy fees are high.

3318. I mean the fees which are charged under Section 122 ?—Yes; they are rather high, but we have not felt our way to say anything about that subject except that we think that they are high. In fact in this Report we have rather kept off, if I may say so, small questions such as solicitors' charges, or anything of that kind. Matters of that sort were not in our minds. What was in our minds was the public good as regards actual bankruptcies, and the administration of estates under them. It would be to the great advantage of the unfortunate debtor that these fees should be reduced, and we should welcome any reduction that might be made, especially if it is now going to be extended. There should not be a rise of fees—it must not be an ad valorem matter. The Treasury are always sharp enough to try and increase fees if they can, and to try to make a department pay. They must not do that, and if they try to do it they will find that we will protest against it.

3319. (Chairman.) I do not think I have anything more personally to ask you about Numbers 5, 6, and 7 ?—Those are really matters which would be of great practical benefit.

3320. As regards Section 8, on page 7, as to which we have had a great deal of evidence before this Committee, as I understand your view is a deed of arrangement should be binding unless a creditor within a certain time applies to the court to upset it ?—Yes; and if I may say so, the Bankruptcy Act 1869 only failed—it was a good Act—by reason of the abuse of proxies, and so on. People used to come round and tout for the appointment of trustee

Mr. Henry Attlee.

What we should like most to see would be a Trustee appointed simultaneously with the making of the order of bankruptcy. Of course under the old system years ago there were not chartered accountants as there are now, but the chartered accountants have improved their position very much, so that the objection which once prevailed as to appointing a nominee of the bankrupt does not exist at the present day providing he is a chartered accountant or a professional man. The severity of the rules which chartered accountants have laid down for themselves preclude them from having many bad sheep of the character which were so plentiful and rife in the days of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Then it is very desirable that when a man is bankrupt there should be someone able to go into the market and deal with affairs at once in the bankruptcy. I do not wish to say anything, or to be considered as saying anything, against the officers of the Court. Personally I have always had great courtesy shewn to me by them ; but they are not above criticism, and I should just like to say this, that in my experience in bankruptcy cases a great deal of money is lost because the official receivers from their education are not competent to deal with the bankrupt's estate, especially when it is a large merchant's estate, or a large trader's estate, or an estate of a large manufacturer employing a number of men. They are almost necessarily helpless. They cannot get, as a public accountant can get, full information to enable them to take up a thing and deal with it immediately. I should like to say that sometimes there have been cases where large mills, such as calico mills, spinning mills, and other factories of that kind, have suddenly had to stop payment and been obliged to present a petition. The officials invariably try to do their best, and I should like to say that they always try to meet one and to do as much as they possibly can in the interests of the concern, but what can they do ? They cannot do what the Chancery Court can do. If you have a case of a man dying suddenly—dropping down dead and dying suddenly—whose business ought to be carried on without interruption, what do we do ? We apply, take out a summons, go before the chief clerk or judge, and he will make an order then and there for the appointment of a receiver who is an accountant. You go to chambers, you get it granted immediately, and the business goes on as if the man had not died. Now you cannot do that with a bankrupt. That same thing ought to be applied to-day in a bankrupt's estate and there ought not to be a fight as to who is to be the trustee or who is to be the receiver. It should be possible to at once carry in with the bankruptcy petition and simultaneously an application for the appointment of A B, or C D, chartered accountants, if you like, or persons who are certified with proper affidavits as to their responsibility and fitness to be appointed then and there as trustees subject to and upon their giving security. No doubt the power may be reserved to creditors afterwards to remove them, but what we want in London, and I believe, the same thing applies in Manchester, Liverpool, and other large places, is to have power at once to have a trustee appointed or some person who can deal with things which would have to be dealt with at once, not so much that it is wanted to realise and sell but for the purpose of preventing other persons taking advantage of the bankruptcy. Because in these days the telegraph is set to work, and if a man is bankrupt to-day the fact is known within a few days, or a few hours, in Japan, China, or any part of the world, and the destruction that takes place in the assets which belong to the creditors in such a case is great. We should like to get that prevented and I do not see why the books could not go at once to a trustee or why that should interfere at all with a proper enquiry into the bankrupt's conduct. That should be a separate matter, separately enquired into, but do let us have, as creditors, the control of the realisation of the assets of a bankrupt. Now, of course, there you will have difficulty, because the Board of Trade will say, "If that is done it takes away a lot of our fees." That is a practical difficulty which one sees. But it would be better to state at once that in every bankruptcy a large sum, a certain percentage, should be collected by the trustee and should be the first charge on the bankrupt's assets, if you like, to meet that question. But do not let our assets in the administration of a bankrupt's estate suffer from delay because of this wretched question of paying the Board of Trade officials who we do not want to get rid of as far as regards looking into the actual conduct of the bankrupt, but only as regards administering the estate. It is much better that it should be a Government official who should deal with questions of conduct rather than outsiders. If that were done I feel that would be a very great boon. But at the present time let me put it that practically what takes place is this. You present your petition, the officials are not quite prepared. They say they must look into it a little bit. They look into it for three or four days, and during those three or four days all the mischief is done while they are trying to get to the bottom of things.

3321. (Chairman.) There are a certain large number of estates, are there not, into which a private trustee would not care to go, because I mean there are no assets except what would be collected by litigation ?—There are a few but they are comparatively few, very, very, few. I have asked that very question. I once asked a leading accountant whether he would take some of these smaller cases, and he said, "Yes, we take them and deal with them ; you must take the small with the large," but I know we have cases where there are practically no assets.

3322. Yes ?—We hope that if you adopt a different kind of punishment for bankrupts, apart from the discharge, so that it will make it difficult for professional loafers and professional bankrupts to live in comfort that that class will decrease.

3323. In some cases a special manager is appointed with great rapidity even under the present system ?—Yes, appointed with considerable rapidity but not with sufficient rapidity and he is fettered with this, that he is never sure that he is going to be the man who will have the management of things. The official receivers, even the best of them, in London are timid. They will not act and he is fettered in a way that is most undesirable. I could give you illustrations from West Indian estates where persons have had large dealings with West Indies, China, Japan, and other places. There is just one thing I should like to mention. There is a firm of very large merchants indeed, whose estate is now being wound up because the bankers and others knew that if it went for a week into bankruptcy or if they tried to get any deed of arrangement through it would simply be ruin to it, ruin to a large estate. Now that estate is being administered outside bankruptcy and it has paid very large dividends ; it paid 2 per cent. this last month on its capital, and it will pay, as far as one can see, quite 20s. in the £ now by careful management, but it would have been absolutely ruin to have done that in any other way. If one could have presented a petition and could have called in one of the leading accountants of London, and it could have been then and there, in a few hours, dealt with, there would have been no difficulty. We could deal with that state of things in the Chancery Court in the case of a merchant dying with his estate insolvent, and why, if we can do it in the Chancery Court in the case of a dead man, should it not answer in the case of an insolvent debtor who is alive and able to give us the assistance which the dead man could not ? You will remember he is properly before the Court. There is no difficulty in framing and putting proper clauses for his punishment. It was only after a certain time, I need scarcely remind you, that special courts were appointed in bankruptcys. The older history of our law shows that bankruptcy was not taken away from the general jurisdiction of the court. One of the great difficulties at the present time is that there is a great dislike, an absolute dislike, to the Court of Bankruptcy and its entourage on the part of the trading community, but I think that if these alterations were carried out the Court of Bankruptcy might do its work more cheaply, more quickly and in every way more advantageously than under the old system. It is no good keeping on patching up the old system of discharge.

3324. I think that you have given us an outline of the amendments which the committee suggest on page 9 of the Report ?—Yes.

3325. Then I think you have also indicated to us in the course of what you have been kind enough to say that you would alter the provisions as to proxies and enable them to be given at once at the meeting ?—Yes.

3326. And then on page 10 I see that the Committee recommends that proofs of debts could, at any rate in some cases, be dispensed with in favour of a simple statement ?—Yes, that is done under the Companies Acts.

Why should you put a man to the trouble of making out an affidavit with regard to his debt when you can see it appearing in the books. In the Court of Chancery when I was first admitted it used to be the custom to prove every debt by affidavit, and it was one of the amendments of the law which was most beneficial that in the administration of a deceased's estate it became no longer necessary to do that. You never now, without the sanction of the Master, call upon a man to verify his statements, because what is desired is to keep down expenses of every kind—not merely the expenses of the solicitor who has got carriage of the order, but the expenses of the man who has to deal with the difficulties of the matter. Why should he have to fill up an elaborate form in order to prove his claim. Take the bankrupt's ledger. If the bankrupt has kept good books there is no difficulty in knowing what are the provable debts. It goes against the interests of my profession I believe in a certain way to say what I have been saying, because the swearing fees are valued by the Commissioners who take them in connection with the affidavits.

3327. Then you recommend that there should be a Report by the trustee to the creditors ?—Yes.

3328. And that his accounts should be audited by the Board of Trade. Does that mean instead of by the Committee of Inspection. At present they are audited by the Committee of Inspection and then by the Board of Trade ?—Yes, that would still be the case. The Board of Trade would have them after they have been audited. I would say that for this reason. There are grave abuses sometimes with regard to charges, and I think it is desirable that the Board of Trade should have some control over the remuneration. I give as an illustration of that the case of a bankrupt who some time ago failed. His estate was administered and the Committee voted certain remuneration to the trustee. Before he got his discharge a legacy came in—a large legacy which enabled the estate to receive more than 20s. in the £. The trustee made an appeal to the Committee. He said: "You only gave me such and such a percentage." They were perfectly happy. They were dealing with money which did not belong to them. The trustee was not a very high-minded man and they voted him a very large sum, all of which came out of the estate. I only give that as an illustration of the necessity of having the accounts submitted to the Board of Trade.

3329. I think I was counsel in that case—re Warden I think it was ?—No; this was in the case of re Robinson. I think very likely you may have been in that case. I was only concerned in it from being the person who paid over to the trustee a considerable portion of the fund which came in. The Board of Trade would not help us there.

3331. And then I see the last paragraph is a recommendation that the existing statutory provision in relation to Schemes of Arrangement should be relaxed so that more schemes and compositions should go through ?—Yes, whether you like it or not those schemes do go through. May I point out to you that if you study the statistics of Bankruptcy now you will see that peop'e are not allowed to become bankrupt until the estate has got down to a very small sum. Small companies are formed—one-man companies, as they are called, are formed—which take over a certain portion of the estate and deal with it. It is very desirable that, instead of those things being done without any official cognisance, or anything of that kind, that they should be done with official knowledge.

3332. In the light of day ?—In the light of day. You know, sir, how curiously people act in these matters. I do not know whether you remember the case of D——. There the creditors met and we offered them in my office 10s. in the £ if they carried the scheme through. One solicitor, I am sorry to say, who appeared there and who thought it was a very handsome proposal took steps afterwards in bankruptcy, and we withdrew every claim and there was never a dividend paid. You, sir, happened to be opposed to me in that case, I think. I would remind you of that case. I offered 10s. and you never got a dividend for your clients at all.

3333. (Mr. Richardson.) I see on page 3, No. 1, the report says, "The committee regret to observe that the tendency of the suggestions generally is in the direction of increased punishments, disabilities, and restrictions." I apprehend you still believe there are some of the actions of debtors that should be made punishable ?—Yes, I hope nothing I have said has led you to believe anything to the contrary. I have only objected as far as I have spoken to the question of discharge. I have distinctly stated that there should be punishment but that it should be a sort of punishment which marks with disgrace the bankrupt, but not with reference to the discharge.

3334. This paragraph says, "The tendency of the suggestions generally is in the direction of increased punishments, disabilities, and restrictions." You say you do not think them desirable ?—No, we do not think them desirable.

3335. And one of them particularly which you object to is punishment for the non-keeping of books ?—Yes.

3336. Have not you found that a very large number of traders who are well able to keep books, and who have kept books for years properly during the three, six, nine, twelve, eighteen months, or two years prior to their bankruptcy have kept no books at all or have kept them insufficiently ?—I have.

3337. They are men capable of keeping books properly. It may be that they have had them audited and knew how they stood, but when they have seen bankruptcy looming in the distance they have ceased to keep books ?—It is almost inevitably the case; I have noticed it over and over again that as soon as a man began to feel that he is getting behindhand he ceases to have his books written up. But that period during which they are not written up covers only as a rule about the last twelve months of his trading. But with regard to that period let me say that although it is very desirable that he should keep his books written up you must take into consideration the fact that generally the twelve months before a man's failure are twelve months of great agitation and difficulty for him. We still think that no amount of punishment will ever cause a man to keep books more closely than he otherwise would do, and we think that it is a mistake to enforce that provision.

3338. But, sir, if bankrupts knew that the non-keeping of books was punishable by imprisonment do not you think that the fear of imprisonment would make them more careful to keep books properly ?—My answer is that it does not now punish a wilful concealment of property. That you could do properly, but on a mere question of book-keeping to do so is a mistake. You do not find that any severity of punishment will make a man keep books. On the other hand if you find there has been a studied effort to prevent the detection of property or to cover up, or conceal, property, that is an offence that ought to be punished. The mere question of books not being properly written up, or not properly kept for twelve months before the bankruptcy, ought not to be punished in the way that it is now provided that it should be punished. There, again, I want to say that a great mistake is often made by judges who do not understand the matter. Merchants of the highest position do not write up their books at once although it may seem a curious thing that they do not. What they say is that they cannot close their books for months and months after. Strictly speaking, an accountant would consider they ought to be closed. I had the pleasure of learning bookkeeping under probably the most able accountant that ever lived, Mr. John Ball, and I have heard him say that it was ridiculous that books should be kept written up day by day. Merchants always said "We must wait until we see what is the realisation of such and such a thing." They will often be very much behindhand until then. That is a fact that is not taken into account by the judge. If there is an attempt at concealment, as I have said, it is very easy to detect it because, as soon as the books fall into the hands of an accountant he attempts to begin to write them up, and, when he does so, he will very soon find out if anything is wrong.

3339. You say he "attempts" to write them up, but it may be impossible for him to write them up if they have fallen behind. Then the Council say: "The Council are of opinion that without any application on the part of the bankrupt his conduct should at a convenient stage of the proceedings be brought before the court for its consideration preparatory to the bankrupts' discharge."

Mr. Henry Attlee.

21 Nov. 1906.

Would you be inclined to fix a time limit from say the public examination, that it must take place within six months ?—It should take place as early as possible ; but it must depend on the size of the estate. Of course the bankrupt must have ample opportunity, and the creditor must have ample opportunity, but as a rule I should say that the bankrupt's conduct might be inquired into from two to three months from the date of bankruptcy.

3340. I think you might say six months in the case of big ones ?—Yes ; or in a lesser time than that probably ; but, of course, there must be full power that they should be dealt with by a judge who would be able to give further time, because it is a quasi criminal proceeding, and a man must have an opportunity of showing fair cause for an adjournment of it.

3341. You are inclined to think the six months should be the limit ?—Yes.

3342. Then in clause 2 the Council say that they think that "in the interests of the community a bankrupt's discharge should be granted in all cases in which it is supported by a substantial majority of the creditors" ?—Yes.

3345. One half of the whole of the creditors ?—One half of the whole of the creditors ; but it should be the majority at a meeting of at least half of the creditors. That is what I meant. I was a little out of order in saying that it should be a half because a half is not a majority, but I meant a majority of the creditors present, not being less than the half.

3346. With regard to Clause 8, on page 7, "The committee do not recommend any alteration of the law as regard deeds of arrangement except that a certain majority say a majority in number and three-fourths in value of creditors assenting should be competent to bind a dissenting minority unless within a certain time any creditor for say £50 satisfies the court." What time would you give ? At present, of course, it is three months, is it not ?—Yes.

3347. Would you limit that to a month ?—Yes.

3348. Would you make the limit £25 instead of £50 ?—No.

3349. £50 seems to make it rather large, does it not ?—I do not think it should be a small man who should do it. He might be the means of putting the estates to a considerable expense and considerable trouble.

3350. But do not you think that the £25 man is equally well able to know a fraud, or to detect a case of fraudulent concealment, or misrepresentation, as the man with £50. £50 seems rather a high limit to me.

3351. (Mr. Peat.) You could have a combination equal to £50 ?—Yes ; if it was a combination equal to £50 that would do.

3352. (Mr. Richardson.) £50 seems rather high because you have not many bankruptcies which are above £50.

3353. (Chairman.) That is the limit now.

3354. (Mr. Richardson.) I mean single individual debts of £50—there may be 200 or 300 of them ?—A combination of £50 would do. I think it ought to be some one with a substantial interest, not one who is able to come as a sort of blackmailer. I think it should be at least £50.

3356. For this reason—that you allow a furniture dealer to sell £10 worth of furniture, put it into the man's house, and then to keep a hold over it until it is all paid for. On the other hand a draper puts in £10 worth of drapery to the same house, but he has no lien upon that. He simply stands on the footing of an ordinary creditor. It seems to me that these hiring agreements are giving extra facilities to those traders who have solid property that does not depreciate, and that cannot be eaten up ?—I think any man—I was going to use a strong expression—would be a fool who lent his money on the strength of any one having a lot of furniture in his house. The existence of these hiring agreements is well known. They are as well known as is the fact that a silversmith's shop filled with silver plate does not belong to the shopkeeper at all. These sort of agreements have been made from time immemorial, and you do not want in your eagerness to save one or two improvident persons who give credit on the strength of a man's furniture to interfere with trade. Our bankruptcy laws ought to be in furtherance of trade and not in hindrance of it.

3357. Then on page 9 you say with regard to proxies that you would enlarge the creditor's right to appoint the proxy. Now it is the manager or clerk or a person in his regular employment who is appointed. You say you would limit his proxy if so desired. What do you mean by "limit" ?—You may either appoint a general proxy, or you may limit it to one particular point. For instance, you might limit it to voting in favour of a man being made a bankrupt. Or you might limit it to a particular meeting and not give a general proxy. You may put in any limitation. The question might arise, for instance, as to dealing with a particular asset, and the person who gives the proxy might say : "I limit it to a man voting 'yes' or 'no.'" If he gives it generally he gives a discretion in the proxy to take any course that he thinks proper.

3358. (Mr. Peat.) I listened with much interest to your observations on the subject of books but it occurs to me just to ask whether it is your opinion that if a trader failed to take stock, and failed to keep a cash book and failed once a year to have some record of his assets and liabilities—whether a man failing in those three particulars—should be the subject of punishment. I accept your view readily enough that an absolutely complete set of books written up to date is most unusual ?—Yes.

3359. And if not written up should not be punishable ?—Yes.

3360. But I am asking you your view on those three important points which, if you will permit me, I will enumerate again ?—Yes.

3361. A trader not keeping an account of his cash receipts and payments ?—Yes.

3362. A trader not keeping an account of his stock at any rate once a year; a trader not making up at any rate once a year a statement of his assets and liabilities ; a trader failing in those respects you consider should become the subject of punishment ?—I think he should, provided a discretion is left in the judge. I should say that a man ought to be punished who did all those things provided he was a trader in a large way of business. I have again in my mind the case of small men, which I described when I first came into this room, amongst whom it is impossible to keep books. I did not recognise at the beginning of the sitting that there was an accountant here, but I am sure that you will recognise the difficulties which are in the way of those small traders, and that it is almost impossible to lay down a rule for a small trader which would be quite applicable to a large trader. Therefore I say there should be a discretion in the Judge, and where the Judge came to the decision that it was due to some abnormal circumstance and not to the ordinary exigencies of business it should not be held to be an offence. I have given this case of a small trader having an illness, or an illness attacking his family. I speak of illness attacking the family because it is a very common incident, and it frequently occurs among village traders. I say that it is impossible where such a misfortune overtakes the trader that his wife should take up the business and keep the books as they, perhaps, should be kept. There ought to be discretion reposed in the Judge in a case of that description, but prima facie the non-keeping of a cash book and the non-taking of stock should be punishable, because where it is not done there is often a very good reason for it being left undone.

3363. That supplements your answer sufficiently for my purposes ?—Yes.

3364. The only other question I would ask you is on a matter with reference to which you volunteered information. I think that is the attitude which the Law Society takes in regard to the discharge of a bankrupt solicitor, or, rather, in regard to the giving of a certificate ?—Yes, that is a certificate to practice.

3365. You mentioned that that subject was taken into consideration by the Law Society and that they would grant a certificate to practice where the bankrupt had adequate means to recommence business ?—Yes.

3366. But does the bankrupt's conduct enter into their minds ?—Yes, very much.

3368. (Mr. Addison.) I am told that the number of bankrupts is largely diminishing ?—Yes.

3369. In your experience, what is the cause of the bankruptcies in the City of London diminishing ?—The dislike of the people to go into the Bankruptcy Court. Creditors will not put their debtors there if they can help it. It is not the ability of people to pay their debts in full which has diminished the number of bankruptcies. It may have done so somewhat, but very little.

3370. Have you found from experience that a bankrupt who has not got his discharge has gone into trade again and acquired a new set of assets, and that the dormant claim of the old trustee comes forward greatly to the injury of the subsequent creditors, who knew nothing about the previous bankruptcy ?—Yes, it is very injurious.

3371. In your opinion is that an improper state of the law ?—Certainly. I think that the new assets ought to be shared amongst the new creditors.

3372. Another subject with which we have to deal is that of hiring agreements. In your experience do you know such things as waggons and machinery are obtained upon hire ?—Yes, that is so.

3374. That emphasises your view that a prudent trader does not give credit to a man on empty show ?—No, he is not such a fool as to do that.

3375. There is one matter that you dealt with which I thought important, and that is the immediate necessity of dealing with a failed estate. May I take it that in your experience where a man is in a large way of business there are goods coming from abroad, and there are bills of lading, arrangements with bankers, and a hundred things of that sort to be dealt with ?—Yes.

3376. In your opinion as regards the Official Receiver in the interim we have been talking of, it would be impossible for him with his many engagements to attend to those matters properly ?—Yes, he would have to go out into Mincing Lane and similar places and see the people in the same line of business, and it would be quite impossible for him to do so.

3378. The appointment of a special manager does not, in your judgment, meet the difficulty ?—No.

3379. Is that because the special manager is hampered for one thing by regulations and by the constant necessity which he is under of always referring to the Board of Trade ?—Yes, I have known of a special manager not being able to know before four o'clock whether he could carry out a particular thing. He has gone up to the Bankruptcy Court to see if they could find the particular man he wanted, and could not, with very serious results. Mr. Peat will remember the case of a miller in the north of England who had five or six mills. In that case we did not go into the Bankruptcy Court, because the quickness of Mr. Peat, which was most extraordinary, saved the estate a very large sum. No official manager could have dealt with it with the same amount of dispatch.

3380. (Sir Edward Fithian.) You were going to say something with regard to the question of hiring agreements. I take it from this paragraph that the fact that the hiring system has been adopted generally is a reason why you think they should not be registered ?—Yes, it is a system that is very largely adopted, but even if it were otherwise I should still think that hiring agreements should not be registered.

3381. Is not the fact that it exists to this large extent a reason for registration rather than against ?—No, because it is notorious that very often a man has furniture in his house which does not belong to him. These things are so well known that no business man would ever think of giving trust on the strength of them. Of course you cannot legislate for weak men.

3382. May I suggest to you that it is the business man and the commercial man who ask that these hiring agreements should be registered ?—I think very few of them do, and I think you will find that the great bulk of them do not.

3383. Then you suggest that they should obtain evidence to the contrary—that is to say, they are to assume that a hire-purchase agreement is in existence unless they have evidence to the contrary. Do you apply that in all cases both to non-traders and traders ?—Yes.

3384. Then no credit whatever is to be given unless you can get some evidence of that kind ?—I should not give any man credit merely because of the fact that he had got a house full of furniture. I do not think you will find any trader in the City of London doing that. I should not do that.

3385. I will take that as your answer ?—Certainly; I have certainly had a large experience and I am perfectly certain of that. It is my business constantly to inquire, as the solicitor for an insurance office, into the substantiality of persons wishing to become sureties for loans on policies. One would never think of being satisfied as to the substance of a man who simply told you that he had a house full of furniture. We should want something more than that.

3386. Can you tell me where we are to obtain any evidence of that kind to show that a hiring agreement does not exist ?—You cannot prove a negative.

3387. But that is the position you are assuming ?—No, I simply say that you would not trust a man because he has got a house full of furniture.

3388. In default of evidence to the contrary, are we to assume that the hiring purchase agreement is in existence ?—Yes.

3389. Where am I to obtain this evidence to the contrary ?—From the man himself.

3390. But is it possible or practicable that you are to go to the man who is asking for credit and inquire of him whether he has entered into a hire purchase agreement ?—Yes, that is one of the first things that I would ask. If a man comes and asks me for a loan I inquire whether the house he is living in is his own or his wife's. As regards furniture you constantly find that the furniture is his wife's.

Mr. Henry Attlee.

21 Nov. 1906.

3391. In regard to trade you suggest that that is the right course to follow ?—Yes, I should not lend a man anything because he has a house full of furniture.

3392. I will take your answer ?—I believe it to be true from my experience.

3393. The question of the assignment of book debts—you have not told us anything on that subject as to whether you are in favour of the assignment being registered or not ?—Certainly not—oh dear no. How would any man like that ? I do not know where it would end. None of us, I suppose, can go through life without having, temporarily, for five or six weeks, or something of that kind, some debts. I should not like it to be known that I owed my tailor £20 or £30. You cannot have a registration of debts ; it would cut at the root of business.

3394. Take the case where a debtor assigns his debts to some single creditor and then gets eventually into bankruptcy. The creditors are looking to the debts as one source at any rate from which assets are to be derived for distribution amongst them. They find that the whole has been absorbed by one man. Is that fair or just ?—It is very exceptional for such a case to occur. I have had a great many failures to do with, and I do not think I could point to one where there has been any general assignment of a man's debts beforehand.

3395. But we have had evidence given of it here ?—Yes, probably there would be a few in some part of England. There may be some cases of that kind, and it is a very immoral sort of business, but it does not exist generally.

3396. Do not you think that a case of that kind is very prejudicial to the interest of trade ?—You will not find any rule where you do not get some exception, and you cannot legislate for exceptional cases. To have a registration of book debts would be simply disastrous—it could not be done. Commercial men would not stand it for a moment.

3397. Very well, I will take your answer ?—Certainly not.

3398. (Mr. Addison.). Have you had in your experience occasions on which a man temporarily wanting money has been obliged to borrow on an instalment under a contract or anything of that kind—a temporary instalment coming under, we will say, a building contract ?—No, as a rule, they do not ; I have had a large experience in that respect. I represent the largest building estate in England, and that is the Dulwich Estate. There are a very large number of builders upon it. They do not give actual pledges of the instalments of the purchase money given. What is done is quite different. The builder goes to the bank, and he says, " I have such and such a building agreement, I shall be entitled to divers leases presently." He deposits the building lease with the bank, and the bank manager writes to us as solicitors for the landlord to say, " I wish to let you know the building agreement is deposited, but we do not want you to consider this a charge, and perhaps you will be good enough to let us know when you are about to grant a lease." And on that very large sums of money are advanced, but it would stop building transactions altogether if these were to be pledged or dealt with as subject to registration. I do not know where we should be.

3399. (Mr. Smith.) I have only to ask a few questions on your little pamphlet with reference to some of the observations which you have made to-day and which I take it are in the nature of personal observations ?—Yes.

3400. And which do not represent the council ?—In some respects I represent the council, but I am certainly not a delegate of the council.

3401. On page 4 it is said that so far from checking reckless trading the Bankruptcy Laws have tended to increase the number of undischarged bankrupts ?—Yes, that is so.

3402. Are not these two conditions inconsistent—how far can the Bankruptcy Laws check reckless trading and yet increase the number of undischarged bankrupts ?—It is quite possible that it might be so, but it is not so in practice.

3403. You think that the Bankruptcy Laws have not checked reckless trading ?—No.

3404. Would any legislation or any punishment in your opinion check reckless trading ?—Yes ; but it must always be understood that I draw a distinction between reckless trading and enterprise. As the " Times " article, which I quote in my address, points out, the one is not necessarily a crime, in fact, it is rather to be encouraged. Where there is reckless trading within the spirit of your question I should say that that is one of the cases where a man should be punished in the way I have said, with a punishment which marks him with disgrace so that society takes notice of it, and not by prohibiting his discharge. I do not wish to screen a bankrupt.

3405. By reckless trading I suggest is meant trading which is accompanied by one or more of the defects mentioned in Section 8 of the Act of 1890?—May I just look at that section. I know the clause, but I should just like to look at Section 8, and have it in my mind before I answer the question.

3406. First as to non-keeping of proper books ?—That is not necessarily reckless trading.

3407. That is not ?—Oh, certainly not.

3408. Then the bankrupt continuing to trade after knowledge that he is insolvent—is that reckless trading ?—That may or may not be—that is a question of quantum.

3409. If he knows himself to be insolvent ?—It is not necessarily reckless trading. I once discussed that with one of our leading Judges. It is not necessarily desirable that a man should pull up at once the moment he is getting behind. That is not the way in which a prudent man would act, nor is it the way in which it is desirable he should act. I will take this case : supposing a man is a trader and he takes stock in the way that Mr. Peat suggests, and he finds this year that if he were sold up, taking the market values of everything, he would be only worth 19s. 6d. in the £. He has got a good business. Now, then, I only want to show that that is a question of quantum. If he says that he has only got 6s. 8d. in the £ that may be different.

3410. Supposing that he is worth 10s. on the average ?—Parliament apparently has said that 10s. is the limit.

3411. Supposing he could pay 10s. in the £, would you consider that reckless trading if he continues to trade ?—I do not think that that is a proper description of reckless trading.

3412. Supposing he finds himself only worth 5s. in the £, would you still consider that was reckless trading on his part to continue trading without communicating with his creditors ?—Yes, but I do not think that " reckless trading " is the proper term to apply to it merely when a man is insolvent. I mean a man might trade quite prudently when he had only got 5s. If, for instance, he does not increase his liabilities and does everything on a cash basis. Reckless trading is not necessarily trading when you are insolvent. A man may know that he is insolvent, but he may be most prudent and most proper in the conduct of his business. Recklessness does not consist in the fact that he is insolvent, it consists in the quality of the trading done by him.

3413. Supposing he incurs liabilities which he afterwards is unable to pay when he knows that his estate will not yield 5s. in the £ at the present time—would you consider that reckless trading ?—If he incurred those liabilities without reasonable expectation of being able to pay them, yes.

3414. I say if he incurred them without any question of reasonable expectation. If he, knowing that his estate is not worth 5s. in the £, contracts liabilities which he is afterwards unable to pay, would you consider that reckless trading ?—I should not judge of it by what the ultimate result was. I should judge of it by what looked to him would be the result, and that might not be necessarily reckless trading. A man knowing he is insolvent and can only pay 5s. in the £ may have the opportunity of incurring liability if he knows that none of his creditors will come down upon him within a month. In that case he may pay for his goods over and over again, or within four or five days, or a week. He says to himself, " I shall be able to get money for these goods, and pay for them with a clear profit." That is not to be judged by some accidental circumstance afterwards, but by the way in which it presented itself to the man at the time.

3415. At all events you would not consider it reckless trading ?—Not necessarily.

3416. You would not consider it desirable to embody this clause in the Statute which makes him responsible for reckless trading ?—Yes. I should do so : but I should give discretion to the judge to decide what is reckless trading.

3417. How would you define it ?—Definitions are very very difficult to give. I do not know that I could give you a definition at the moment of what I consider to be reckless trading.

3418. I do not think I need go into detail with it ?—Do not think that I wish these clauses to be altogether embodied in an Act. What I say is that a certain definite consequence should not follow from the mere fact that certain facts have been proved. The nature and quality of the facts, or the nature and quality of the injury done by reason of the possible fact has to be taken into consideration at the time by the judge.

3419. I quite agree, but I shall pass from that, as otherwise we do not agree ?—We do not agree at all.

3420. I ask you this—you say the bankruptcy laws do not check reckless trading. Would you say that the bankruptcy laws have not tended to check the offence mentioned in that section ?—I think there has been some improvement in some cases, but you see there has been more reckless trading, such as you call it, of late years, than there ever was—greater gambling on the Stock Exchange, greater gambling in Mincing Lane, greater gambling on the Corn Exchange, than at any other time.

3421. And less keeping of proper books ?—No, because now we have public accountants, and most firms engage public accountants. The rise and progress of public accountants marks the fact that people find it convenient now to have their account checked by proper accountants.

3422. Then you do not think that the Bankruptcy Act has checked these offences ?—No, not speaking generally. I am quite sure that harsh legislation does not have that tendency

3423. Pardon me for asking you the question, but may I ask—you are a solicitor ?—Yes.

3424. And you profess to have a knowledge of books ?—Yes.

3425. I ask that question because there are many solicitors who have no knowledge of books ?—Yes. As I have already said, I was trained under Mr. Ball.

3426. Why do you suggest that a merchant might find it difficult, or impossible, to write up his books properly during the last year of his trading—what difficulty would there be ?—What I said was that I did not think that the mere fact that they were not written up in the last year was enough, because certain detailed particulars would not be before the bookkeeper to enable him to write up the books.

3427. Such as what ?—The realisation of goods which have been sold, and where there has been only a provisional invoice. You must know that a large amount of trade in this country is done on provisional invoices. The bookkeeper may not be able to get a detailed invoice.

3428. But there would be some record from the provisional invoice ?—Yes; but you would not enter a provisional invoice in your books.

3429. But whether you did or not there would be a sufficient record ?—There would be a sufficient record, because the provisional invoice would lie in the office.

3430. Is it usual to enter into a transaction without keeping any record of it whatever ?—As a general rule there is only the provisional invoice.

3431. That is the usual practice ?—They do not enter it up until the invoice has become something more than a provisional invoice. Sometimes they have a rough book in which provisional invoices are entered up, that is all, because payment is often made, or accepted, on the provisional invoice, or on part of the provisional invoice.

3432. But if he followed the usual practice he would not come under the section ?—I think he would.

3433. He would have the books which are proper and usual in his business ?—I say he would, because the interpretation which the judges put upon that is a very wide interpretation as regards the words which follow so as "sufficiently to disclose his business transactions." That is one thing they have said, and they define it again and they say this, so as "sufficiently to disclose his financial position."

3434. But if he puts the usual information in the usual form so that a perfect record is kept of all transactions, is not that doing all that is usual and proper to enable a record to be kept of his financial position ?—Yes, I think it is, but it is not usually considered so.

3435. Have not the judges held that a merely supposed insufficiency in the books is not enough under this section unless you can show that he has not followed the usual practice ?—Yes; and I think that in times of great trouble when the markets are greatly agitated, it would be impossible for a merchant to keep his books quite up to the last year, and it is in times of great trouble that these things occur.

3436. What I suggest to you is that the Act does not require a man to do more than what is reasonable and proper in the way of bookkeeping, but you say that it does ?—I am afraid that the fact of the judges not thoroughly understanding the commercial aspect of bookkeeping has led them to put a strained construction upon it, and a construction different to what you would put upon it.

3437. Can you mention any specific cases ?—I think I can send you some, but I cannot from memory.

3438. I should be obliged if you would, because I should like to look into the matter ?—Yes. I will give one illustration which occurs to me at the moment. The debtors had an agent and they could not get from him any details of what they had done and that prevented them from writing up their books for a year.

3439–40. And do you say that a man would be liable under the clause for that ?—Yes, in the case I am speaking of, the certificate was refused on that very ground.

3441. (Chairman.) They were West Indian people, I believe ?—Yes, they were, and they were refused on that ground. A man who was a barrister had had their power of attorney. He had been getting money and shipping goods for them, and advancing money on goods. We could not get, and have not got to this day, five years after, any detailed particulars from him. He became aware of particular people getting into difficulties and he withheld all particulars.

3442. (Mr. Smith.) And the judge held that he had not kept proper books ?—Yes.

3443. Was not there other evidence ?—No, the other partner, who was in New York, came from New York afterwards, and he got through.

3444. When did that case take place ?—About two years ago.

3445. (Chairman.) Yes, I was in it.

3446. (Mr. Smith.) If that view is correct I should change my opinion very much about the Bankruptcy Act ?—I think you will find that the Bankruptcy Act has been construed in a way that perhaps you are not aware of as regards its effect upon people.

3447. I had up to two years ago a good deal of experience of the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes, but I think, if you look into it, you will find that generally lawyers are very strongly in favour of keeping it out of bankruptcy for different reasons.

3448. You suggested that the majority of creditors should have the power of granting releases; is that without reference to the debtor's conduct ?—I think he should have his discharge so as to be free to go and trade again, and that all questions of his conduct should be dealt with in the way I have indicated.

3449. I understand that you would recommend fines ?—Yes, I think it is improper in the interest of society to withhold from a man his power of earning a livelihood.

3450. Out of what fund would you suggest the fine should be paid ?—Out of the man's future earnings. Supposing you called him into court and gave him a strong judgment, rebuking him for his conduct, and you said that under the circumstances of his case you would fine him £500. Supposing a man is a professional man, he goes away and gets that £500 within a certain time. The judge says that the man, being a bankrupt, has nothing to pay with, but he says he will require that fine to be paid according to what he thinks is the probable ability of the man. He may say "you must pay £100 this year and £100 next," and so on, "and if you do not you will go to prison." There would be the liability to imprisonment, so that it would be a thing which would touch his family and everybody, but I should recommend his discharge.

21 Nov. 1906.

3451. You would say that he should be liable for a certain amount ?—Yes, have a fine fixed.

3452. And he should be imprisoned if he does not pay ?—Yes.

3453. That is an effective suggestion, no doubt, if it is carried out, but have not the courts power at present to make him liable for a certain amount of his debts ?—They have power to do that, but it is found that it does not work properly.

3454. They have the power ?—They have the power to make an order, but they have not the power to make it criminal. I want this to be a fine as distinguished from a judgment.

3455. May I take it that what the Law Society recommends is that the money penalty should be coupled with imprisonment ?—I have not discussed the exact detail, but it should be a monetary or other punishment which marks, as I say, with signal disgrace the person on whom it is inflicted. If the punishment is not imprisonment then something equivalent to it. If I may say so the lecture should be given, not by a mere official receiver but by some judge in an important position. Anything of that kind coming from a judge of the High Court giving judgment upon his conduct would do very much.

3456. Would you limit those orders entirely to judges in the High Court ?—Yes. Of course I would give judges in the county courts the same power.

3457. But you would not delegate it to the registrar ?—No.

3458. I agree with you there ?—No certainly not.

3459. Well, I think that is a very important suggestion. It has been suggested that a complete list of undischarged bankrupts should be published in the London Gazette ?—Yes.

3460. That, I think you said, should be done assuming the present system continued ?—Yes.

3461. That would require a very large amount of space ?—I do not know.

3462. And would mean a very large expense ?—I do not think that the expenditure is very large.

3463. Have you any estimate of the number of undischarged bankrupts that there are ?—I should say there is something like, at the present moment, a couple of hundred thousand.

3464. Do you think that a return of that sort would be valuable ?—I do.

3465. It has frequently been suggested to the Board of Trade ?—Yes, I think it would be valuable.

3466. Of course you recognise that it would only be a formal return—that is to say, it would have to be made up from the actual tables published during the year. It would not be possible to follow out the history of every bankrupt ?—No, that could not be done.

3467. It would merely take the form of statistical tables showing the names of the persons ?—Yes.

3468. Do you think that that would be of importance to the commercial community ?—I think it would be of great use.

3469. Do not you think they might go to the trouble of doing it themselves ?—You do not know how difficult it is to find out accurate information with regard to the bankrupts.

3470. But the returns are absolutely complete ?—They are complete, I quite understand. There is nothing there which could not be found out, but there is a difficulty in finding out.

3471. It is like the balancing of a book ?—If I know I have got a gazette I have only to look at it on the 24th December, 1906, to find all the information up to that date. When the 24th December, 1907, comes, I have then only to look at the Gazette for that date to find what I want. No doubt creditors do send to Stubbs and people of that kind and ask them for information. I have to send for that sort of information every week in connection with the insurance office that I represent. We send and inquire about people and I get back this answer, generally: "Brown, bankrupt so and so"; you get no further than that.

3472. "No discharge granted." You would get that, would not you ?—No.

3473. That can be got from the Gazette ?—Yes.

3474. What I am suggesting is that the traders if they are anxious for such information could instruct someone—an accountant or someone else—to take it up ?—They could, but there is no trade publication enterprising enough to do that. They have to get their information from all parts of the kingdom.

3476. Then upon Section 122 you say that that has been "more satisfactory and much less expensive than in the case of assets administered summarily" ?—Yes.

3477. What evidence have you of that ?—That I could give you.

3478. What basis of comparison is there for that ? Is there any basis of comparison between estates administered under the one system and estates administered under the other ?—I am not responsible for that particular paragraph but I think we have the evidence.

3479. You have not gone into this question ?—No, not personally.

3480. I wanted simply to point out as far as I can see there is no analogy between them for this reason that Section 121 deals with the realisation of all bankrupts' estates, whereas Section 122 deals with the future earnings of the bankrupt. They are entirely different things ?—Quite.

3481. A county court judge makes an order for the man to pay so much and if the man does not pay it he goes to prison. There is very little expense about that, but the expense of realising small estates must be very large indeed—I mean the percentage must be very large ?—I should not like to put my experience against yours. I have so often discussed this with men in the country—bankruptcy people, such as registrars and others—and they have never seen any difficulty.

3482. I will take your answer generally ?—I am thinking of men like the Birmingham official receiver. On that point there is one thing I did wish to say, and that is that we do very much wish that the official receivers who are to conduct the examinations of debtors should be professional men. It is a great complaint which is made by the community that names of people are dragged in and brought forward during an examination who have nothing to do with the bankrupt save and except the unfortunate fact that they have had business transactions with him. Unfortunately, official receivers—I hope you will not think that I have any particular man in my view, but I think they are fair subjects for criticism—have not a professional education, especially in the country. I am dealing with a man who was a long time in Birmingham, and who is now at Worcester. That man was a clerk to a barrister and he had no professional education, and the way in which examinations have been sometimes conducted by official receivers—I do not wish to mark anyone in particular—both in London and elsewhere, the way they have dragged in names of wives, friends, traders and other persons has been very sad. A man who had had a professional training either at the Bar, or as a solicitor, would know instinctively how to get the information which was necessary without doing that amount of serious damage to perfectly innocent people.

3483. I am sure that the Board of Trade would be very much obliged to anyone who brought that matter before their attention by way of calling their notice to it as an abuse, but I am not aware of it myself ?—It is difficult to say that it is an "abuse," but you know there is a delicacy which is observed by a barrister when he is conducting a case which you do not find perhaps in anyone else. He is very careful even if the solicitor is very zealous and begs and prays him to ask certain questions. He says, "I have got my own sense of what is right and I shall not ask them." That attitude is brought about by the tradition which belongs to the Bar and the profession generally, and it is not observed in other people. They have not the same principles to guide them. To the honour of our English Bar, be it said, that it is one of the things remarked upon by foreigners, over and over again—the wonderful way in which they act upon those traditions. You sometimes get a young solicitor who in his zeal says he should like the barrister to ask certain questions and show somebody up who he thinks has had something to do with the matter. I know the sort of paragraphs that have gone into briefs, but to the honour of the Bar they are dealt with in a very proper way by the Bar. I say that the official receivers, on the other hand, get their facts in the lump with a great deal of difficulty, and they are not free from the temptation, especially in the country, of playing a little to the gallery.

3484. You know that the vast majority of Official Receivers are solicitors, do not you ?—I know they are, but I object to those that are not.

3485. And that not many have been appointed of recent years who are not solicitors ?—I thought there was one appointed the other day.

3486. Only transferred. You would not suggest that the appointment should be limited to barristers ?—I should be rather glad to see it limited to barristers myself, because I do respect distinctly the sense of tradition which they maintain.

3487. I quite understand your suggestions ?—I should rather like it to be confined to barristers, though many people would not life it. Some solicitors would like some of their own people no doubt, but I am against that. I would prefer barristers.

3488. I now come to the question of deeds of arrangement and the number of the majority. I suppose you would restore the liquidation clause of the 1869 Act ?—The 1869 Act I have said has worked extremely well, but for the fact of the abuses.

3489. You would be satisfied with Section 125 of the old Act ?—Yes. I think it might be made with precautions against abuse. I should avoid the abuse of touting.

3490. In connection with proxies ?—Proxies not altogether, but I should have stricter restrictions with regard to the quality of the men who were to be trustees. I should like the trustee to be a professional person.

3491. Would you put a restriction on the use of proxies ?—No, on the whole not. I do not think they would be abused again as they were in the old days.

3492. You admit that they were abused before ?—Oh certainly; they caused that Act to fail.

3493. You think they would not be now ?—No, I think the accountants are vastly improved, and there would not be the same opportunity now.

3494. Is that the only reason you can suggest for a change—that the accountants are improved ?—No, not the only one. I am afraid I could not give it to you all without looking up that section, because I have not got that section before me.

3495. I want it particularly ?—Do you mind my coming again about that ?

3496. Certainly, I should be very glad, or if you put anything in writing ?—Very well, if I may put it in writing.

3497. Anything that you cannot answer me now I should be only too glad if you will consider quietly and answer hereafter ?—I have not looked at Section 125 lately.

3498. What circumstances have occurred since the Bankruptcy Act was passed which would change the operation of Section 125 with regard to the public interest? —I could give you many things that have happened since.

3499. Then there was some reference to the delay in the appointment of a special manager ?—Yes.

3500. Would you be prepared to submit a list of any cases in which that has occurred which could be looked up ?—Yes, I think I could 3501. I should be glad if you would, because the Board of Trade have suffered from the generality of complaints of that kind without having their attention called to specific cases ?—I hope it will not go forth as a charge against any Official Receiver, because that I think would place me in a very painful position. I could give you that very case I have mentioned. We tried to get the Official Receiver to look at that case. The Official Receiver helped us as much as he could. He got some things. He telegraphed himself to people in the West Indies and tried to do all he could himself, and all honour to him for doing so, but we would have gone to work in a very different way if we had had appointed a person whom we could have felt we could have acted with and whom the bank would have granted credits to immediately.

3502. I should like to say that my experience of this Committee is that there has been absolutely no attempt whatever to cast any imputation upon the working of the Act, or upon any of the persons concerned in the working of it ?—I recognise that most fully.

3503. At the same time I am most desirous of getting at the actual facts, and I should like evidence which would shew that there had been unreasonable delay, and whether it would be possible by administrative action to secure that that should not occur ?—I do not think that these men by their education are fit for the position that they occupy. When I say "education," of course I am not referring to their not being public school men, but I mean educated ad hoc.

3504. What I would like would be evidence of defects in the administration of the Act, or defects in the Act itself, which have inconvenienced the commercial community in causing delays in the appointment of a special manager ?—Let me explain what it is. There is a timidity necessarily about people.

3505. I do not admit the timidity. I think our officers have acquired such experience that they have not any timidity at all. At one time some of them were timid and some of them rash.

3506. (Chairman.) That is a point of difference between you ?

3507. (Witness.) Yes, we shall not agree upon that, but I want to say that I desire to meet you on that point.

3508. (Mr. Smith.) With regard to the suggestion about affidavits with regard to debts, does the Law Society really press that ?—Yes, most distinctly—it is a matter which irritates our clients beyond anything.

3509. The making of an affidavit ?—Yes, just look at the trouble it occasions. It has got to be made by somebody who knows all about it, and it is a very irritating thing for a merchant to feel that he has to go out of his office, or send out his principal clerk, for the purpose of making an affidavit about a debt. It is so utterly useless where a man has got it in his own books. I understand, of course, where there is the slightest hesitation, or if, when you came to look into it, it appears from the man's account that you do not know about some item, that the making of an affidavit might be necessary because you might want to cross-examine him upon it. However people so often say: "why is it with a company we never have all this trouble. A company fails and we never have this trouble. Now, we have to go and make an affidavit about a paltry debt." A little while ago a client of mine had to go and make an affidavit about £13. He was perfectly angry about it. Why should he make an affidavit for £13 ? The accountant had got the very sum down, and the receiver himself had balanced the sheet including that £13 knowing it was a perfectly good sum. It is no protection if the books are at all well kept.

3510. I suppose this paragraph refers to and includes the first meeting of creditors ?—Yes.

3511. How are you going to determine the claims of creditors to prove ? Are you to take their own word for it ? —Yes, and it is very rarely put wrongly.

3512. That would include all sorts of persons. You have referred to the honest merchant who would make an honest statement, but there would be a great many people who would not be disposed to make an honest statement ? —Before the first meeting it is difficult for them to get it out, but they get an approximate list of the debts out.

3513. Suppose the official receiver gets out a list of debts and some one comes in and puts in a claim which is not in that list ?—There is always somebody who represents him and who says : " here is a claim for £500 but according to the bankrupt's statement he only owes you £300, therefore I shall not permit it to rank for more than £300."

21 Nov. 1906.

3514. Would his judgment be final ?—No.

3515. Would you allow an appeal ?—For the purpose of the day ; for the purposes of ultimately adjusting the dividend he could call for any evidence he liked, but I should make it final for the day.

3516. Would you make the bankrupt's evidence conclusive as to the amount of the debt ; supposing the creditor and the bankrupt were in collusion ?—If they were found to be in collusion it would not be difficult to hit him under our existing law and punish him severely.

3517. How ?—Because he is in collusion to deceive, and therefore under the common law he is liable.

3518. Is it not difficult to prove it ?—No, very easy to prove that. I do not think you will generally find a collusion. There might be one or two cases ; but one has got to deal with the law on broad lines.

3519. We have heard from chartered accountants that under the 1869 Act there were constant cases of the debtors' relatives manufacturing claims in order to control the proceedings under the old Act ?—I daresay there were some things done under the Act of 1869—there were not so many as we are told—but there were one or two marked men who were well known to the Registrars. They did not pay much attention to them, but you will not find in practice any difficulty exists. We have the same thing in the Chancery Division. If I take out a suit for the administration of an estate the Court will pay attention to my nominee. There should always be discretion in the Court. If the man appointed is the wrong man they will very soon find it out. No man should be appointed to any position without giving security.

3520. And you would not make the appointment of trustee a matter for voting by creditors ?—No, I would assimilate the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy to the practice of the Court of Chancery.

3521. With regard to the List of Bankrupts in the Gazette you would not propose that that should be repeated year after year but only the undischarged bankrupts of the year ?—I think it might be repeated year after year.

3522. But might I say that there are 70,000 at least undischarged ?—I thought there were more.

3523. Is it quite fair to keep bringing them forward year by year ?—Perhaps not.

3524. Many may be dead—how are you to tell ?—Yes.

3525. In the first place there is the expense ?—Yes.

3526. And in the next place I should have suggested that at the outside you should only put in each year the bankruptcies of the year if you do it at all ?—I can not say very much about that. May I just say this, that that is not anything which emanated from me. It emanated from members of my council, and I do not want to give them away.

3527. Perhaps you will just allow me to put one question in connection with that. The Board of Trade have very great difficulty in dealing with undischarged estates—unclosed estates ?—Yes.

3528. There is no power to close an estate—do you think that that power might be given within reasonable time as regards all estates ?—Yes ; but it cannot be fixed by a hard and fast time because there may be estates and estates. Take a case which I had where a man traded in London, New York and Demarara. He was made bankrupt in the Transvaal, and the Transvaal claims against the estate have to be administered by he court.

3529. That is a special case ?—That is a special case ; but as a general rule there should be an attempt to close the estate within a certain period. You cannot fix that it should be this year, or that year—one year or two years—because the magnitude of the bankruptcy must affect it in some cases.

3530. In the case of undischarged bankrupts there would be many cases, and they would be constantly increasing in number were you never to take them off the list, and they would go on for ever ?—I would close those.

3531. Unless something of that sort was done you would not be able to keep down the list ?—I quite agree.

3532. I should be much obliged if you would give us any particulars to illustrate any of those cases by specific instances which the Board of Trade might look into ?—Yes ; I will do that.

NINETEENTH DAY.

MR. ALGERNON OSMOND MILES, called ; and Examined.

Mr. Algernon O. Miles.
28 Nov. 1906.

3533. (Chairman.) You are, as we all know, an accountant, and I think that the views that you are going to present to us are those of the Institute of Chartered Accountants ?—They are.

3534. I think you have had a very large experience in the administration of all kinds of insolvencies personally ?—That is so in a particular trade.

3535. Have you had more experience with one particular trade than another ?—Yes, that is so.

3536. Which one is that ?—The Manchester trade.

3537. And I suppose your experience is equally large in deeds of assignment as it is in bankruptcy ?—It is so.

3538. The Committee do not propose to waste your time by going into all the matters which are contained in the reply of the institute. We will take the liberty of taking that as read ?—Yes.

3539. But what we were going to do was to ask you to perhaps supplement that by kindly giving us a little information in answer to questions which the Committee put to you ?—With pleasure. I would only like to say that any answers which are not contained in this document would not be on behalf of the institute but would be on behalf of myself. I mean that some questions might be asked which may not be covered by these answers.

3540. Quite so. I see that the institute suggest that some additional punishment should be in the power of the Court. Would you apply to that any of what we call bankruptcy offences except the not keeping of proper books, and trading with a knowledge of insolvency ?—I think the Court should take into consideration some punishment other than the mere withholding of the discharge for such offences, because it is obvious that the mere withholding of the discharge is practically no punishment at all.

3541. I daresay you are aware that there always has been a great disinclination by the judicial authorities to inflict any such punishment even if they have the power to do so ?—Yes.

3542. But I suppose you would give them the discretion to inflict it ?—Yes, I think that the Registrar in the Bankruptcy Court should have the discretion to punish a debtor for certain offences, such as the non-keeping of books and trading after knowledge that he is insolvent, or in regard to any of the other offences prescribed by the Act.

3543. Then I suppose you would confine it to bad cases. I mean there must be many cases in which the failure to keep proper books is due to ignorance or incapacity ?—That is so, it must be the non-keeping of books with intent to defraud and delay creditors.

3544. I see that it is suggested that some such obligation as the compelling of an undischarged debtor to account every year to the trustee should be enforced. Have you worked out in your mind at all how that could be done, I mean having regard to the fact that the debtor usually goes away, if he is a bad one ?—Automatically at the time of the public examination notice might be given that the discharge will be considered on a certain date.

3545. You are in favour of that ?—Certainly, I think the conduct and the question of the discharge should come up automatically.

3546. On a day to be fixed by the Registrar ?—Yes.

3547. And then, I suppose in regard to accounts you would work it out that if a debtor did not, as you suggest, account as to his income and position that that would be a contempt of Court and he should be brought before the Court as in any other offence of the kind ?—I think so. If the Act prescribes that the debtor shall give particulars of his after-acquired property and he declines to do so I should take that as contempt of Court.

3548. Might I ask in regard to Answer No. 2 as to the discharge and the creditors having a say in the matter, whether you would make that concurrent with the powers of the Court or make the resolution of the creditors in favour of a discharge binding on the Court ?—I would not make it binding on the Court. The object of that is to give the Registrar the general opinion of the creditors upon the subject coupled with the report of the Official Receiver. It is obvious that the difficulty in getting creditors to attend on a discharge is very great, but if you have a meeting called automatically at the close of the bankruptcy and the creditors then consider the question of the discharge and the terms on which they think it should be granted, the Court might confirm it or refuse it, as the case might be, but I would leave it in the hands of the Court.

3549. Now then going to Question 4 the only question that I, individually, have to ask you about, and that I would desire a little elucidation upon, would be whether the person claiming to be a creditor should be compelled to prove his debt within twenty-eight days of receiving notice from the trustee. I want to ask you about a secured creditor who thinks his security is so valuable that he need not prove, but whose security becomes diminished in value. I mean many a specially secured creditor will not prove if he thinks the assets are very small when the assets come in ?—I think he has the right of amending his proof in the event of the estate not being realised, but of course he would be responsible for the proof at the date he sends it in, but if there are any assets left he might have the right of amending.

3550. Then in Question 5 about admitting both new and old creditors to prove, would you confine that to the after-acquired property, or to a sort of mixed fund consisting of the existing assets and the after-acquired assets. I do not know whether I have made my meaning clear ?—You mean if the first bankruptcy has not been closed ? Mr. Algernon O. Miles. 28 Nov. 1906.

3551. Yes ?—No, I do not think I should. I think that the after-acquired property should be divisible.

3552. Would you extend that to after-acquired property which devolves as by will ?—You mean which has not been disclosed in the original statement of affairs ?

3553. Yes ?—I think that should belong to the original creditors.

3555. As regards married women, if a married woman became bankrupt would you give the Court power to apply her separate estate restrained from anticipation in payment of her debts ? As regards most married women of position their income is restrained from anticipation. If a married woman brings an action the Court has power to make her separate estate liable for the costs, and I did not know whether you thought that if she went into trade and became bankrupt it should be in the power of the Court to apply her separate estate to pay her debt ?—Personally I think if a married woman incurs debts her estate, whatever it is, should be liable for them.

3556. As far as I am concerned I do not wish to trouble you with any questions until we come to paragraph 9. This is rather a question which seems to be growing in importance. I see that the institute are in favour of the assignment of book debts and hiring agreements being registered. Would you apply that to the assignment of particular book debts or only to a sort of general assignment of book debts ?—If there is a specific assignment of debts by a trader I think that should be registered as in several instances it practically includes the whole of his assets or the whole of her assets as the case may be. I think that should be registered.

3558. As regards hiring agreements I see the institute think that they should be registered; do you see practical difficulties in the way of it ?—No, I do not see any difficulty in the way of registering a hiring agreement. It is registering the fact that the property does not belong to the debtor although it is in his apparent order and disposition.

3559. It has been suggested by witnesses here that it is unnecessary because no one would give credit to the owner, say, of certain machinery because every one knows that the machinery is hired. Have you considered that at all ?—I am not aware that everybody looks upon machinery as being hired. If you take a Yorkshire mill you are not supposed to know that the machinery inside of it is hired. If a man sees that a mill is full of machinery he is not supposed to know that it is hired; there is no record of the fact. Therefore I think it is very important in a case like that that if it is on hire it should be registered.

3560. Then I suppose your reference to a mortgage covering plant and machinery would apply to a mortgage in which the machinery and trade fixtures pass without any mention of them as part of the freehold ?—Yes, that refers chiefly to fixed plant in a mill such as a woollen mill. That should certainly be registered.

3561. As far as I am concerned that is all I need trouble you with.

Mr. Algernon O. Miles.

28 Nov. 1906.

3562. (Mr. Smith.) It is suggested under Question 1 that the Court should have power to administer such punishment as Parliament may prescribe. I suppose that would include imprisonment?—Yes.

3563. And it is further suggested that punishment shoul be administered by the Court having bankruptcy jurisdiction with a right of appeal to the Judge in Bankruptcy. Would you give the right to administer punishment to the Registrars of the County Courts?—Yes, with a right of appeal to the Judge.

3564. To the Judge of the County Court?—Yes.

3565. And not to the Chief Judge?—To the Judge.

3566. In bankruptcy there is a technical term, is there not, "Chief Judge in Bankruptcy"?

3567. (Chairman.) Not now.

3568. (Mr. Smith.) You mean to the County Court Judge?—It is a question whether there should be a further appeal to the Judge in Bankruptcy—to the Judge of the High Court.

3569. Of course in London the appeal would be direct to the Judge in Bankruptcy?—Yes.

3570. On what ground would you give an appeal, on the ground of fact or of discretion or both?—Not fact, I think, as the facts would be before the Registrar. I would give an appeal if the punishment was considered too severe a one. When I say "imprisonment" I mean a very short term—something to show that the debtor has done something which he should not have done.

3571. What term would you suggest as the maximum?—I should not certainly in any case have it for longer than a month.

3572. Do you think that it is desirable then to give an appeal in every case to the Judge in Bankruptcy? It might involve a very large amount of work for the Bankruptcy Judge in a comparatively trifling matter, so far as, putting aside the imprisonment of the subject, it could be regarded as a trifling matter?—That would be always at the expense of the debtor.

3573. I do not see how it could be at the expense of the debtor. He could not pay because he has no estate?—But they always have friends.

3574. But have the council considered the difficulty first, of giving an appeal in a matter which is within the discretion of the Court, and, secondly, the enormous number of cases which would almost certainly be brought before a Judge in such circumstances?—Personally I should be quite satisfied with an appeal to the County Court Judge.

3575. And in London?—No appeal other than to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

3576. Then on the second question you gave an answer to the Chairman—I did not quite catch it—about leaving some discretion to the Court. I see here in the answer to the question it is stated that the creditors interested should have the right to decide the question of discharge. Am I to understand from that the creditors are to have an absolute veto on discharge?—No, that is not so. I said that the creditors ought to have the right of meeting and stating on what terms they would grant the discharge, and those terms would come up for consideration by the Court and either be confirmed or refused in the discretion of the Court.

3577. But the phrase occurs at the end of the paragraph, "under no circumstances shall a discharge be granted unless such resolution be passed"?—I do not think it should. I do not think that the debtors should have a discharge unless the creditors have passed some resolution upon it which would be done automatically, possibly at the general meeting, or at one convened immediately after.

3578. But that is merely as a matter of procedure, of time, and the order of events. If they passed a resolution they might refuse the discharge and say he should not be granted a discharge?—Except upon terms.

3579. Would you then give the Court power to overrule that decision and to grant discharge?—No, but I think the creditors ought to be compelled to state on what terms they would grant a discharge.

3580. But can you compel them?—I suppose you can do anything by an Act of Parliament.

3581. Supposing a majority of creditors persistently refused to grant a discharge to any debtor on any terms whatever, would you give the Court power to over-rule that?—I do not think so; I do not see why it should.

3582. At present you know the discretion is vested in the Court?—I admit that.

3583. Which considers all the facts and circumstances?—That is so.

3584. But a vindictive creditor, for instance, might in the case of a bankruptcy which had been caused by misfortune refuse to assent to a discharge under such circumstances, perhaps with a view of squeezing his friends, or perhaps with a view of penalising the debtor. Do you think that that would be right?—You are not likely to get three-fourths of the creditors vindictive.

3585. I do not think you define it in the resolution—what majority do you propose?—I should think a majority in number and three-fourths in value.

3586. I have seen many cases where the voting power has been in the hands of a single creditor?—Personally, I should be in favour of the majority in value.

3587. And would you give him absolute power to refuse the discharge whatever the conduct of the debtor might have been?—I think so.

3588. Is that the view of your council, or do you put that forward on your own account?—I must put that forward as my own view—I do not know that that has been considered.

3589. Then it is said that it is well known that unless there are assets of the estate the Official Receivers will take no action—I should like to know what that refers to?—They can take no action because there are no assets in the estate to enable them to do so unless the creditors subscribe.

3590. Take what kind of action—investigation?—Action against the debtor in the event of his having done that which is considered wrong. They can take no action.

3591. They can investigate his conduct?—Yes.

3592. And they can report upon it?—Yes.

3593. And they can apply for an order to prosecute in case of fraud?—Yes.

3594. That is not the class of action that is referred to—what is the class of action?—For instance if a debtor has purchased £3,000 or £4,000 worth of goods within a fortnight of his bankruptcy and there is no record of them, you can take no action.

3595. Except that of reporting the fact?—I say you can take no action. There are no assets. There have been several cases before me where a debtor has purchased a large amount of goods just prior to his bankruptcy. You know perfectly well that he has not sold them, but there is no trace of them, and unless there are some assets naturally no steps are taken.

3596. But you would not suggest that the Official Receiver—the Official Receiver is mentioned here—does not take all the steps that are open to him to investigate the facts of the case and to report them?—I think it should be the Official Receiver or the trustee.

3597. But you would not suggest that either of them neglect to take steps within their power for the purposes of investigating?—No, I would not.

3598. Of course if they investigate and find evidence which would justify a prosecution they would take such action?—Certainly.

3599. I did not quite gather the meaning of the paragraph, and I thought I would make it a little clearer perhaps. I pass by the last paragraph in that answer. Of course, I do not know what evidence the council had before them or on what grounds they came to the opinion that the Act, from the point of view of general benefit to the commercial morality of the country is an absolute failure. You cannot give us the grounds on which they have come to that conclusion ?—Except that there is no adequate punishment under the Act. Dishonest and honest bankrupts are practically tarred with the same brush under the Act. If a bankrupt does not pay a dividend of 10s. automatically he cannot get a discharge within two years. It may be that the estate of the honest trader who fails with 15s. in the £ on paper does not pay 10s., but he is tarred with the same brush as the dishonest trader who fails with no assets at all.

3600. Yes, but this is a general statement that the commercial morality of the country has not benefited by the Act ?—I think the view of the council is that. It is coupled in that answer that there is no adequate punishment under the Act. I think that must be taken in conjunction with the answer to No. 1.

3601. Do you suggest that the Act has not had an effect in diminishing the amount of bankruptcies ?—I cannot say. As a method of administration I consider it most efficient and simple, but as a method of punishing the debtor I think it a failure.

3602. I quite understand if it is limited to that, but it was the generality of the expression which I wanted to get qualified ?—I think you must take it that it is limited to that.

3603. You would not say for example that the publicity and the thoroughness of the investigation in Court—which I think is generally admitted—have not had a deterrent effect especially in cases of large commercial failures ?—I have no evidence on that. That may or may not be the case, but the answer to this is that if there were more punishments provided by the Act——

3604. It would be more efficient ?—Yes

3605. Then I will take that answer. With regard to Question No. 4 you say that in no case should any Official Receiver or trustee sell any assets unless of a perishable character. Have you any ground of complaint as to the administration of the Act on that point ?—None, because it is the practice of the Official Receivers in London always to consult the principal creditors. I have no ground of complaint.

3606. Have you any evidence that that is not the case in the country ?—I have no evidence because they have no power to sell. If they had power to sell the trade which I have the honour to represent would not know what would happen.

3607. Again it is a question of understanding what the paragraph refers to. It says, "In no case should any Official Receiver or trustee sell any assets." That does not imply that at present they are in the habit of doing so ?—No, we are asked a question and we give an answer.

3608. And so you do not suggest that there is any necessity for legislation on this point ?—None whatever. If you like to take another answer we say the existing provisions are adequate.

3609. (Mr. Smith.) I do not know whether the Committee would care for me to read to the Witness the instructions of the Board of Trade on this question to Official Receivers in bankruptcy, and to put to the Witness whether he approves of them.

3610. (Chairman.) I do not think there would be any objection.

3611. (Mr. Smith.) The extracts will be very short. "(149) The Official Receiver, acting only as such, prior to adjudication, has no power to realise any other than perishable goods. These should be realised by him without delay, and if he is in doubt as to whether the goods are perishable or not, he should apply to the Court (in Chambers) for authority to sell, giving notice to the debtor and to the solicitor of the petitioning creditor (if any) of the intended application." Then 150, "As soon as an order of adjudication is made, the property of the debtor vests in the official receiver as trustee until a trustee is appointed by the creditors, and although the case may not be a summary one, the official receiver has the full powers of a trustee and may proceed to realise the estate subject to the provisions of Sections 56 and 57. But although the Official Receiver possesses these powers it will generally be found desirable in non-summary cases that he should abstain from dealing with the estate until after the first meeting, when, as a rule, the responsibility will pass to a trustee elected by the creditors. In special cases, however, it may be desirable to proceed with the realisation or partial realisation of the estate, with the view of protecting the real interests of the creditors, e.g., where stock can be advantageously realised by retail, or where heavy costs are being incurred which could be avoided by immediate realisation, or where a distraint is imminent or property is deteriorating, or where it is impossible to avoid a long delay in the appointment and confirmation of a trustee or where immediate realisation is found to be desired by the principal creditors, whom, as a rule, it will be found useful to consult by summoning them to an informal meeting. It is impossible to lay down definite rules applicable to this matter as the circumstances of each case differ materially. But the Official Receiver's action should be determined by what is substantially best for the interests of the creditors, and most in accordance with their wishes." Would that meet with your approval ?—I have no objection to that and as a matter of fact it is carried out.

Mr. Algernon O Miles.
28 Nov. 1906.

3612. I thought that the Committee might like to know what the practice was. What was the object of the recommendation under Answer 4 that any person claiming to be a creditor should be compelled to prove his debt within twenty-eight days of receiving notice from the trustee ?—The object of it is this, sometimes one has often to keep an estate so long open. A man is returned in the statement of affairs and he will not prove. It is a fact that we can advertise to get in anybody's claim, but a trustee naturally does not like to divide the estate until the creditor claiming has proved. There is nothing to compel a man to prove within twenty-eight days.

3613. Except that he is excluded from a dividend if there is a dividend—is not that sufficient ?—Personally I think it is.

3614. Do not you think that cases may occur where it would be very difficult for a creditor to prove within twenty-eight days ?—I think so.

3615. With regard to the disclaimer clause, I quite agree with the recommendation of the Committee that the trustee should not, if possible, be responsible for onerous contracts, but how are you going to avoid that ? The property vests in him and the obligation vests in him ? Yes, I see great difficulties in the way of that.

3616. Do you go the length of saying that real property should not vest in the trustee ?—I think that is more a legal question. I think it would be better if the property could vest in the trustee without the onerous contracts, inasmuch as he is a trustee in the interests of the creditors and not in the interests of the debtor. It is rather hard lines that he should bear the burden of the whole of the debtor's contracts.

3617. I take it that you suggest that the present practice is not satisfactory, and that it is the duty of the lawyers to find a way out of it ?—I do not think it is impossible.

3618. The council have not made any practical suggestion by which the trustee could be relieved ?—Yes, the property is vested in the trustee, but as he is a trustee for the creditors I think it should be his and that he should not be responsible for contracts. He is not a trustee for the debtor, he is a trustee on behalf of the creditors.

3619. I suppose you would include the Official Receiver when he acts as trustee ?—Certainly.

3620. In whom, at present, the responsibility vests, when the trustee is released. I am sure that the Board of Trade would be much obliged to you if you could bring about that reform, as nothing has given more trouble. Have you considered, if your suggestion under 5 is carried out, giving the old and new creditors a right to prove how that could best be carried out. Would you give the trustee in the first bankruptcy the right to prove in the second for the whole body of creditors ?—That might be done—that is only a detail. There would be no harm in that.

Mr. Algernon O. Miles.

3621. You have not considered it?—No, I have not considered it, but I see no harm in that suggestion. He is the trustee for and on behalf of the creditors and I see no reason why he should not prove on their behalf.

3622. With regard to paragraph 8 relating to deeds of arrangement, is this the chief objection of the council to any official supervision over deeds of arrangement—the delay and expense it would cause?—I think apparently that is their answer.

3623. Have you considered what the expenses would necessarily be of auditing the accounts of the trustee?—No, that has not been considered, but there are other questions on this beyond audits, are not there?

3624. Yes, I will not trouble you with any further question.

3625. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I have nothing to ask.

3626. (Mr. Addison.) Undischarged bankrupts: Have you found in your experience that the fact of there being undischarged bankrupts is undesirable in commercial interests?—I think it is because they start in business under their wife's name or somebody else's name.

3627. Have you come across cases in which they have become partners in firms or entered into business relations which have occasioned subsequent trouble when the want of discharge has been discovered?—I have not had any instance where they have gone into partnership with anyone else.

3628. Have you had in your experience cases where the dormant title of the trustee under the first bankruptcy attaching to after acquired goods and assets has operated unfairly to the subsequent creditors?—Yes.

3629. Frequently?—Oh no, not frequently.

3630. But I understand your view would be that subsequent assets—that is assets the title to which had not accrued at the first bankruptcy—should be applicable to subsequent creditors as well as the creditors under the bankruptcy?—Just so.

3631-2. I want, as to the realisation of property, to ask you whether from your experience you think it would be well that there should be in cases of a bankruptcy petition authority resident in the Court with consent of creditors or some other sufficient safeguard to realise certain classes of property in case of need, for instance where there is the goodwill of a business to be saved or possibly commercial contracts which require prompt dealing with which could not be sold under the present system because they are not perishable goods?—I have no objection to that. With the consent of creditors I think it would be a very right and proper provision.

3633. My impression is, in certain mercantile cases, that injury happens to the estate, or portions of it, because it cannot be efficiently dealt with at an early stage?—If some majority of the creditors—say a majority in value—with the consent of the Court approve of it ——

3634. With some safeguard of that kind you think that the provision might be useful in certain cases?—Certainly.

3635. I see the council report that debtors who are married women should be amenable to be made bankrupt whether they are in trade or not. Is that a resolution in favour of trading creditors or has the council considered the interests of society in general on the point?—I do not quite know what was in the minds of the council, but I should imagine that they had in view the interests of the creditors.

3636. They have not considered what would be the effect of such a provision if their wives incurred debts and became liable under the Bankruptcy Act?—Personally I have a very strong feeling about it. I think if a woman orders expensive clothes she ought to pay for them if she has a private estate.

3637. But supposing she has not. Take the wife of any one of us—I should not like to suppose that it would be so in fact—and suppose that your wife or my wife or the wife of any one of us incurred heavy obligations to some tradesmen. Does it not occur to you that that might put the husband in a fearful position?—Yes, but she ought not to do it.

3638. I agree, but ought she to be trusted? Is not there another question, namely this: Ought a married woman to be trusted to that extent?—Of course you can put provisions in to get the authority of the husband.

3639. I think I must be content with your first answer, that what I may call the social aspect of that resolution has not been considered?—I am not sure upon that point.

3640. I mean its possible effect on family life. I should think that the chances are that it may not have been considered from that point of view. It has been considered from the creditors' point of view probably?—I should imagine so.

3641. And do you know whether they took into consideration whether traders would not be encouraged to give credit to married women by such a provision?—That probably has not been considered. We probably considered the question and the answer.

3642. You yourself would consider with a clause like that, that an extravagant wife might be able to involve her husband in a very serious position?—Yes, I quite see your point, but at the same time I do not think that a woman ought to be extravagant if she has not got the means to be so.

3643. We are agreed on that. Then there is another point we want carefully to elucidate here—the assignment of book debts. You have had, I know, a wide experience. Do you frequently come across assignments of book debts?—Not frequently, but we have come across cases of assignments of book debts.

3644. May I ask you to look back during the last six years and tell me how many cases you can recollect within that period?—I cannot recollect them offhand.

3645. But you think there have been some during the past six years?—Oh, yes.

3646. Do you know in what class of trade that has occurred?—It has generally been in the dressmaking or drapery trades.

3647. Have those assignments been for money advanced or to secure a past debt?—I think in one or two instances they have been to secure a past debt and a further advance at the time the assignment was given.

3648. But they are not frequent?—No, that is my experience.

3649. And in the mercantile community, except perhaps amongst dressmakers, you do not find them—in London I mean?—Not as a rule.

3650. Has your experience brought before you cases in which the assignment of an instalment [or possibly of one or more large debts has taken place for money lent by a banker, and where it has been used to save a man or to enable him to get credit or to tide over a difficulty?—I have had examples and obviously we know that that is done.

3651. Then in such a case as that the registration of the assignment would frustrate the benefit which such a transaction was intended to confer?—I say that obviously that should be approached with very great caution. The question of book debts, I think, applies more to the general assignment of all debts.

3652. Did the Committee look at it at all from the point of view of the debtors of the particular tradesmen. For instance, you or I or anybody who might owe bills to our West End tradesman—should we like to see our names scheduled to a list filed in a public office?—I do not think we could object to it if we owed money.

3653. Do you think that the cases which have come before you have been so injurious to creditors and so numerous as to make a registration of that kind with its attendant expense worth while?—Personally I do not think so, because as a matter of fact in the cases that have come before us we have managed to defeat the assignment because we have got an act of bankruptcy before notice to the debtors has been given.

3654. Hiring agreements; this is a matter we have very carefully to enquire into. In your experience have you found any injustice done to creditors by reason of hiring agreements?—I have, but only by hearsay.

3655. Only by hearsay?—Yes, it comes from Yorkshire. There are very grave difficulties there as I explained just now in the case of mills.

3656. Do you think it is desirable we should take a note of hearsay evidence.

3657. (Chairman.) I think so. It shows that the matter is known to a gentleman of Mr. Miles' experience.

3658. (Mr. Addison.) Of course anything that Mr. Miles could tell us of his own knowledge we should place great weight upon.

3659. (Chairman.) I do not think we are restricted by rules of evidence here.

3660. (Mr. Addison.) I do not know if Mr. Miles has heard of specific cases and could give the details of them.

3661. (Witness.) I am sure the gentleman in question would present himself for examination if need be.

3662. (Mr. Addison.) I might ask this: within your knowledge hiring agreements are very common?—Not very common.

3663. The subject matters of which are furniture and pianos?—Yes. Do you mean that they have come before me personally.

3664. Yes?—I cannot say that they have come before me personally very frequently, but if you ask me whether I know of them from hearsay, I can answer that from hearsay I know they are very common, but I suppose I must not say that.

3665. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I do not think, Mr. Chairman, you will prevent us from listening to what Mr. Miles can tell us as the result of hearsay.

3666. (Chairman.) Anything that is hearsay is rather a question of what its value is. If Mr. Miles tells us that it has not come before him personally, but that he has heard a great deal of it, we can know how much importance to attach to that.

3667. (Mr. Addison.) As we are going into a little hearsay, I suppose it is pretty well common knowledge that a man may live in a furnished house?—Yes.

3668. Or that the furniture in the house may belong to his wife?—Yes.

3669. Or it may belong to his mother-in-law?—Yes.

3670. Would you think a prudent person would give credit to a man because he found him living in a well-furnished house, and assume that the furniture was his own?—I cannot say what anybody else would do.

3671. What should you do?—I do not think I should give credit to anybody unless I had some satisfactory reference.

3672. The fact that you found a man living in a well-furnished house would not be attractive to you as a security for your trade debt?—I think it might be the opposite, possibly.

3673. Thank you, I will not trouble you further.

3674. (Mr. Chamberlin.) But still a man who lives in a furnished house has to pay a proportionately higher rent for it?—That is so.

3675. (Mr. Peat.) I should like just to go back upon your earlier answer on the subject of books. Where a debtor has not kept proper books of account, you say he ought to be liable to punishment. Do you mean by proper books of account what we, as accountants, regards as proper books of account or do you mean, for instance, a cash book properly written up, stocktaking once a year, and a statement of assets and liabilities once a year?—I look upon a trader as a trustee for his creditors until he has discharged their debts. I do not mean special books the same as accountants might say would be necessary, but he certainly ought to keep an account of his receipts and his payments and the goods he has purchased and sold. The books should be kept in such a way as to enable him to prepare at stated periods a statement of his liabilities and assets, so that he may know whether he is trading after he is insolvent or not.

3676. With regard to trading with a knowledge of insolvency, that also is a subject which you suggest should be punishable if it is done. But supposing a man is insolvent to the extent of the difference between 19s. and 20s. in the £, is it your view that that man ought to be punished?—Entirely in the discretion of the Court. Personally I should put it at a specific amount, if the assets did not amount to a specified percentage of his liabilities.

3677. Would you say he was trading with a knowledge of insolvency when he ought to have known that he could not pay 10s. in the £?—Yes. I put it that his assets should amount to a specified percentage of his liabilities.

3678. The exact percentage you do not refer to, but you do not, for instance, suggest that because a man cannot pay more than 19s. 11d. he should be regarded as insolvent?—I do not. It is all a matter of degree.

3679. I would also take your answer on the subject of married women's settlements. That is a settlement as a rule by some person who is interested in the married woman, and that person, as a rule, makes a settlement so that the married woman may not anticipate her income and that it may be a means of subsistence for her in her future life—her after married life as a rule. Now did your answer imply that if a married woman with such a settlement became bankrupt, that the creditors could take the current income and the future income of such a settlement?—Such a settlement by somebody having an interest in the married woman would probably make the settlement void in the event of bankruptcy, but assuming there was nothing to that effect in it, I think she ought to be responsible for her debts.

3681. That is not the view of the council, or at least it is not so expressed?—No.

3683. Pardon me, as a rule a lease is taken of the mill and the machinery in it. The tenant has the mill, the power, and the machinery all from the same landlord Now would you think that every such lease ought to be registered as a hiring agreement?—If the lease includes machinery. It may not include the whole of the machinery in every instance, but where it does, I certainly should have it registered.

3684. In nearly every case of a mill it includes power; in many cases it includes machinery. Now in every such case, is it your view that that ought to be registered?—I consider that machinery, or anything else, that is found about a debtor's place, and which, apparently, on the face of it is his own property, though in fact it is not, ought to be registered.

3685. And does your answer also apply to wagons locomotives, and agricultural machinery? I ask you to remember that if such were the case a landlord could not very well let a farm with the machinery upon it, say the grinding machinery and the threshing machinery, without that being registered?—I do not see any very great objection to the registration of that class of machinery.

3686. I must take your answer, of course, from that point of view, but is that the view also of the council?—Their answer is given here, I take it. I do not know the ideas of the individual members of the council, but this resolution has been passed by the council.

Mr. Algernon O. Miles.

28 Nov. 1906.

3687. Now, is it your view, for instance, that the hiring of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" should be registered ?—It would not be of much value if it were sold.

3688. Or say "The Last Fifty Years of Punch" ?—I have not heard of that being on hire yet.

3689. Yes, you can purchase them by instalments, but you have possession of them without having paid the agreed sum ?—Yes, well, of course, you could limit the question of hiring agreements. You would not take in things of that sort. It is quite obvious you could limit the class of articles in respect of which hiring agreements would have to be registered.

3691. The Official Receivers having made the investigation, and having no assets, do you find that in such circumstances an action is readily brought—the Official Receiver having made an investigation and having discovered that there are matters of doubt arising upon some transaction of the debtor, the Official Receiver has reported the circumstances ? Do you find then that there is any anxiety to commence proceedings while there are no assets ?—On whose behalf anxiety.

3692. On behalf of the creditors ?—We have frequently had cases—perhaps I should say not frequently, but occasionally—we have had cases where the creditors have subscribed in order to prosecute the man.

3693. Why should the creditors subscribe ?—Because there are no assets.

3694. Because the Official Receiver will not do it ?—He cannot do it.

3695. Because he has no assets ?—Because he has no assets.

3696. The Official Receiver cannot take proceedings because there are no assets ?—Clearly.

3697. That is rather supplementing the answer that you gave to Mr. Smith ?—I think that "because he cannot" instead of that "he will not" will be the better answer of the two.

3698. Because there are no assets ?—It is impossible for him to take action where there are no assets.

3699. (Mr. Richardson.) In your first answer you say : "Some such obligation as the compelling of an undischarged debtor to account every year to the trustee" ; for how many years would you say ?—Unless the discharge comes up automatically as I mentioned just now, personally, I think it should go on until he does apply for his discharge. You have no knowledge as to what the bankrupt is doing, and there are a considerable number of them as to whom you have no knowledge whether the bankrupt acquires property after his bankruptcy or not. At present I should make him report himself until he gets his discharge.

3700. It is suggested that there should not be the number of undischarged bankrupts that there are. At the present time there are 70,000 of them. If what is suggested comes about the number of undischarged bankrupts will be very much limited ?—I should imagine so.

3701. If a man had to report what he had done during the year to an Official Receiver he would naturally get his discharge as soon as possible. Therefore no debtor would be undischarged for more than a couple of years ?—It depends on the terms of the discharge.

3702. This, I take it, would mean so long as he remains undischarged ?—This discharge might be suspended for two, three, four, five and six years.

3703. Then you say, "There are no means under the Act at present of ascertaining the acquisition by an undischarged bankrupt of after-acquired property." Can you suggest any means whereby that could be ascertained ?—The preceding clause would govern it on affidavit. He is to return his income supported by affidavit each year during the period at which he is undischarged.

3704. In cases of liquidation are you in favour of a majority in number and value binding the minority ?—What liquidation do you refer to ?

3705. (Chairman). Assignments to creditors ?—Do you mean in voluntary arrangements.

3706. (Mr. Richardson). Yes ?—I am not, because, as a matter of fact, it would no longer be a voluntary arrangement. If a majority binds the minority you cannot call it a voluntary arrangement and I do not think you should take away the right of the minority to make a man a bankrupt if they should so desire.

3708. You would permit one small creditor to upset what would be agreed to by the very large majority of creditors ?—It is obvious that if you altered it it could no longer be regarded as a voluntary arrangement and you would go back to the 1847 Act, which was not a success.

3709. Circumstances have altered since then. I know of a case now of one small creditor whose debt was £150 compelling an estate to go into bankruptcy where there are creditors for £6,000 all of whom, except one, were desirous that it should go into liquidation by arrangement. There is no doubt that the creditors would get less by half a crown or 5s. in the £ by the estate going into bankruptcy than if there had been a voluntary arrangement, and yet that one particular creditor, no doubt for spite, compelled the estate to go into bankruptcy. Do you think that that state of things is desirable ?—No, but I think that the remedy would be worse than the disease, because I think it would do away entirely with voluntary arrangements.

3710. At present the objecting creditor has three months in which to object—would you curtail that period ?—I think it would be a very useful amendment of the Act to curtail that.

3711. To one month ?—To one month.

3712. Would you also fix a time limit after the public examination for the holding of the meeting to consider the terms of discharge ? Would you specify a time and say that it must be within a certain time, say six months ?—I should make it automatic. I think the Registrar should fix a date for considering the discharge at the same time that the public examination is fixed—of course to come after the public examination.

3713. And not to exceed six months ?—I see no objection to that.

3714. The assignment of book debts—do you not think that the assignment of book debts is evidence usually of the person's insolvency ?—I think it is the last extremity.

3715. And is it not, under such circumstances, desirable that where book debts are assigned that the other creditors ought to know of those assignments ?—Where a man assigns all his debts I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that, but where he assigns one specific debt to enable him to carry out a contract, I think it is questionable and I think that that is a matter which requires very very careful consideration.

3716. Have you also found that the debtors hand over goods to a creditor previous to bankruptcy ?—Not frequently—I cannot call to mind any cases.

3717. And that that is almost as frequently done as the assignment of book debts ?—There are clauses under the Bankruptcy Act to meet that.

3718. Just as in the case of book debts ?—There the undue preference clause would come in.

3719. Would you not also make those subject to registration ?—I think that would be too technical. I forget for the moment the number of the section of the Act, but it is undue preference if you hand back a debtor's goods and fail immediately afterwards.

3720. (Chairman.) You see, Mr. Richardson, that if the assignment of goods is by written document, it has to be registered now, but if it is by handing over the goods there is nothing to register.

3721. (Mr. Richardson.) No, but there is the handing over of the goods just the same as handing over a debt.

3722. (Chairman.) Yes, but I mean there is nothing to register.

3723. (Mr. Richardson.) Hire purchase: railways wagons have been mentioned as subjects of hire purchase. Railway wagons as we know are very frequently let on hire and the coal merchant has his own name upon them. You are in favour of those, I understand being registered to protect the colliery owner who supplies the coal. How is the colliery owner to know that those railway wagons which his customer is using are not his customer's?—Yes, I think I have already answered that. In my judgment hiring agreements in respect of machinery or anything of that sort should be registered.

3724. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I should just like to ask this—I take it that you come in contact with what I will call the better class of debtors. Is it your opinion that the withholding of discharge is no punishment at all?—I think at the present moment that you tar all bankrupts with the same brush, whether they are honest or dishonest traders.

3725. Yes, but the class of men that you have to deal with in your own profession—would it not be a punishment to them to have their discharge withheld?—To an honest trader naturally it is some punishment, but you have to legislate for the dishonest ones.

3726. I am only asking you this question, because you are very much in favour of some punishment being administered beyond that which is now administered under the Act?—Yes, but that is a subject for the registrar and creditors to determine. They naturally would not punish an honest debtor.

3727. In answer No. 2, your council speaks about this Act from the point of view of its general benefit to the commercial morality of the country and say that it is from that point of view an absolute failure. Now does your council bring forward any recommendation as to what steps should be taken to remedy what is an absolute failure?—We bring that forward in No. 1. We suggest some more drastic punishment than is now given.

3728. But this is in connection with the official receivers taking no action?—It is in the same paragraph, but I do not think that it applies to it. If you go on reading, the paragraph says: "As without more drastic punishment any Act will be," that applies to the fact that the Bankruptcy Act has no punishment beyond the withholding of the discharge.

3729. Do I take it that you would suggest that at the cost of imperial funds action should be taken where there are no assets in the estate?—It is a question of fact which comes out of the examination whether the man did trade after knowing he was insolvent or kept no books and that would be a very simple thing for the registrar to deal with.

3730. Of course, in certain businesses where a man does what is called a season's business or a season's trade there are periods of the year where, if he was pounced down upon by the creditors, he would be insolvent whereas in six months time he would be the opposite. I think that is a point that wants to be considered as to the percentage you spoke about of assets to liabilities. Have you had any experience of that class of business?—Certainly that is my point. In the bankruptcy court the man who pays 9s. 6d. and has not committed any real offence, and the man who pays nothing, get tarred with the same brush and both get their discharge withheld for two years.

3731. But a man who is spoken of as trading after he knows that he is insolvent but there are periods in the year when a man on paper may be insolvent, but where in six months time he would work himself round?—You would naturally make considerable allowance in the proportion of assets to liabilities.

3732. As regards No. 9 I think it would be only going over the matter again to ask you anything upon that. I will take it from you that you quite appreciate the difficulty there is about the assignment of book debts and of hiring agreements because in some estates they are perfectly bona fide and perfectly genuine though in a few instances they are assigned with a fraudulent idea. It is a very difficult matter to deal with and should be approached with caution, should not it?—I fully appreciate the great difficulty and that it should be approached with caution.

3733. (Mr. Barker.) Did I understand from you that where the lady is ordering goods she should first get the consent of her husband—or that the trader should get his consent?—I said there might be a provision to that effect and that that might be a necessity. Mr. Algernon O. Miles. 28 Nov. 1906.

3734. Would you like a trader to write to you to know if he might make a dress for your wife?—No. I think in the course of business that it would be impossible.

3735. Do you think if such a thing did occur and your wife ever heard of it that she would ever trouble that tradesman again?—I say that it would be impossible to carry it into effect.

3736. And I gather from you, that whether goods are ordered by a man or a woman you consider the individual who has property to pay for the goods is liable for the amount so ordered?—I consider that if a man or a woman having separate estate orders goods that he or she has got to pay for them or suffer the penalty.

3737. Do you think that the Official Receiver is the best man to dispose of the goods?—In what way?

3738. Supposing he has got a large business I understood you to say just now that you would sanction or be agreeable to leave it in the hands of the Official Receiver to dispose of all the goods he thought proper and at what time he thought proper?—I do not think I gave that answer; as a matter of practice the Official Receiver takes the opinion of the creditors and he always instructs somebody who has a knowledge of the specific goods to deal with these goods. That is a matter of practice and those I take it are the instructions given.

3739. You think then that there should be tenders for those goods?—That would be tendering if the Official Receiver instructed somebody to sell.

3740. (Mr. Smith.) With regard to that last question what is the benefit of the system of tender?—In what way?

3741. What is the particular benefit of the system of tender? I understood Mr. Barker to ask you whether you thought that the system of tender should be sanctioned or approved—I do not exactly know what the expression was, but you approved of the suggestion that goods should be sold by tender?—That is the best method. Of course, it depends first of all on what goods.

3742. It depends on what goods?—Certainly.

3743. What is the particular benefit of dealing with them say by tender as compared with any other method?—You must put your question—what class of goods. There are different methods of dealing with each class of goods.

3744. I suppose you were speaking of the trade with which you are most associated—the Manchester trade?—I can only speak of the trade that I know most of.

3745. What would be the particular advantage of selling by tender?—The particular advantage is that you get a better price.

3746. But are not you there bound if you offer to sell by tender to accept one of the tenders?—Not necessarily.

3747. (Mr. Barker.) May I ask one other question. Have you in the course of your varied business career found that where official receivers have sold goods for an estate that they have to some extent depreciated the value of the remainder of the goods considerably?—I can only speak of the goods that I have to deal with. Obviously if any man carries on a business and does not replenish his stock the remainder loses a very much larger amount of discount than the whole of the stock would have done if put up by tender.

3748. (Mr. Barker.) Quite right.

3749. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You would not suggest that the stock should be sold by tender if you could sell it more advantageously otherwise?—Certainly not. You must take each class on its own merits.

3750. There are lots of cases where people are most anxious to get hold of stock, are there not?—Certainly, I have sold stock at a premium.

3751. (Mr. Smith.) That brings out what I wanted to elucidate.

Mr. Algernon O. Miles.

28 Nov. 1906.

3752. (Witness.) Obviously you must deal with each case on its own merits.

3753. (Mr. Barker.) But as a rule selling by tender will result in getting the best price ?—If there is nobody who wants specific stock then you must put it up to public tender. I am speaking of Manchester goods. I do not know any thing about any others.

3754. (Mr. Smith.) You said in answer to Mr. Peat the Official Receiver can take no action in the absence of assets. When you say he can take no action, or adopted Mr. Peat's statement that he can take no action, what do you mean by that, that he has no legal right to take action ?—No, I did not mean that. I say that the Official Receiver or trustee can take no action in an estate where there are no assets, obviously.

3755. (Chairman.) You mean because he has no money ?—Certainly.

3756. (Mr. Smith.) You mean because he cannot pay the costs he can take no action ?—Yes, certainly, that is what is meant here.

3757. You are aware that there are cases where the Board of Trade sanctions proceedings by the Official Receiver when there are no assets ?—By the Public Prosecutor.

3758. Yes, in cases involving a principle and where the Board of Trade deem it of importance to establish a question of principle ?—Yes, I believe there have been cases.

3759. And in many cases the Board of Trade have as a matter of fact authorised the Official Receiver to incur expenses although there were no assets in the estate ?—I take your statement that there have been cases.

3761. Or out of public funds ?—I am not saying for one moment that the Official Receivers do not do their duty, because they do.

3762. Yes, you have said that very fairly. With regard to the registration of hiring agreements you were asked a question whether you would give credit to a person on the faith of furniture which he possessed and I think you said you would not. If you knew that a person who was engaged in business was incurring large liabilities, if you knew that he was living in a well-furnished house, the furniture in which was all hired, would not that make you extra cautious in giving credit to him ?—I do not know that that would. If you are dealing with a man the chances are you would not know whether he was living in a furnished house, in a hotel, or in what way ?

3763. But if you did know, and if it did happen to come to your knowledge that the furniture was not his own or it belonged to his wife ?—I do not think that that would seriously affect my credit ; it would depend upon the size of the concern.

3764. Then I will not ask you anything else except on the question of reducing the period during which an assignment in favour of creditors is an available act of bankruptcy from three months to one month. You suggest that that might be done on an application to the Court with the concurrence of the creditors ?—What is that ?

3765. The reduction of the period required for a voluntary arrangement to become binding ?—I do not see that it has anything to do with the Court.

3766. There was a question asked as to whether you did not think that the period of three months for a deed should be reduced to one month ?—I understood the question to mean whether the act of bankruptcy for three months should read one. Whether it should be an act of bankruptcy for one month instead of three. I said that I saw no objection to its being one month instead of three so as to give the trustee an earlier opportunity of dealing with the estate.

3767. That is not the opinion of your Council ?—I do not know whether they have been asked about that. I say that I see no objection but I do not ask for it.

3768. (Mr. Smith.) I think there would be a very serious objection, but I was not asking your opinion upon that. You do not put it forward as the opinion of the Council because it was not referred to by them.

TWENTIETH DAY.

Wednesday, 5th December, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., D.L., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.
WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HOWARD HEATON, called ; and Examined.

Mr. Howard Heaton.

5 Dec., 1906.

3769. (Chairman.) I think you appear as representing the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes, and the Birmingham District Millers' Association.

3770. May I ask are you an accountant or a solicitor ?—I am President of the Birmingham and Midland Society of Chartered Accountants.

3771. I suppose you have had a large experience in the administration of insolvent estates of all kinds ?—I can hardly say that, because neither the other members of the council or myself go in for bankruptcy work very much. We mostly do audit work.

3772. The views that you are going to favour us with are the views of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes, and in connection with the Birmingham District Millers' Association, I may say that I overlook a great deal of bankruptcy work. I see a great deal of the working of the Bankruptcy Act, although I do not take up the work myself. The millers, of course, do their business, as you know, principally amongst bakers. The estates are very small, and it is with watching how these estates are wound up, and the working of the Bankruptcy Act in connection with the smaller estates, that I am able to give evidence for the millers.

3773. I think that you have had the Terms of Reference to the Committee before you ?—That is so.

3774. And you have been good enough to favour us with a memorandum dealing with several questions relating to the Bankruptcy law. I daresay you have got it before you ?—I have.

3775. I might just ask you, with reference to the one that is headed "Debtors Act" on page 12. As I gather from what you have said, you think that the provisions of the Debtors Act for the punishment of a debtor should be made more stringent?—That is so for this reason, Sir. You see what we say here as to the words "unless the jury is satisfied that a bankrupt had no intention to defraud." It is very difficult to get at a man's intention. You may be absolutely convinced in your own mind that a man is going to remove his furniture to-morrow night, but you cannot possibly bring evidence before a jury which will enable you to prove that he was going to do so, and the very fact of bringing it before a jury would perhaps prevent him doing it. To prove intention is such a difficult thing. That is the main point there.

3776. You would strike that out of Section 11 of the Debtors Act?—That is so.

3777. (Mr. Addison.) It seems to me that that proceeds upon a misapprehension. The jury have to find a man guilty unless he personally satisfies them that he is not. That is what it means. What it is these gentlemen are thinking of I do not know. There is no onus on the prosecution to give that proof; it is the prisoner or the debtor who has to satisfy them that there is no intention to defraud.

3778. (Chairman.) I daresay you are aware that that is so?—That is so, but in effect it seems to be very difficult to get a conviction under such circumstances.

3779. Then I see that you would add to the misdemeanours under the Debtors Act taking paragraph 2. Where a debtor disposes of goods by pawning goods which have not been paid for, he should be guilty of a misdemeanour, and where he disposes of goods otherwise than in the ordinary way of trade in bulk he should be guilty of a misdemeanour, and also that certain of the bankruptcy offences as we call them, not keeping books and trading with knowledge of insolvency, and rash and hazardous speculation, should render him liable to prosecution?—Yes, of course, it is very difficult to prove anything unless a man has books; it is very difficult to deal with him at all and no doubt if all these bankrupts kept books and could show exactly what they had done with the money when they had pawned their goods, and so on, it would be very easy to bring the matter home, but so many of them, especially amongst the small traders, do not keep any books at all.

3780. Then on the question of the consideration of the bankrupt's conduct, are the societies you represent in favour of the view that the debtor's conduct should come up for consideration in every case whether he applies for discharge or not?—I think not entirely. You see they make a recommendation here with reference to the public examination.

3781. That is on page 6?—Yes, "To avoid the legal expenses attendant upon a public examination, and the very heavy shorthand writers' charges at present existing (which should under any circumstances be reduced) the public examination of a debtor should not necessarily take place where his affairs appear to be straightforward." The idea is that either the Official Receiver or the trustee, or a large creditor, should have the power to apply for his examination if he has any knowledge of something which is irregular. I should like particularly to say here that the Press approached us with reference to this item of the shorthand writers' charges. We are not grumbling at the charges of the shorthand writers themselves, but we say that it does entail a very heavy expense on the estate to have this public examination where a case is perfectly straightforward and the creditors are all satisfied that the man has come to grief through misfortune.

3782. Sometimes a public examination elicits something that had not been known before?—It does so, but as a general rule when that is so it is because some creditor has got some information which he hands over to the Official Receiver or the trustee, or the Official Receiver or trustee have themselves discovered something which they bring out in the examination.

3783. Passing on to the second of the subjects of our reference, if I may take you to pages 11 and 12 of your memorandum. You say, I see, that your society suggest that "it should be compulsory for every bankrupt to notify his present address and occupation to the County Court at the conclusion of every period of six months from his adjudication as a bankrupt and to apply for his discharge within a period of two years of the bankruptcy, and where merely technical offences have been committed to do away with suspension of discharge and make a monetary penalty"?—Yes, because we find in effect so many of the bankrupts never apply for their discharge at all.

3784. I know, but would you be in favour of the Court fixing a day on which the bankrupt should come up to be dealt with?—That is the intention.

3785. Then as regards making a monetary penalty, would not that handicap the bankrupt in engaging in an occupation for his livelihood?—Yes, I suppose it would, but at the present time, you see, they are not handicapped at all, where, for example, a man starts and trades in his wife's name. I can give you one instance of a man who started trading in his wife's name very soon after his public examination. I suppose for the next five years during which his discharge was withheld he never made less than £1,000 or £1,500 a year profit from his business. The withholding the discharge from that man was no detriment to him, and no injury to him at all. If in that case he had been obliged to come up every six months and report himself and report what he was doing to the Court, the Court might have said, "Now you are doing very well you must pay something for this discharge. We will grant it, but we think it is only right that your creditors should get a little bit of their money back now you are doing so well." True, he was trading in his wife's name, but he was trading with borrowed money and trading really on his own account entirely.

3786. Have you considered whether there might not be a practical difficulty in getting at a bankrupt?—That I have considered, and I have said that to the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce—that I really did not see how they were going to do it and how they were going to get a man to come up every six months to apply for his discharge.

3787. But if it was made part of the procedure of the Court that as soon as the public examination was over, that a day should be fixed for him to come up unless the time was extended, then he would know and be aware that he was committing contempt of Court if he did not come?—Exactly.

3788. Would that have a good effect?—That would have a very good effect, undoubtedly.

3789. Now, on paragraph 4 of our Terms of Reference I see that you have on pages 4 and 5 dealt with the question of meetings of creditors and the possibility of depreciation of assets while creditors are being convened and so forth?—Yes.

3790. As I understand, the societies you represent would be in favour of shortening the period within which the creditors are to meet?—Yes, they would like the meeting of creditors to follow as quickly after the receiving order as possible. Under the present arrangement a receiving order is made and the meeting of creditors is not called until the Official Receiver is able to put forward a statement of affairs prepared by the debtor and his report thereon. Now, in some cases a debtor wilfully neglects furnishing that statement of affairs. He is asked for his statement of affairs time after time, and until it is rendered no meeting of creditors is held. Now, some creditors may have important information which, of course, they can communicate, and on the other hand the actual meeting together amongst themselves of the creditors might enable them to form some view about the bankrupt's position. Everyone has some little knowledge of the debtor, possibly, and they might decide that it was advisable to ask the Court to adopt some stringent method to make the debtor furnish his account at once. Here, you see, they ask that the meeting shall be held as soon after the receiving order as possible, and that then the debtor be asked to furnish his further statement within one week after that date.

3791. Have you considered at all the question of whether the Official Receiver, with or without the consent of the Court, before adjudication should have power to realise assets to prevent depreciation ?—Yes, we have had a great deal of experience on that point, especially amongst the small tradespeople. The course adopted is this : At present you get a circular from a solicitor or someone representing a small tradesman. They inform you that his liabilities are so much and that his assets are sufficient to pay 5s. in the £. It is suggested that you should take 5s. in the £ in instalments. Then you strongly object to that. You attend a meeting at which you object, and you perhaps object also to an assignment and decide that the man must be made a bankrupt. Then you have to put a petition on the file and during the fourteen days which elapse before that man can be adjudicated he very often clears his assets. I had a case not very long ago where I represented certainly the majority of the creditors, if not four-fifths. There was an accountant there who represented a creditor for 17s. They wanted an assignment and I objected and instructed the solicitor for the Association—I was then acting for the millers—to put a petition on the file. After the meeting was over the debtor executed a deed of assignment to the gentlemen who represented the 17s. The sale was advertised in the next morning's paper, and by the following morning all the assets had been sold for £5. I contend that a thing like that opens the way to fraud, because the advertisement of the sale appears in the morning paper, the sale takes place at eleven o'clock, and there are only those present who are interested in the debtor or the trustee. They come in, get the thing for what they like to give for it, and probably a week after hand the property all back to the debtor to go on trading with. The assets appeared in that case to be worth about £50, but they were sold for £5. It was no good the creditors going on with the bankruptcy petition after that had been done.

3792. Passing to Clause 5 of the Terms of Reference, have your societies considered at all that question of whether dealings with an undischarged bankrupt in respect of his after-acquired property should be protected ?—I mean where a bankrupt has acquired land and mortgaged whether the mortgage should be protected against the claim of the trustee in the bankruptcy ?—I have not had that point before me .

3793. Have you considered at all the question of whether a married woman should be liable to be made bankrupt if she trades whether with or without her husband. I do not observe it in your proof ?—No, we have not had that at all.

3794. I see as regards Clause 7 of our terms of reference —that is on page 10 of the typewritten copy of the memorandum—you have dealt with the question of the settlement of property ?—Yes ; property passing to a trustee.

3796. Under the present law the people claiming under the settlement have to establish that he was solvent at the time he made it if it is made within ten years. Would you make that any more stringent than it is ?—I do not think so. What happens is that where they cannot prove that the man was solvent there is very often not much difficulty placed in the way of the party who claims the goods. If that was strictly adhered to, and he had to prove that he was solvent at the time, it would be better.

3797. What you would wish is that the burden of proof of the solvency of the settlor after marriage should be rendered rather more stringent ?—That is the point.

3798. As regards Clause 8, which relates to deeds of assignment, which is on pages 14 and 15, I see that you consider that the position of large creditors is very unsatisfactory ?—Yes.

3799. And that often the interests of creditors are defeated by some smaller creditors who refuse to assent to a deed, and that you would in certain circumstances provide that the deed of arrangement should be made binding on all the creditors—that is to say, that it should be a bar to a subsequent petition ?—Yes, because in some cases you find that the larger creditors, perhaps representing some thousands of pounds, are all in favour of a deed of assingnment. They see their way perhaps to realise the business as a going concern on certain lines which will enable them to get back the bulk of the money they have lost. The small creditor objects through perhaps some personal feeling. He can put a petition on the file either before or after the assignment is made, and he can wreck that estate to the detriment of all the other creditors. Of course in some few cases it is done, I am afraid, by an unprincipled professional adviser, who advises his client to make the man a bankrupt because the professional man has not had quite as much to do with the winding up of the estate as he would have liked.

3800. Would you, assuming the deed of arrangement was passed by, say, a three-fourths majority of the creditors, altogether preclude a dissentient from petitioning, or would you leave it in the power of the Court to say whether, having regard to the deed of arrangement, there should be no receiving order ?—I would make it absolute except that I would give any man who had a debt of over £50 a right to go to the Court and appeal. Every man should have a right of appeal, and should have a right to state his case. There may be a perfectly good case for bankruptcy. If he has a good case then his right of appeal to the Court would ensure the estate not being wrecked. If there is no case that man should not be able to wreck the estate.

3801. I see that you differentiate the classes of estates—the classes of small estates—as to what the majority should be. Is there any reason for that ? You say, "That in the case of all estates where the unsecured liabilities amount to not less than £300 nor more than £1,000 a deed of arrangement assented to by bonâ fide trade creditors for amounts of not less than £10 each and representing in the aggregate at least three-fourths " ?—That should be £10 each in each case, Sir.

3802. What is the reason for a differentiation of the two classes under £1,000 and over £1,000 ? Was there any particular reason for that ?—There was ; in the first case, where there were over £1,000 unsecured liabilities a deed of assignment could be assented to by bonâ fide trade creditors of not less than £20 each, and in the other case of not less than £10 each, and in a small estate it was thought better to include some of the smaller creditors.

3803. Why do you confine the majority to trade creditors, because there may be other creditors—mortgage creditors or loan creditors ?—And, of course, family creditors.

3804. Yes, family creditors ?—This was drawn up by trade creditors principally, and I am afraid they did not study very carefully the position of what might be a bonâ fide creditor and how he should be considered.

3805. Then I see you would give a sort of appeal to the Court ?—Quite so.

3806. The question of ascertaining who are all the creditors—does that present any difficulty to your mind ? A meeting is convened and a resolution is passed, and the question is whether all the creditors have really had notice of it. Does that seem to present any difficulty ?—No, we have not considered that point.

3807. When you say three-fourths of the total unsecured liabilities shall be binding on the whole of the creditors, I suppose you mean whether present or not present at the meeting ?—Yes, that is so.

3808. I see you have given some consideration to the last question with which we have to deal, which is the registration of documents. I see that you consider that the law as to registration of judgments should be amended ?—Yes, the judgments in the High Court should be registered as well as judgments in the County Court.

3809. Judgments by consent are registered in the High Court ?—Yes, by consent.

3810. Have you at all considered, or have your societies considered, the question of whether assignments of book debts or hiring agreements should be made subject to registration like bills of sale ?—Yes, the assignment of book debts. What we would suggest is that notice of assignments of book debts should be given to the debtors within one week to make them valid. At the present time, a big creditor comes to a man and asks him for some sort of security. He has no security to offer, but says: "I will assign my book debts to you." The creditor may hold that assignment for any length of time so long as he gives notice to the debtors before the man is adjudicated a bankrupt. He can keep that up his sleeve for six months, and in the meantime all the other creditors, acting on the supposition that the debtor has a certain amount of book debts and is doing a good trade, continue to give him credit. They do not discover until the man's petition is on the file that there is an assignment of his book debts. Notice of an assignment of book debts to the debtors will in all probability bring about the man's bankruptcy, or at any rate cause the creditors to be called together. The knowledge of the assignment then becomes public property, and we suggest that all assignments of book debts should be stamped by the Court the day when they are made and that notice should be given to the debtors within seven days. That would practically make it public property directly it was given.

3811. (Mr. Richardson.) Notice to the debtors, you say, should be given?—Yes, notice to the debtors—that is, notice of the assignment should be given to the debtors to make it complete. An assignment of book debts to me, for instance, is not valid until I have given notice of that assignment to all the debtors whose names are on the list, and I say that that notice should be given within one week of the assignment being made, so that a man should not be able to keep an assignment in the background for six months whilst he was quietly collecting his own account.

3812. (Chairman.) Would not that create a difficulty with people who are carrying on trade and who have made an assignment—I mean it would embarrass him very much with the people he is dealing with if they had notice?—That is so, but is it not also the fact that when a man gets to the position that he is obliged to assign his book debts he has nothing else to pawn and then he really ought to call his creditors together.

3813. When you say that it should be stamped by the Court, you mean that it should be registered as soon as possible, I suppose, after it is made?—Yes, the thing is this, that a man should not give an assignment undated, but he should be obliged to date it. That is the point. The only way I can see to have it done is to have an assignment stamped, when it is made, and no assignment should be valid unless it is stamped by the Court; otherwise the assignee may keep it undated for months.

3814. In the case of the registration of a bill of sale or a deed of arrangement the deed is invalid unless it is registered from the date of execution?—Then I think the assignment should be registered within two or three days after execution.

3815. And would you have that registered in the County Courts or registered as bills of sale are here?—In the County Court.

3816. Have you at all considered the question of hiring agreements, or has that question not come before you?—No, that has not come before us. We have considered the question of the mortgage of future book debts, and we do not think future book debts should be mortgaged.

3817. You think that a mortgage of future book debts should be void?—Yes.

3818. The Committee have had copies of the memorandum that you have been good enough to favour us with on other points; but I do not propose, in the interests of time, to trouble you by asking you any questions about that. I see that the Birmingham District Millers Association have favoured us also with a memorandum dealing with other points than those I have mentioned. You think that the administration of small estates requires some amendment?—Yes, small estates where the assets are under £300.

3819. Then also as regards the realisation of book debts, I see that you suggest that proceedings to realise them should be capable of being taken speedily?—Yes, because in a great many of these small estates book debts may amount to £20, £30 or £50, and the other assets to a like amount. The book debts are very poor, and in order to realise on the present method the estate has very often to be kept open for ten or twelve months. We ask the Official Receiver why the estates are kept open so long, and in nearly every case he tells us it is because he has had to adopt a certain method as to the realisation of the book debts. In the larger estates we can quite understand that a certain definite method may be very desirable, but in these very small estates we suggest that he should have power to sell the book debts or realise them in a summary method and get the estate closed.

3820. Then I see you suggest that trustees under a deed of assignment should have the power to pay unclaimed dividends into an account like the bankruptcy estates account?—I think that was more a personal question. I have written to the Board of Trade asking where I am to pay in unpaid dividends and I have also written to the Chancellor of the Exchequer asking the same question. All the creditors will not have them, and the consequence is that one has sometimes twenty or thirty banking accounts with quite small sums in them. We cannot get a Government receipt for the money. All we want to do is to hand over this money and say to the Government "You can do what you like with it, but we want a receipt showing that we have dealt properly with all the moneys in our hands" There must be a considerable sum in the way of unclaimed dividends in the country.

3821. You will understand that every member of the Committee has had a copy of your memorandum and I do not trouble you any further with questions, but I am going to invite you to be so kind as to answer such questions as other members of the Committee many desire to put?—Certainly.

3822. (Mr. Chamberlin.) As regards the registration of an assignment of book debts, in your practice do you find that an assignment of book debts is very prevalent?—I am pleased to say that in my practice, I have very little bankruptcy work. I only look over these small estates for the Millers Association, of which I am secretary, but outside my private practice, the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce tells me that it is rather a growing practice, this assigning of book debts to one creditor to the detriment of all the others. If that is so it seems rather advisable that some method of registering them should be adopted. I have no personal knowledge by which I could verify that statement.

3823. Therefore you have not given much consideration to it?—I have not given much consideration to it.

3824. And I suppose the same remark would apply if I were to ask you what is your experience as to non-keeping of accounts?—There I can speak very strongly because I have here some notes with reference to some twenty or thirty bankrupt estates, and I should say that there are not two amongst them who have kept any accounts at all.

3825. Would you be in favour of making it a penal offence, the not keeping of proper books of account?—I should be strongly in favour of it for this reason, that you can prove nothing if a man does not keep proper books of account. He says "I lost £50 at a horse-race" or £50 here or £50 there, and you have not the slightest evidence to go upon. You can perhaps prove that a man has sold £100 worth of furniture to a certain person and got £50 or £60 for it. Then you ask him "What have you done with the money?" He says "I used it to pay my creditors." You say "How do I know that you did not pay one creditor and not another." He says "I did not do that, I paid all my monthly accounts." Then you ask "But who did you pay" and he says "I cannot tell you because I did not keep a banking account." Then you ask "where is your cash book" and he says "I have not got one."

3826. Would you differentiate between a small trader who is possibly not capable of keeping accounts and the man who does not keep accounts or destroys his accounts for the purpose of bankruptcy?—I think not, because the small trader is always capable of putting down all the money he spends and how he spends it. At the present time everyone can read and write and a man can always keep a list of his payments, he can always keep a cash account. It is the smaller trader that you have such difficulties with. With a man in a more influential way of business who has had a good education and who can keep thoroughly good books of account, but who does not do so, the offence is greater no doubt.

5 Dec., 1906.

3827. Have you any experience as an Income Tax Commissioner ?—No, not as an Income Tax Commissioner.

3828. I made that inquiry because it is very often found that a man who comes for a reduction of Income Tax does not keep books of account or he says that he has not had time to prepare them, but your experience is that the keeping of acounts is very much neglected ?—Very much neglected.

3830. I am going to ask you a question which has been asked a good many times of the previous witnesses in this Inquiry—do you think it is desirable in the interests of commerce that there should be a large army of undischarged bankrupts about the country ?—I do not.

3831. Our Chairman has not taken you through this memorandum from the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, but, with his permission, I will ask you a question with regard to your suggestion as to the appointment of Official Receivers. Do you consider that Official Receivers are doing their duty fully now ?—My own experience of Official Receivers is only in the Birmingham Court, and I can only speak in the highest terms of the Birmingham Bankruptcy Court as to all the work I have seen there.

3832. The recommendation of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce is that the Official Receiver should have nothing else to do beyond his work as an Official Receiver ?—Exactly. They have found it work not well for an Official Receiver to be also perhaps a practising accountant or to have some other business to do besides his business as Official Receiver.

3833. (Mr. Richardson.) With reference to the keeping of books you have mentioned that persons well able to keep books do cease to keep books ?—Yes.

3834. And that they are doubly guilty. Would you make it, in such cases where a man has kept books for a series of years and has ceased a few months before bankruptcy to keep any record, or only an unsatisfactory one, an absolutely penal offence ?—Absolutely.

3835. An undoubted one ?—Yes, an undoubted one.

3836. It should be held over them, if they are able to keep books, and they cease to keep them, or if the books are not in a proper state when the bankruptcy comes about, that they should be punished ?—Certainly.

3837. You said with regard to deeds of arrangement that you would give a creditor for £50 a right of appeal. Why should you limit it to £50 ? Is it not likely that a creditor for £10 may know of fraud equally well or better than a creditor for £50 ?—I would say £50 because that is the amount which entitles the creditor to obtain a bankruptcy petition. You cannot put a bankruptcy petition on the file unless you are a creditor for £50.

3838. Would you give it to creditors representing £50. I mean more creditors than one ?—Certainly, I think it is a stronger case if four or five men say, "This assignment ought not to go through" than if one man says it.

3839. On an assignment of book debts you state you would have the debtors advised. I do not quite follow you—why would you advise the debtors when a man assigns his book debts. It is not a protection to anyone, is it ?—The point is this—at present if an assignment of book debts is made to a creditor, that creditor in order to make the assignment valid has to advise all the different persons owing the money—I will call them the debtors—that those particular debts have been assigned to him. Now at the present time he does not do that—he does not give these debtors notice that those particular debts which are due from them have been assigned to him because he is keeping that assignment in his pocket, perhaps for six months, and during that six months he is reducing the amount which the one debtor whom he is trading with owes him. He is holding this assignment and he is perhaps reducing the amount all the time. Then when he thinks his one debtor has got a little cheque he puts his assignment into operation and makes it valid by giving notice to the different debtors. I say if he was obliged to give that notice within a week of the assignment being made he could not use that assignment so much to the detriment of all other creditors.

3840. I presume you are also in favour of the assignment being registered immediately so that it appears in the Gazette ?—If it is registered immediately and appears in the Gazette the notice to the debtors might be given at any time.

3841. You think so ?—Yes.

3842. To my mind the other is more important—the registration—so that all the debtors may know at once that this particular trader has assigned to some one creditor a series of book debts or one particular book debt ?—I quite agree.

3843. Now to come to the voluntary deeds of arrangement. I do not know whether you have made it quite clear in your notes, but at present an objecting creditor has three months in which to object ?—Yes.

3844. I presume you would curtail that ?—If other creditors amounting to three-fourths in amount agreed.

3845. But under any circumstances would you not be in favour of reducing it from three months to a month ?—Certainly, because the trustees cannot begin to realise until the three months have elapsed.

3846. Would you not make it a drastic provision that one month should be sufficient ?—Yes.

3847. Every creditor should know in a month's time whether he would come under a deed of arrangement or whether he would throw the estate into Bankruptcy ?—Quite so.

3849. (Chairman.) It is scarcely, Mr. Richardson, within our terms of reference to enquire into preferential payments and I think it would be very undesirable for the Committee to embark upon it.

3850. (Mr. Richardson.) I noticed you did not ask any question on this part ?

3851. (Chairman.) No.

3852. (Mr. Richardson.) Then on page 15, one and two you limit it there again to a creditor for £20. I do not know why you limit it to £20 ?—In the case of creditors assenting you well know that the majority is made up of the principal or larger creditors.

3853. But if anything is wrong it is just as likely to be known by a man who is a £5 or a £1 creditor. I do not see why you should not make it open entirely to any creditor. You say representing three-fourths of the total unsecured liabilities ?—Shall be binding on the whole of the creditors.

3854. Of the majority in number you mean ?—Yes.

3856. (Mr. Addison.) I think you said you had not much experience personally of bankruptcy matters ?—That is so.

3857. I see in the Birmingham notes you refer to difficulties in connection with proxies under the present system ?—Yes.

3858. Have you had any experience of difficulties with proxies ?—The only proxies which were ever given to me were not drawn up correctly, so that I could not use them. That is the only experience that I have had with reference to proxies, except this, that I do know that there is considerable difficulty in getting proxies drawn up as they should be.

3859. Yes, we know the details, but do you find any complaint on the part of mercantile men ?—Yes, there are complaints undoubtedly.

3860. That there is a great deal of trouble in connection with the present system of proxies ?—Yes, that is so.

3861. Those questions have come before you ?—Yes, they have.

3862. On the question of keeping books of account, I suppose you limit the obligation to keep books of account to persons in trade ?—Oh yes, certainly.

3863. I have read over the Birmingham notes. Will you kindly refer to page 1, "acts of bankruptcy." I suppose these have been considered by the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce. Your first amendment of the law would be: "If in England or elsewhere he makes any conveyance"—I will not read it all—"or transfer of his property, or any part thereof, or creates any charge thereon"—then all the following words of the section you say should be deleted ?—The intention of that, I believe, is to prevent a debtor giving a bill of sale.

3865. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I see in regard to the question of not keeping books of account you are prepared to recommend that the law should be made more stringent by enforcing imprisonment ?—Yes, certainly.

3866. Would you give that power of imprisonment to the bankruptcy Court ?—Yes, I think so.

3867. You would give them a summary power of dealing with that matter ?—Yes.

3868. Or I suppose if in practice a difficulty arose in connection with that question, you would probably be willing that they should remit it to the nearest Court of Summary Jurisdiction ?—Certainly.

3869. The idea being rather to get certainty of punishment where offences against the bankruptcy Act have been committed than severity of punishment ?—Exactly.

3870. This summary jurisdiction would be in addition to proceedings by the Public Prosecutor ?—Exactly. At the present time the course of procedure is rather a prolonged one. If you wish to get a prosecution you have to apply to the Court and then the Public Prosecutor is instructed. You have then to go before the magistrates and get your man committed to the sessions. It is rather a roundabout way. If you could have it that either the County Court Judge or the registrar of the County Court should be able to inflict certain punishment straight away, where a man has kept no books it would be an improvement. If a man has kept no books he should be punished for it. Make the punishment what you like, but have it, and have the punishment adapted in every case to the offence.

3871. I take it that you are quite of opinion that any man who is competent to carry on an ordinary business transaction is capable of keeping some record of his transactions ?—Exactly; I would not expect, of course, a small creditor to keep his books on the most approved method of a chartered accountant, but every man can write down his receipts and payments day by day, and that is all that would be wanted to trace where his money had gone to.

3872–85. Yes, I take that to be your answer. I note in your proof that you refer to the fact of the difficulty of ascertaining the names of partners of firms ?—Yes.

3886. (Sir Edward Fithian.) We have had a considerable amount of evidence with regard to undischarged bankrupts to the effect that they frequently change their names and commence trading in names other than their own. Have you had any experience of that ?—Only as to trading in the wife's name. Mr. Howard Heaton. 5 Dec., 1906.

3887. That is sufficient for my purpose. Then you think that in cases of that kind it is important that there should be a registration of firms so as to show who are the actual partners or members of the firm carrying on business in names other than their own ?—We have not considered that except with reference to the husband trading in his wife's name.

3888. I think there are some references here to a company where an undischarged bankrupt recommences trading without disclosing the fact that the business belongs to his wife. Do you not think it is important that there should be some registration of firms which would disclose that ?—It is really a man trading in his wife's name that we have been trying to get at, but it would deal with the thing if all partnerships were registered. It would do away with that difficulty at once, because you would see who was in it, and whether it was his wife, or who it was.

3889. And it would enable the creditors to ascertain more correctly who they were trusting ?—Exactly.

3890. Whereas now they have to do it in the absence of information ?—That is so.

3891. As to who the partners or owners of the business may be ?—That is so.

3892. And you think that that registration would be desirable ?—Undoubtedly.

3893. The question of hiring agreements I think you said you had not looked into ?—No.

3895. And you think, therefore, that it is desirable that the law should make some provision to deal with such cases ?—Certainly.

3896. (Mr. Smith.) I see this memorandum is stated to be submitted by the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Committee of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce. May I ask if the recommendations in it have been discussed by the chamber of commerce itself ?—Yes.

3897. They have been discussed ?—Yes.

3898. Has this memorandum ?—This memorandum was discussed first of all by a sub-committee and then it was brought before the chamber.

3899. I gather from the answer you gave Mr. Addison that there are some matters that you would not pledge your opinion in favour of ?—I cannot say that it is entirely my own opinion.

3900. There are some matters of drafting which rather seem to indicate that they had not had the benefit of legal advice in the drafting?—That is so with reference to the first paragraph.

3901. For instance, the paragraph on page 1 as to the making of any conveyance or transfer of property ?—That is so. I have a note against that, that it was evidently the intention of the chamber, as far as I can find out, that a bill of sale should be regarded as an act of bankruptcy.

3902. Yes; that would be intelligible. There is a similar paragraph on page 6. It is suggested that if a man has been paid his debt he ought not to withdraw his petition in bankruptcy ?—The suggestion is that a man should not withdraw his petition if he puts a petition on the file—that he should not withdraw it because they have paid him.

3903. But if he is paid by the debtor should not he withdraw it. If a man puts a petition on the file you say it must remain on for ever ?—Yes.

Mr. Howard Heaton.

3904. Very well, that is their suggestion ?—That is their suggestion.

3905. There are one or two matters—practical matters—that I want to ask you a question about with reference to the delay in getting the receiving order. That is alleged to be considerable. Can you suggest any way in which it might be shortened ?—Yes. What we would suggest is that where a man has committed an act of bankruptcy it should be possible to get a receiving order at once either pending his adjudication or an immediate adjudication.

3907. I take your general answer, that you would like a more summary procedure ?—Yes.

3908. With regard to the costs of getting a receiving order ; do you suggest that the £5 stamp and the £5 deposit are too heavy in some cases, and do you suggest that there should be a reduction to £1 ?—Yes.

3909. A £1 stamp and £1 for the petition. I suppose you realise that that would not pay the expenses in many cases ?—I do realise that, but at present the creditors have to pay these heavy expenses, and very often get nothing back at all. That is an expense to the creditor of making a man a bankrupt which he really does for the benefit of other creditors. Whatever the Board of Trade find necessary to charge against the estate afterwards, the idea is to be able to make a man bankrupt without a heavy charge. At present I have got a number of estates here where we have made a man bankrupt, and where we have had to pay sums varying from £10 to £23 for the pleasure of making him a bankrupt, he having between the time of filing the petition and his adjudication disposed of the most of his property and gone to Canada, New Zealand, or some other place, in which case we have had to pay for substituted service and advertising in the Gazette in addition to the stamp fee.

3910. I quite understand that. Would it meet with your approval if the fee were reduced in a certain class of cases, say where the petitioners' claim was under a certain amount—supposing it was reduced to £100 ?—Yes, I think that would meet the case.

3911. That the fee should be proportionate to the amount of the petitioning creditors' claim ?—Quite so.

3912. £1 if he claims under £100 without prejudice to the full fee being charged if assets are recovered ?—Quite. That would meet the case entirely.

3913. You are aware, I dare say, of the rule which relieves the Official Receiver of the duty of incurring any expense if there are no assets ?—Quite so.

3914. You would not alter that, would you, after a receiving order is made ?—No, I think not.

3915. There is a complaint of the delay in realisation due to the want of power to sell book debts. I do not know that that is in the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce's note or in the millers' ?—It is in the millers'.

3916. Do you find that to be a cause of delay in cases where the official receiver is acting as trustee ?—It is in small estates. There is no doubt about it, that in the small estates it is a very considerable cause of delay.

3917. That is to say, he does his utmost to realise the book debts individually ?—Yes.

3918. But there is a large remnant perhaps which he cannot realise without incurring costs, and he does not think that the risk would justify him in taking proceedings ?—I think that is apparently it.

3919. And he keeps them open from month to month, and perhaps from year to year, until these can be disposed of ?—Yes. I think that the instructions from the Board of Trade are that he may not dispose of book debts until he has got judgment or until he has taken certain action.

3920. Yes, I believe that is so ?—I have only experience with the Birmingham Court, but the late Official Receiver of the Birmingham Court told me that it was quite impossible for him to realise book debts any more rapidly than he did. There is a case, I think, before me just now of a receiving order which was made on the 31st May, 1904, where the estate took over twelve months to realise, although the assets of the estate were not worth perhaps more than £40 or £50.

3921. Then the fault for that delay in closing the estate does not lie on the Official Receiver in those cases ?—No, I do not think so.

3922. Where does it lie, do you think ?—I think from what he told me that it was the result of the instruction as to the collection of the book debts.

3923. I suppose you know that the powers of the trustee which are conferred on the Official Receiver give him authority to realise the estate by any method—by selling book debts ?—The Official Receiver informed me in that case that they had special instructions with reference to the realisation of book debts.

3924. And the Birmingham Chambers of Commerce think that those should not be given, I suppose ?—No, we do not say that. The opinion of the millers is that if the instructions with reference to the collection of book debts mean a delay of twelve months in realising a small estate they would like the Board of Trade to see whether any more expeditious method could not be found.

3926. That is what they suggest—that they should repeal the instructions ?—Yes.

3927. There are several suggestions for disenfranchising the smaller creditor whose debts do not exceed £10. I think you explained that that was on the analogy of the limits imposed on the petition, that a creditor should not present a petition whose debt did not amount to £50 ?—Yes.

3928. That only creditors for £50 were allowed to present a petition, and on the same principle you would restrict the smaller creditors—below £50, or at all events below £10, and disqualify them from voting upon important questions such as that of the deed of arrangement ?—Yes, upon important questions.

3929. Have you any idea of the proportion of creditors under £10 ?—No.

3930. Do you know that they form about 60 per cent. of all the creditors in bankruptcy ?—Do they indeed. No, I did not know that.

3931. The figures being for the year 1905—total creditors after taking secured creditors (5,000)—149,000, of which there were under £10 90,000. Would not it be a very strong order to disfranchise all those of their rights to take part in the proceedings ?—I quite agree with you—I think it would.

3932. With regard to the acceleration of the first meeting, I would ask you a question with regard to that. How would you compel a debtor to furnish the list necessary for calling a meeting ?—The list of creditors ?

3933. Yes ?—I really do not know.

3934. It is suggested that you should compel him. Do you know that at present he is under statutory obligations to furnish it within a limited period ? The statement is to be submitted by the debtor under section 16 of the Act of 1883. The order is made, if it is on the petition of the debtor, within three days, and if it is made on the petition of creditors, within seven days. That goes beyond the Birmingham Chamber even ?—Quite so, but that is not adhered to.

3935. That is as regards the statement of affairs ?—Is it. They very seldom adhere to that. That is very seldom done.

3936. Why is it seldom done ? The Court has power to extend the period, and I believe that the general rule is to apply for time ?—Yes.

3937. The Court being satisfied that there are good reasons for it extends the time. Now, do you know what the reason is ? Is it not simply this—that it has been found absolutely impossible to get any intelligible statement of the debtor's affairs ?—In a large estate it would certainly be impossible to do it in three days.

3938. But in a small one where you have imperfect books and they have to be written up, balanced and posted from one to the other and then a statement framed for the creditors, it has been found practically impossible to do it ?—Yes.

3939. Therefore I do not see how that suggestion could operate ?—No, quite so.

3940. Because you have at present the law as strong as you can possibly have it ?—The chief thing is that they seem to want a meeting of creditors before the statement of affairs is produced.

3941. Do you think it would be wise to have a meeting of creditors at once before there was any information to lay before them ?—I personally do not see what they could do.

3942. Do not you think it would meet the case if it was understood that the Official Receiver would exercise the power of calling the creditors together informally ?—I think that would do quite well.

3943. Have you ever heard of any cases where any of the principal creditors have suggested a meeting of the creditors and where the Official Receiver has refused to call it ?—No.

3944. Of course the instructions of the Board of Trade are framed with the view of meeting the wishes of creditors in that respect ?—No, I have not heard of any cases.

3945. And this suggestion is not founded on any actual grievance, but rather on a theoretical idea that something could be done to accelerate the proceedings ?—That suggestion was founded on a particular case where a meeting of creditors was not called for some time, but I do not think that in that case the creditors asked for a special meeting. No doubt, if they had, as you say, the Official Receiver would have called one and they would have got over the difficulty. It was some difficulty which arose through a meeting not having been called. The bank took a certain course of action which was detrimental to the other creditors in the meantime. The bank held certain mortgages. I believe the case was this, that the bank held mortgages in a business. The man failed, and there was some little time before the meeting of creditors was held, and in the meantime the bank realized. Now the contention was: "If we had had a meeting of creditors early we could have gone to the bank and we could have squared the bank and kept that business going, realising sufficient to pay us in full. As it was we only got 4s. or 5s. in the £"

3949. (Mr. Smith). There was a question of costs referred to in reference to fees. I should like to clear up that reference to fees charged by the Board of Trade—1s. for the notice and 1s. for the room, and so on ?—"The charges made by Official Receivers of 1s. for the notice of a first or other meeting of creditors should not apply to creditors under £10. Neither 1s. for each creditor for the use of the room to whom notice has been given of such meeting."

3950. Yes, that is the paragraph. I do not know whether your committee have realised what is the real nature of this fee of 1s. for notice and 1s. for the room. I do not know whether they suppose that that is a fee which is supposed to represent the expense of calling a meeting, sending out the notices, or hiring the room. Have they considered that point—is that the point of view from which they have looked at it ?—The point of view from which they have looked at it was that it makes the expenses of a small bankruptcy so heavy if there are a number of creditors in a small estate.

3951. Yes, but have they realised that that is merely one of the means of raising revenue—that the revenue required to work the Bankruptcy Act is raised partly by means of an ad valorem fee on the assets to be dealt with, and partly by the number of persons concerned, and that there are no specific charges for rooms made, or for notices, or for a great number of other proceedings which do not appear in the scale of fees at all. For instance there is no fee for the examination of the debtor, which is often the most serious part of the whole business ?—If you collected these unclaimed dividends that I referred to you would have a nice little fund for all that.

3952. I do not know whether you have realised that point—that the fee of 1s. is not meant to represent the actual cost, but is merely a method of raising the general revenue according to the number of persons dealt with ? According to the number of persons interested.

3953. But there are no fees for a great amount of the detailed work that has to be done. With regard to general proxies, you said that you had not very much experience of general proxies ?—No.

3954. I suppose I may assume that you had not very much experience of the working of the Act of 1869 ?—I had more to do with the 1869 Act than with the 1883 Act. I have done very little bankruptcy since 1883.

3955. I should not have given you credit for commencing your practice so early; I suppose you are aware that very considerable abuses arose from the use of proxies ?—Undoubtedly.

3956–7. Can you suggest any means by which those abuses can be met. Such abuses, I mean, as one creditor giving his proxies to another and that other being made use of, I will not say by members of the Society of Chartered Accountants or by a member of the Incorporated Law Society, but we will say by somebody else ?—Yes.

3958. What is to prevent that person from becoming their representative and agent and collecting a number of general proxies avowedly for the purpose of carrying some very liberal proposal of composition and then turning round and using it for the appointment of a Trustee in Bankruptcy ?—I am sorry to say that I see no way of getting over that question of touting for proxies, because it is done even under the present system, and I do not know that anything will get rid of that system of touting unless you were to inflict penal servitude on anybody caught touting, which I should like to see done very much.

3960. No, not under deeds of arrangement ?—Then under deeds of arrangement they should.

3961. They ought to be required to give security ?—Yes.

3962. And that the trustees' accounts should be audited, I think, is suggested ?—Undoubtedly. At the present time we send up our accounts to the Board of Trade, but they are not examined in any way. Why should not they be ?

3963. I am sorry to say that the Board of Trade have no power to take any money, and they do not do it, as some other bodies do it, without power ?—I do think that it is most important that there should be some sort of examination of accounts under deeds of arrangement.

3964. By an independent authority ?—I do.

3965. Do you think that the solicitors' costs should be taxed ?—I do.

3966. And that unclaimed funds should be paid into an account ?—Yes.

3967. How do you distinguish between such a system under a voluntary arrangement and an arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act after adjudication or before ?—An arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act after the receiving order is a much more expensive method.

3968. Is it only on the ground of expense ?—Yes. I do not think any respectable people would attempt to work deeds of arrangement outside the Act if it were not that it saved money to the creditors.

3969. And that is based on the assumption that the expenses or the costs of administering deeds of arrangement is much less than the costs of administering in bankruptcy ?—That is so.

3970. Have you looked into the figures on that subject yourself ?—I cannot say that I have.

Mr. Howard Heaton.
5 Dec., 1906.

3971. You have noted that the Board of Trade issue statistics in their Annual Report ? I have the Report for 1905 which gives an analysis of 4,000 cases in the administration of 4,011 estates finally wound up by the Official Receiver and closed during the year 1905, and a similar analysis of 3,068 assignments for which final accounts were rendered during the year 1905. It is arranged under a classified system from £25, £30, £100, £150, £200, and so on up to £20,000, and the percentage of cost to the gross assets realised is given in each class separately, so that they can be compared. Would you be surprised to see that out of a total number of eighteen classes, I think it is, that in fourteen the percentage of the Official Receivers' costs is less than the percentage in winding-up under deeds of arrangement in the same classes ?—Do the Official Receivers' costs in that case include the Board of Trade fees.

3972. They include everything ?—Yes; then I am surprised.

3973. I take the opportunity of showing you this. This is an analysis of the administration of deeds, and these are the Official Receivers' and I have put down in green ink the percentages. You can compare them for yourself. For instance, in these smaller estates the Official Receivers' costs amount to 98 per cent. as against 88 under deeds. In that case they are dearer. Then they are 63 against 56 in deeds. They are dearer. Then we have 41 against 43, and you will find that three-fourths of those classes show a larger percentage under deeds of arrangement than under official administration. Would that affect your judgment upon the subject of making deeds compulsory ?—It would, I think, a little. I would have no deed of arrangement at all for any small estate. I would make all estates go into bankruptcy, although you show me that the costs are heavier, because I think it would stop a great deal of this touting. It would stop a great deal of what I call the living on small estates.

3974. I quite agree with you ?—And personally I would like to see every small estate going into bankruptcy.

3975. Perhaps I might ask you to bring these figures to the notice of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce. They might affect their views ?—I will do so.

His Honour Judge SMYLY, K.C., called ; and Examined

His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.
12 Dec., 1906.

3976. (Chairman.) I think your Honour has been a Judge of the county court for some ten years or so ?—Since January, 1895.

3977. And I think originally your Honour was the Judge of the district of which Derby is the principal centre ?—Yes.

3978. And now your Honour is at Bow and Shoreditch ?—Yes.

3979. The question upon which the Committee were most desirous of obtaining your Honour's assistance was as regards Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides for the administration of the estates of that particular class of debtors under £50 which is prescribed by that section. I believe your Honour has given a great deal of attention to it.—Yes, I have given a good deal of attention to it.

3980. And in both your districts you have had a large experience ?—In my Derby district I had a very considerable experience of it. In London I have not had so much. The fact is, if you look at the returns, you will see that these small bankruptcies under Section 122 certainly do not flourish in London. There are very few of them and I do not think that they are found very satisfactory. The difficulty is that people can so easily move from one district to another and get lost sight of in London.

3981. But in the country I think, to take it at once, you consider that its operation is beneficial ?—In the country most certainly it is beneficial, especially in some courts, but it requires a great deal of trouble not only on the part of the registrar, but even of his clerks and his bailiffs to make it work very satisfactorily. The great thing is to try to get the debtors to consider it of some advantage to them to come and get one of these administration orders before they are absolutely and hopelessly indebted. At Derby I found that that was done a great deal. I have known cases as low as £8, £10 and £15, and those cases are comparatively easy to deal with, for when in two or three years the man gets clear, having learnt a lesson, he very often does well after that. But one of the difficulties in London is that a man who is in debt probably has judgments against him in several courts and there are very often commitments in several courts and he does not come until the case is almost absolutely hopeless.

3982. Is the first proceeding this, that the debtor comes and files a request to the court saying that his debts are under £50 ? — I fancy from reading the section that it was thought that what would happen would be this: that when a man had a judgment against him in the county court for a certain amount he would then say "with this judgment and the costs I shall not be able to pay my debts in full, will you give me an administration order ?" I think that that was what was originally intended, but of course when one looks into it it is almost impossible to do that. In the first place a man does not carry in his head the whole of his debtors' names, and therefore practically that never is done. I have brought with me a set of official papers, a perfectly plain set, and I have also brought three actually existing administration orders which I should have to refer to later. Of course the plain papers you can keep and I can send you any number more that you may want ; the others, I am afraid, I must have back again because they are cases of actual debtors. What very often happens is this—a man comes up on a judgment summons and he says "I cannot possibly pay because I have so many cases against me." Then he brings out of his pocket several judgments for different amounts on which he has to pay instalments. He gives evidence of what his wages are and it is then clear that it is utterly impossible for the man to pay his instalments, to support his family and to comply with the orders of the court. The first thing you say to him is : "How much are your debts. Do you owe more than £50 ?" If he says he does not, one generally advises him, if he is a wise man, to have an administration order. If he appears to be a decent fellow and willing to do it, the judgment summons is adjourned—it cannot be adjourned for less than three weeks or a month to carry it through—and in the meantime he puts the papers through so as to enable him to come up, probably on the very day to which his summons is adjourned, to see whether he can get an administration order.

3983. Does he go before the registrar and fill up the paper?—As a matter of fact the clerks are very good at all the courts I have been at, and they assist the man very much. The first paper is this one, which I have here. There is the actual existing one. There is another, and there is a third. As the Section now stands, you can only get an administration order where a judgment has been obtained in the county court, and therefore the paper, as you see, is headed first with the name of the action. The one I have got before me is a married woman against a defendant. She was trading for her separate estate. Then it begins I, So and-so and So-and so, the above named defendant, state that a judgment was obtained against me.

3984. Then he requests that he may have an administration order?—Form 1, B.A. He states that he has a judgment against him for that amount, and then he says that he is indebted to certain people and requests that an administration order may be made. Then on the second page he sets out the names of those to whom he says he owes debts. On the third page he sets out the statement of his position. He says: I state that I am such an age, and that I am employed at——, that my wages are——, that I have a wife, or if not a wife, as the case may be, and that my wife earns so much or nothing. Then I have——children with me. (In the case before me the man had seven children.) That number one earns so much a week. Then you turn over, and you read, "The reason why I am unable to pay my debts is illness of wife and family, also rapid increase, compelling me to feed them, and county court proceedings." Then F sets out:—That I have goods, household or otherwise valued at——.Then he says:—"I have not been refused an administration in any county court, and no such order has been rescinded." That is put in because if he has been refused, or has had an order rescinded he can only get an administration order by leave of the judge. Then he swears that to the best of his knowledge and belief all his creditors are included, and that the debts are truly set forth. The next step is he gets a notice from the court. "Take notice that your request for an administration order under Section 122 will be heard at the court house," on such and such a day. Then the next paper in order is a paper which is sent round to the creditors. It has been very much improved by the last rules that were made by the Board of Trade, which the County Court Judges Committee had something to do with, because we sent some suggestions to the Board of Trade, and I think the Board of Trade were good enough in some cases to adopt our suggestions. That is 3 B.A. It sets forth that the debtor has filed a request for an administration order, and he offers to pay his debts in full. In this case it is in full. I think in one case it is 2s. in the pound to be paid by instalments; in this case it is 12s. every calendar month. Then this is to give notice that the court will hear the case on such and such a day. Then it gives a very short resumé of the history of the debtor himself. The debtor states that he is an engine driver, that is in this case a Great Eastern Railway Company's driver, earns so much, wife earns so much, he has so many children living with him, one of whom earns wages, and his goods are of that value. This information was one of the improvements that was made by the last rules. That goes to all the creditors. Then on the day fixed the case is called on, and thereupon the creditors are called upon to appear. And in some courts the names of every one of the creditors are read out, and in some they are not.

3985. Do they turn up sometimes?—A few of them turn up but not very many. Some of them send letters, but as a rule not many turn up—in London very very few. In the country if it was a bad case a great many more would turn up or write letters. In many cases quite a majority of the creditors would write letters and object, but sometimes they write and say that he is a respectable man and they think it is a good case. Then he comes before the court and the court asks him a few questions and then asks if any creditor wishes to ask him any question or say anything.

His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.

3986. In the county court is that by the judge or by the registrar?—By the judge always. If the judge comes to the conclusion that his offer is a fair one—in the present case his offer was 12s. every calendar month—as in the case before me, he said he had 38s. a week, I thought he ought to give his creditors a little more than that. I thought he could well afford £1 a month so that the creditors would not be kept so long. But the creditors very often say, "that is not enough. It is true he only gets that amount as a standing wage but he gets a great deal of overtime." The overtime is rather kept in the background by debtors generally. Then if the order is made it is in the form which you have got here 5 B.A. "It is this day ordered that the above debtor do pay the several debts in the schedule hereto, and all others now due and which may hereafter be duly proved under this order." Then it goes on that "he do pay the registrar of the said court a blank sum" that is the amount "every calendar month until such debts shall be paid in full, together with the costs of the administration and it is directed that so and so have the conduct of this order."

3987. Is that a creditor generally?—It used to be in the old days, but that was found to be quite useless and now it is almost invariably an officer of the court, and it certainly works very much better in that case. As long as he pays, well and good. I have got here these three outside sheets and in a great measure at any rate they are the same as a special book which is kept. This one—the one in which he had to pay his creditors 2s. in the £ at 5s. a month—was a sad case and a hard case. He began very well. He got his order in February. He paid in March, April, May and June. Then he dropped in July and paid in August, and September, and dropped in October. Then there was a judgment summons issued by the officers of the court and he paid his 10s. That was paid on the 14th November last.

3988. Does that clear him?—No, that comes to £2. I am going to say a word or two about that presently. He has not even paid the costs of the plaintiff. Now this is a case, No. 183, which is one of those which I have handed to a member of the Committee. It is the case of Cosens. He began and he paid two instalments and then failed. Then comes a dreary succession of judgment summonses. You have a form there of the judgment summons. The difference between a judgment summons in an administration order and an ordinary judgment summons is this, that on an ordinary judgment summons the means must be proved on oath, while in an administration judgment summons the debtor, unless he proves to the contrary, is assumed to have means. One of the suggestions which I will throw out presently will be with reference to an alteration with regard to the judgment summons. In an ordinary judgment summons certain fees have to be paid for taking out the judgment summons; 9d. is the lowest fee; then 6d., is the hearing fee—that makes 1s. 3d., and then if it is necessary to issue a warrant there is another 1s. 6d. which makes 2s. 9d. So that to an ordinary debtor against whom means is proved and who does not pay up to the point when the issue of the warrant goes, it costs him 2s. 9d. That is the smallest it can be. Now for a debtor under an administration order the summons and the warrant actually cost him nothing because, being issued by the officer of the court he is not charged for it. The consequence is that a debtor can fail to appear at the court or pay without losing anything by so doing. Even if a judgment summons is taken out at once it has to be served more than five clear days. Of course, a margin must be left because the man may not be found—he may keep out of the way for some time. The district of the court is a large place to be covered by a few bailiffs, but when he is served he has to come up before the court — in the country it may be twenty-one days or even more before he comes, and then if he does not appear he is committed. The judge very likely gives him a few days of grace. The result is that he certainly gets a month or six weeks in the country; in London not quite so much, perhaps three weeks' time. After that he has only to put in his pocket the amount for which he is committed and walk about with it because if he is arrested he simply hands that out and gives it to the bailiff and the bailiff then must release him. So that a man who desires to do it can, with the very greatest amount of ease, keep out of gaol by paying at most six instalments during the year instead of twelve. About that I shall have to say something presently. Then of course when the whole amount is paid the order is superseded.

3989. Does that mean that the debtor is clear if he has paid the whole 12s. in the £ and that he is in the same position as if he had had a discharge in bankruptcy?—Yes, he is in the same position as if he had had a discharge in bankruptcy—the order is superseded.

3990. How did the creditors get the dividends?—The instalments are paid into court and then the dividends are distributed from time to time to the creditors. The first person who is satisfied is the person who is nominated as plaintiff in the action because each of these orders are supposed to be made in an action and the plaintiff gets his costs.

3991. Do those amount to anything substantial?—I have got three cases, here. Curiously enough one of them does not seem to have any plaintiff's costs on it. I do not know how that comes about, but here is one, plaintiff's costs, 6s., and another one, plaintiff's costs, £3, 4s. 6d.

3992. How would that great difference be accounted for?—Well, in the first place it might have been on a default summons—that makes it more expensive—but it may be that he defended the case. At Derby, where the thing was extremely well-worked, and very carefully worked, if a man came up and said that he had two or three judgments against him the clerks used, very good-naturedly, to look up in the books, and they generally found a very small judgment for 10s., or something of that kind, and they used to make the order in that action and thus keep down costs. I shall probably have some suggestion to make with reference to that later, the plaintiff's costs are the first thing. Then secondly there are the costs of the administration. The costs of the administration are really 2s. in the £, which are paid and go in to the Treasury. With reference to that I shall have a good deal to say presently, because I hope to persuade the Committee to suggest that this money be collected in rather a different way, because it is very hard upon the creditors. The creditors are kept a long time waiting. I have brought one, and it certainly is a very poor case, and therefore it is not quite fair to take it as an average, but I have also other cases that are very good cases. Now in this poor case the debts amount to £27 17s. 5d. This was the case where he offered 2s. in the £ by monthly instalments of 5s. The costs of plaintiff were £3 4s. 6d. The fees, i.e. costs of administration, were £3 6s., i.e. 2s. in the £ on £33, the total debts. Then in this unfortunate case there was a preferential creditor, the overseers of West Ham, whose debt amounted to £5 2s. 11d. Lastly the 2s. in the £ on £27 17s., the residue of the debts, so the order of payment is first the costs of the plaintiff, £3 4s. 6d.; next the costs of administration, put down here as fees, £3 6s.; next the debts of the preferential creditor, £5 2s. 11d., while the 2s. in the £ (£2 15s. 9d.) comes last. So that it would be thirteen months before the plaintiff's costs were paid; twenty-seven months before the administration costs were paid; forty-seven months before the preferential creditor was paid; and fifty-eight months before the general body of creditors got their miserable 2s.

3993. Or anything at all?—Yes, or anything at all, because you could hardly distribute less than 2s. But I have brought good and bad cases here, and here is one where the order was £1 a month. Here the plaintiff's costs were only 6s., administration costs or fees were £2 8s.; and then there was a dividend of 10s. in the £. That was simply a first dividend that was declared. The amount payable under the order was £24 8s., and the first dividend of 10s. in the £ was distributed, and amounted to £11 12s. 6d. In a case of this kind, when a man can afford to pay, at any rate at the beginning, £1 a month, the 2s. in the £ for costs of administration is not excessive, it is perfectly right, but in a poor case you see it is equally 2s. in the £, whether the man pays 2s. or 20s. in the £, and I would suggest that this money should be taken pari passu with the creditors, and even, if necessary, that it would be far better to increase it to 3s. in the £ so that it should be taken pari passu, rather than leave it at 2s., taking all in advance. I shall go into that when I come, in order, to the changes I suggest. We will assume that the man has got his administration order and that the proceeding is going forward, then a difficult question arises and that is, what is to be done with future creditors who come in. That now has been pretty well set to rest by a very recent decision of the Court of Appeal.

3994. (Mr. Peat.) Pearson v. Wilcock?—Yes. That case practically decides this: that a subsequent creditor who has recovered judgment cannot issue execution against the goods of the debtor who has got an administration order and I should think, following the analogy the Court would hold that a Judge could not commit him, because after all, that is an execution, or in the nature of an execution; besides which, to commit a debtor at once stops his earnings, out of which his administration order creditors are to be paid. So that I think that it is pretty clear that it would be held by the Court of Appeal that a Judge could not commit, therefore the debt incurred since the administration order is in a very poor state indeed. According to the section, Section 122, Subsection 12, any person who becomes a creditor is put upon a second schedule. It is whilst the creditors on the first schedule are being paid that the second schedule is being formed.

3995. (Chairman.) They being the after creditors?—They being the after creditors. When the debtor has paid the whole of the creditors of the first schedule the amount which he promised to pay them, then the second schedule begins. As the law stands at present the creditors upon the second schedule are bound to accept the same composition that the creditors in the first schedule accepted. I have a suggestion to make with respect to that, because it is obvious that a man's position may be changed very very much in the interval, and it is rather hard upon these creditors after being postponed that they should be obliged to take the same amount as the creditors took, or were obliged to take, when perhaps the debtor was worse off. During the last few years I was at Derby I found that it was more advantageous when the first schedule came to an end to supersede the man's administration order and to give him leave to start a new administration order, which, of course, brought in these second schedule creditors, because there were generally found to be a few—even in good cases, where the man had been paying regularly and doing his best—other outstanding debts, which, of course, would again have been postponed if one had once closed the second schedule and begun paying upon it. A difficulty which I do not think anybody has yet solved is: what is to happen to a person who becomes a creditor whilst a second schedule is going on? because there is no provision for any third schedule; at Derby we simply left the matter by saying that we would do nothing. We could not start a third schedule. It is a very difficult question, because I presume that the judgment in Pearson v. Wilcock would apply to the second schedule just as much as to the first schedule. Therefore, a man who becomes a creditor whilst the second schedule is going on would be in a hopeless position. The effect of Pearson v. Wilcock is that the creditor finds himself with a judgment which he cannot enforce except by leave of the registrar. Supposing a man had a fortune left him in the meantime, the registrar no doubt would allow the creditor to issue execution on his judgment, but practically he cannot enforce it.

3996. Would you mind, before going to any suggestions in the matter telling me; does a debtor retain his goods, or is there any process of realizing his property?—The debtor retains his goods and they are dealt with by Sub-section 4. This Sub-section 4 amounts to this: that where a debtor has £10 in goods over and above household goods, wearing apparel, bedding, tools and implements of his trade of the value in the aggregate of £20 then a creditor can go and ask the registrar to issue execution, and the registrar can issue execution against him and the money recovered comes in for the creditors. But that very seldom arises, because there is first £20 of household goods, wearing apparel, bedding, tools and implements of trade, and when you have allowed for that it is very seldom that the debtors have got £10 more.

cution against the debtor's goods, but the household goods, wearing apparel, and bedding of the debtor or his family, and the tools and implements of his trade to the value in the aggregate of £20, shall to that extent be protected from seizure."

3998. That is not very clear, is it?—It is not very clear whether that £10 is to be reserved over and above the £20.

3999. I should hardly think it does mean that?—I should hardly think it would and yet it must be up to the value of £10. I presume they do not want an execution to issue for a mere matter of £2 over and above the protected property.

4000. (Chairman.) While the order is current do the creditors have in any way to substantiate their claims or do they just come and say who they are and get the money?—I presume they produce the paper. As long as they keep their address on the file, the Court will communicate with them when there is 5s. in the £ or whatever they are being paid. They come up and they produce the paper.

4001. (Mr. Addison.) May I ask on this question of there being any assets against which execution could issue—that is very rare is not it?—I am afraid that it is very rare.

4002. Would the distribution of the proceeds of execution be in addition to the proceeds of the composition?—Oh no, because it is issued by the registrar.

4003. (Mr. Peat.) The composition would be based on the fact that the man had certain assets and certain prospects of earning?—Yes, it is generally really made upon his prospects of future earnings.

4004. (Chairman.) Then when the whole amount is paid I see the final order says that he is discharged from the debt so that it operates as a regular discharge.

4005. (Mr. Peat.) But only from the scheduled debts?—Only from the scheduled debts.

4006. (Chairman.) That I think takes us through the proceeding?—Yes.

4007. Now perhaps you would kindly tell us what your suggestions are in the matter?—To do that I should begin with the section itself and go right through it. It begins by saying, "Where a judgment has been obtained in a County Court and the debtor is unable to pay the amount forthwith and alleges that his whole indebtedness amounts to a sum not exceeding £50." Now I should suggest that the obtaining of a judgment should be carefully considered as to whether it might not be deleted, because I cannot see any reason why a man should not be able to come and apply for an administration order before he has got actually any judgment against him at all because it may be that the people will not sue for some time, and a judgment only adds to the expense and difficulty. I imagine that that was put in because it was suggested that the man would come and get an order made when he had a verdict against him. That is how it is that the order has to be made in an action. Then it also gives the debtor if he has several judgments against him an opportunity of to some extent preferring one of these, because the man in whose action he chooses to head his application gets his costs paid in full. Again, I cannot quite see any reason why it should only be obtained after a judgment in the County Court. On an inferior court judgment like the Lord Mayor's Court you cannot get an administration order, and you cannot even get an administration order on a judgment of the High Court. Therefore I suggest that if it was right to continue these administration orders in cases only where there is a judgment that at any rate it should be the judgment of any court, but I would suggest that it would be far better that a debtor should be able to obtain an administration order if the judge of the court thought it right to grant him one in a case where he was indebted and could not pay his debts in full forthwith.

4008. Would you take any means of ascertaining that he really is a poor debtor? I mean we have had instances given to us here of people who make themselves out to be much worse off than they are really in order to conceal assets. Is there any cross-examination of the debtor to find out that he has disclosed his assets?—There is now the advantage that in the paper sent out to the creditors this information is given, namely that the debtor says that he is of such an age, that his wages are so much, that his goods are of such a value, and the creditors are people who generally know most and who can give the best information. Then the judge can cross-examine the debtor and ask him any questions. I have known more than one case in which it has come out from questions suggested by creditors that the man does owe many debts that he has not brought in. In those cases it is a mere slip he is allowed to amend. If it is a case of deliberately keeping out his debts he is not allowed to do so, but I think as a rule, they are kept out more because the man has not been worried for them for the last three or four years and that people have treated them as bad debts. Very often I think he has forgotten them or has pretended to forget them so as to bring himself within the £50.

4009. Then what was your next suggestion?—My next suggestion comes still under sub-section 1, that the £50 should be increased. I would suggest that it should be made at least £100 and probably even more, because the most hopeless person that I come across in the shape of a debtor is the person who is too poor to be made a bankrupt, who is too much indebted to take advantage of these Administration Orders and who at the same time cannot afford the sum which I am told comes to about something like £12 or £14 to makehimself a bankrupt. The worst cases are people who with the idea of helping their husbands have started small shops and things of that kind, because by the time they have paid the rent of their shop and one thing or another, unless they are very experienced and very careful not to give credit or to give very little credit they find themselves over head and ears in debt before they know where they are. Then they fail, and then down come any number of actions against them by people who have supplied them with goods in these little shops.

4010--11. And if they cannot come under this section or file their petition in bankruptcy do they just get sent to prison under judgment summonses?—Then it depends on their success in keeping the creditors at arm's length. If the creditor has a judgment summons out against them and they speak up and show they have not got means they will not be committed, but the difficulty very often arises in this respect that they may not be able, if they are bona fide hard up, to get to the court. For instance in my court at Shoreditch the traders in that district send goods all over England—furniture, walking sticks, and every kind of article. If you look at the returns you will find that the default summonses in Shoreditch are probably higher than, or at any rate as high as, in any court in England, and the reason of that is because there are such a large number of small manufacturing businesses. Of course furniture is the principal thing, but there are also walking sticks. There is also the British Tea Table Company and people of that kind who sell tea and those sort of things and they issue catalogues and send them all over England. A man writes up to the district—to Shoreditch—for goods. Therefore as the contract or the material part of the contract is the receiving and accepting, the contract in Shoreditch, the cause of action arises in the Shoreditch Court. Vendors also take care to make the place of payment in Shoreditch, and that has been held by the Court of Appeal to be a substantial part of the cause of action. Consequently I have a great many judgment summonses in the court against people who live perhaps 100 miles from London, and it is always extremely difficult then to be quite certain that one is doing justice, because in nine cases out of ten the people do not appear, and cannot appear. Of course in these cases that we have at Shoreditch they are really honest sales of goods, where the man ought to have the money to pay, if he has not it, but there are businesses carried on where there are very doubtful sorts of dealing. There is one that I have got in my mind in a Midland town where a firm carried on such an enormous business all over England that in the county court in that town they actually had a separate set of books on purpose for the firm's cases, and for nobody else's. We will not mention names, but that firm did an enormous business. I am bound to say that the firm's information with reference to their debtors was most accurate and very carefully got together. Of course one could see that it would be very difficult for men to come from different parts of the country to answer judgment summons.

4012. If you extended the limit and debtors could present petitions like that the manufacturer of Shoreditch would have to go all over the place to prove his claim, would not he ?—You see the mere putting in the names in the schedule is a proof.

4013. Yes, I see ?—So that as long as they entered him correctly he would not have to do that, and if he had anything to represent to the court, he could do it either by letter or, in a serious case, he could do it by affidavit. So, of course, could the debtor send up an affidavit, but it is so very, very seldom that they do, and when they do it is hardly satisfactory.

4014. So that your honour's recommendation would be to raise the limit ?—To raise the limit to at least £100 ; I think that would bring in nearly all the people, but it is men who try to run a little business that have a very hard time of it afterwards.

4015. Then what was your next suggestion ?—I do not think that there is anything until we come to this 4th Sub-section and there the only suggestion I should make would be that that should be made a little plainer as to what really is meant, but I think it is a valuable thing that the man's home should be protected because once it goes the man becomes a wastrel. If he has got an administration order it means that if he has been paying on several judgment summones you have to reduce the order to try and push it through. Then Sub section 5 is "When the order is made no creditor shall have any remedy against the person or property of the debtor in respect of any debt which the debtor has notified to a County Court, except with the leave of that County Court, and on such terms as that Court may impase ; and any County Court or inferior Court in which proceedings are pending against the debtor in respect of any such debt shall, on receiving notice ofthe order, stay the proceedings." One cannot quite understand why the High Court has been cut out of the sub-section. I suppose the idea was that people who had an action against them in the High Court would have debts above the amount ; but as a person who can recover judgment under Order 14 could do so for £22, and get his costs upon the High Court scale, one cannot see why it should not apply to every court. Of course if the standard is raised from £50 to £100 there would be all the more reason for that alteration. Then the next one is Sub-section 6, "If the debtor makes default in payment of any instalment payable in pursuance of any order under this section, he shall, unless the contrary is proved, be deemed to have had since the date of the order the means to pay the sum in respect of which he has made default and to have refused or neglected to pay the same." "The date of the Order" is not very happily worded (but that I suppose you would not trouble about) because the question would be whether he has had, since the last instalments, the means of paying the sum offered. I would suggest—possibly some people may be horrified at it—that seeing the great advantages that a debtor gets—how he can, as I pointed out to the Committee a short time ago, hold his creditors at arm's length and pay only half the number of instalments—that he should be liable to have a warrant issued against him forthwith. It seems to be carrying this sub-section to its logical conclusion. He is deemed to have means, and if he is deemed to have means then he is not obeying the order or carrying out the order. As it is now the officer of the court cannot forthwith issue the warrant. On the other hand, I would suggest that the debtor should be given every opportunity either before the due date of the instalment or after the due date, or before the warrant is issued or after the warrant is issued, or even after he is taken and lodged in gaol—by affidavit or some other means, of applying to the Registrar or to the judge for a stay of proceedings. I should make it so that he could apply to either, so that there would be no fear of his not being able to get a hearing at once. Then, of course, the Registrar could either adjourn it until the judge came, or give him a stay in the meantime or not. But as it is now—as I understand the administration order—the debtor is in a very strong position because no proceeding can be taken without the leave of the Registrar by execution on the part of any creditor under the order, and no proceedings can be taken by execution or otherwise that will be effective by subsequent creditors. When he gets such tremendous protection as that I think it is not unreasonable that the "deeming" to have means should be carried out to its logical conclusion and that the warrant should issue as of course. It would make a very considerable difference to the creditors. It would bring a man up to the mark very much quicker because at present (see Answer to 3988) he has only got to carry his instalment in his pocket and so far from being damnified by being tapped on the shoulder by the bailiff he really has not the trouble of carrying his money up to the Court ; he makes the bailiff carry it up for him. The next suggestion I should venture to make is under Sub-section 8. That sub-section reads thus : "Money paid into Court under the order shall be appropriated first in satisfaction of the costs of the plaintiff in the action." Now if my suggestion was taken (see Answer 4007) that would be done away with. "Next in satisfaction of the costs of administration (which shall not exceed 2s. in the £ on the total amount of the debts) and then in liquidation of debts in accordance with the order." Now I would suggest that the costs of administration—that is the fees that are paid to the Treasury—should be taken on the amount paid to the creditors and as and when so paid. I do not think that the 2s. in the £ is at all too much in cases where the man pays his debts in full, but I think it would be almost better to make a sliding scale in some other way to raise the amount and to take it pari passu with the creditors and on the amount paid to the creditors or some. I brought the Blue-book for 1905, giving the Return of County Courts (Plaints and Sittings), with m. ecause I think it contains some useful information upon this point. If you turn to pages 148 to 149 you will find this :—that durin; the year 1905, £13,263 was paid for costs of administration. The amount paid to creditors was £36,472 ; so that the fees paid to the Treasury are more than one-third. This I know is rather a thorny question with the Treasury. I should think quite nine years ago I came up to town and spent the whole day at the Treasury. The late Judge Martineau and I were appointed a sort of sub-committee by the Judges' Committee to fight this question with the Treasury, and we had a very warm time, and I am afraid we separated each holding strongly to his opinions, neither having persuaded the other. At any rate I did not persuade the Treasury to reduce the fees, but I think with all due deference to the Treasury, that they might take them pari passu with the creditors —no doubt it would decrease the amount they get, there is no doubt about that. The Treasury say that they make a loss on these orders and that the loss arises in this way. If you will still take these same tables you will find that the number of creditors scheduled upon all the orders that were made in 1905 were 23,931 judgment creditors, and 48,487 non-judgment creditors. Now upon the judgment creditors no fees are paid to Registrars at all, but the 48,487 non-judgment creditors are treated as plaints, and as the plaints in some of the Courts fix the salary of the Registrar they proportionately in those Courts raise his salary. The salaries of the Registrars are fixed by Sections 44 and 45 of the County Court Acts of 1888. Of course there is a minimum for Courts under 200 plaints. That I think we may set aside, but once you get beyond that the Registrars' salary is increased £4 for every twenty-five plaints, or in other words £16 for every 100 plaints up to 6,000. After 6,000 the Registrar gets a fixed salary which is such as the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor think is right. Thus, as regards all the non-judgment creditors that are scheduled to an administration order in Courts which have less than 6,000 plaints, it costs the Treasury a very considerable amount, £16 for every 100 of them, but once it gets beyond 6,000 there is no increase in the Registrar's fees. For instance, at Derby, where we had a large number, there is absolutely no increase at all for the Registrar's fees whether there are twenty, or whether there are 2,000 creditors put into the administration orders. And if the Return is looked at it will be seen that a very large number of the non-judgment creditors must be deducted. For instance, I went through the first twenty-five circuits and you will see from the Return that each of the Courts that are ticked are where there are over 6,000 plaints, and some of them have a very considerable number of creditors upon these orders. For instance, the last one that strikes me, and I am bound to say it is one of the best of this list, is Bradford. The total number of applications in 1905 was 210, the total number of orders made 196 ; the judgment creditors were 670 ; non-judgment creditors were 1,466 ; so that Bradford being over 6,000 plaints that would add nothing to the Registrar's salary. Just the same with Ashton-under-Lyne ; there are 764—that would add nothing—and Manchester and Salford, the one was 939 and the other was 988, would add nothing. That of course——

4016. (Chairman.) Would all go into the pocket of the Treasury ?—Would all go into the pocket of the Treasury. I take my old circuit—19, as a sort of test and it is a pretty fair one for this reason, that there were a considerable number of administration orders at all the Courts, but Derby, Chesterfield, and Burton were the only three that were over 6,000. Taking the whole circuit there were 2,541 non-judgment creditors in the year 1905, but of those 1,948 were in Derby, 954, Chesterfield, 496, Burton, 543, so that deducting that from the 2,500 it brought out 543 non-judgment creditors upon which the Registrar of those Courts would be paid at the rate of £16 per 100 non-judgment creditors.

4017. (Mr. Peat.) About 3s. for each non-judgment creditor, is not it ?—It comes to £87 13s. and the costs of administration collected in No. 19, in the Derbyshire Court, as it is called, was £625. And that was for the costs of administration. For the creditors there were collected £2,521. If you add £2,521 and £625 together that comes to £3,146. Now the Treasury do a very good thing indeed and that is, that they allow 2½ per cent. to the person having the conduct of the order upon what he collects. In Derby it is marvellously well managed, that part of it. That is really the mainspring of what makes it go so well in Derby. There is a very competent young man who is a clerk in the office appointed to have the management of this, and he gets a considerable proportion. 2½ per cent. on £3,146 collected will come to £78 13s. He gets a good proportion of that, but all the other clerks, and even the bailiffs get something. The consequence is that every clerk and every bailiff in the place has got a small interest in these orders, and if the bailiffs going about see one of these debtors, who has not sent in his address, and who has not been able to be followed up, the bailiff will go to the clerk and he will say —"I have seen So-and-so, and I find that he is living at So-and-so, and you will have a chance to be down upon him." Taking the £78 13s., which is paid as the 2½ per cent. commission for collecting, and the £87 13s. 7d. paid to Registrars or non-judgment creditors, together come to £166 6s. 7d. So that there is a great margin between that and £625, because while of course there is paper and ink, and possibly some part of the clerk's time to be taken in, there is still a margin there. Therefore I think that something might be done in taking the Treasury fees on the dividends paid to creditors and pari passu with the creditors. For instance, at my two Courts of course they are over 6,000 plaints, there is not a penny of expenditure except for pens and ink. The Blue Book shows the unsatisfactory way in which administration orders work out in London. At Bow the cost of administration last year was £20, and the amount paid to creditors was £12. At Shoreditch the cost of administration was £36, and the amount paid to creditors was £18. At Clerkenwell the cost of administration was £25 and the amount paid to creditors £18. At Brompton they do not flourish there at all, and nothing was paid either in respect of costs of administration or for creditors. At Marylebone the creditors got £6, and the costs of administration were nil. At Westminster the costs of administration were £20, and the creditors got £58. That was the best of the Metropolitan Courts.

4018. (Mr. Peat.) That is 25 per cent.

4019. (Witness.) It would be far better, as I have said before—I am afraid I am repeating myself a little—if the fees were larger and taken pari passu with the creditors. In the first place it disgusts the creditors to find the dividends are postponed, but it does what I think is almost worse than that; it ties the judges' hands so tremendously, for this reason:—If a man persistently will not pay, the only thing a Judge can do is to cancel his order. Of course if he has not paid up his instalments you could commit him, but you can also cancel his order. Now, after a man has had an order for some little time, and he has just paid the costs of the plaintiff and he is just beginning to pay the administration costs off, if you cancel the order what is the result ? Some portion of the administration costs are kept by the Treasury, but the unfortunate creditors do not get one single penny after being postponed for perhaps two years. Now I will just call your attention to this case to which I have already called your attention; it is a poor case. You see practically the creditors will get nothing for a long time. The creditors will not get anything until forty-six months have expired. Now case No. 181 is a good case, the case where the man was an engine-driver. I have got the papers here. He was ordered to pay £1 a month. The Court fees—that is the administration costs and theplaintiffs' fees—only amount to £2 14s., so that if he pays at all regularly at the end of the four months the creditors will begin to get money. There is not any very great complaint in a case of that kind.

4020. (Mr. Peat.) May I look at the papers for this case of the engine-driver (document handed.)

4021. (Witness.) Now here is one which will show you how the money has been dragged out of the debtor. The order was for £1 10s. a month. He paid it for two months—April and May—I think you will find it was made in March. Then he did not pay in June, and he did not pay in July; and then, on July 5th, a judgment summons was issued against him, which came on for hearing on July 29th. It was a judgment summons for £1 10s. because only one month was due; he paid that without issue of the warrant. The result is that by September 5th—that is when he paid—he had only paid three months instalments when he ought to have paid April, May, June, July, and August. He did not pay again, so a judgment summons was issued on November 6th, returnable on December 16th. On December 16th he was committed for twenty-one days, but the committal was suspended for a month. That would be January 16th. In January he paid the £3. You see he ought to have paid September, October, November, December and January. He pays in January £3, only two instalments instead of the five he should have paid according to the order. Then, again, he does not pay and on February 18th another judgment summons goes out. Again he is committed for twenty-one days; suspended for a month. The judgment summons is issued for £1 10s. on April 15th. He avoids service until May 8th and then is caught. So that you see it is a very long time. Then on May 18th, after committal, he pays £1 10s. Then on August 25th he pays again £3 after another committal. Then after another committal he pays on December 11th £1 10s. and the same again in February, and he pays in April £3. In June he is committed and in August 13th he pays £1 10s. Perhaps you would like to see that. That is Cosen's Case. That is one of those that I handed over to you.

4022. (Chairman.) So that the upshot of that is that your Honour recommends that it would be advisable to make the fees perhaps higher, but to be paid pari passu ?—Yes, to be paid pari passu ? But I think, if the Treasury were to look into it carefully they would find that the present fees would be sufficient remuneration for the amount of money collected.

4023. Of course one feels that £600 costs for realising and distributing £2,500 of assets is rather large ?—Yes, because it is not like having to bring actions and cases of that kind; all the money got out of these debtors is by means of judgment summonses. Perhaps I may say here, as far as I can judge, if judgment summonses were done away with I do not think that the administration order in one case out of a hundred would ever be carried through, in fact I do not think that one in a thousand would be carried through. I say that because I know that applications have been made by divers societies and divers persons to the Lord Chancellor either to do away with or, at any rate, greatly modify judgment summonses.

4024. Then we proceed to the next one ?—Then the next suggestion is Sub-section 12. To a great extent I have dealt with that before in speaking of that case of Pearson v. Wilcock. There the creditor is postponed. I think, therefore, if he is postponed, certainly at the end of the first schedule the whole of the creditors of the debtor—not only those of the second schedule but of all the other creditors if any—should be called together and that then he should have to face them and satisfy the court that the order under which he had previously been paying was still a just and proper order. It might be that it ought to be increased, it might be that it ought to be diminished. I think that practically ends the principal suggestions that I have got to make upon this section. But the great alterations I should like would be first, that a judgment should not be necessary, so that a man might be encouraged to come into court before he was hopelessly insolvent. In the second place, that on non-payment a warrant should be able to be issued promptly so as to keep the debtor up to the mark and make him understand that it really is a serious thing. And thirdly, that the administration order should be increased to cases of £100. Fourthly, that the costs of the administration should be collected and paid pari passu with the money and on the amount paid to the creditors instead of being paid first and paid on the amount of the debts due to the creditors.

12 Dec., 1906.

4025. (Chairman.) I am sure we are all greatly indebted to your Honour for your most lucid statement. Might I go a little further now and ask if your Honour's attention has been directed to our particular terms of ot reference ?—Yes, they were sent to me and I have read them—it is a thorny subject.

4026. Just to put the thing quite briefly. I think it would be a great advantage to us if we could have your Honour's view as to the law for punishing a debtor. It has been pointed out to us that it is practically inoperative because a bad debtor does not care whether he gets a discharge or not ?—Certainly, with reference to discharge it is most unsatisfactory because I know of my own knowledge a great number of people who are trading either themselves or in their wives names who are undischarged bankrupts. One suggestion I would make would be this that one of the things that an undischarged bankrupt would have to do would be that every three months he should furnish a balance sheet to his trustees of what he was doing because one does occasionally see and read in the newspapers of undischarged bankrupts living in very fine style, and I think that the debtor ought to show how that comes about. But it also will, I think, be a very useful thing because there is a great deal of trading done by undischarged bankrupts which the trustees have no means of knowing about. Very often, I suppose, the trustees don't know where the man is to be found.

4027. And you would make disobedience to that section a contempt of court ?—Yes, a contempt of court—which the creditor could at once proceed to get a commitment for.

4028. (Mr. Addison.) By the County Court Judge ?—By the Bankruptcy Judge, I presume.

4029. (Chairman.) Have you any other suggestions upon that ?—Another suggestion I should make would be this: What I find in Shoreditch to be particularly rife—because there are a great number of small traders—foreigners a great many of them—being trading by undischarged bankrupts in the name of their wives, and that should, if possible, be put a stop to. I would suggest that where a husband purchases goods for his wife's business, the wife's business should be liable even if credit has been given to the husband, and even when judgments have been obtained against the husband. A very striking case of that sort came before me, showing the extent to which it is carried on. Execution had been levied upon some machinery which was in a cellar under a building where business was carried on, which the wife said was her separate business. On interpleader was the first time the case came before me, because the building happened to be within the limits of my court. I found that the history of the case was this. The husband was an undischarged bankrupt. He went and purchased some machines for use in the wife's business. He was sued for the machines in the Clerkenwell Court. He appeared and defended on the ground that the machines were not up to sample, that they were useless and so on, and there was a long trial lasting some hours. The Judge found against him and the plaintiff got judgment for his money. He then went to levy execution, found the wife in a little counting house and she came out and claimed everything. Then she produced a deed which showed that some small amount of stock at the time of the bankruptcy had been purchased with money of hers. The creditor having had information said he would like to look at the cellar. There he found the machines which he himself had sold to the husband and for the price of which he had got judgment. The interpleader was to decide whether these very machines, for the price of which the man had defended the action, and which he had bought and not paid for were not the wife's. As no actual receipt for the purchase of these by the wife from the husband was produced, I decided that the title was once in him, and I saw nothing to shew that the title was not still in him. I therefore held that the execution was good. But you see that if she could have proved a bona fide sale by her husband to her, she could have held those goodsas against the very man who had sold them to her husband and who had never been paid a penny for them. There was another case before me of a gentleman who had an initial "P," I could give his other name as well if necessary. The wife had also the initial P—she was Polly and he was Philip. He had purchased plenty of goods at different times, and the first time he appeared in my Court was on a judgment against him obtained in the Romford Court. Execution was put in in the wife's shop—which was in my district—and immediately all was claimed by the wife. In that case she succeeded because practically the solicitor who appeared in the action threw up the sponge. He began by asking me to amend the judgment by putting the name "Mrs. Polly" instead of "Mr. P." Of course that I could not do because it was not a judgment of my own Court. If a man sued and recovered judgment in one name I could not alter it to another, so that practically he admitted that those goods were Mrs. Polly's. Enquiries were made by creditors, and the high bailiff, the next time he went there, was given certain instructions. Then came another interpleader which was before me, where a judgment has also been obtained against Mr. P. in my own Court. He came up and said that he did owe this money, but that he carried on an independent business from his wife, that there were separate doors and that his goods went in at one door and his wife's in at another. When we came to enquire into it—because I had had a hint from the high bailiff about it—we found that to get to the husband's alleged place of business one had to pass through the shop door, then to pull up a ring in the floor to go down a ladder, and when one got down one found a number of hens running about in a coop and nothing else. So that we disposed of that, because it was perfectly clear that the husband and wife were both trading, only he always set up the defence that the business was the wife's when he was sued. From enquiry I found that he had himself recovered judgment in the Court over and over again for goods sold in that very shop, and that at that very moment there were two men in jail who had been put there for debts which he had proved on judgments obtained in his own name. The result was that a very short time after that the high bailiff got £137 for different creditors out of these people. Since that I have not heard much of them. I venture to suggest that a married woman who trades should be compelled to trade in a name which would show the creditor that he was doing business with a female or that she should if she traded in merely an official name, add the words "married woman" on her billheads and other papers. I find now that it is a very very common thing for trading to be done in names such as "Universal Stores" or "Clothing Stores" or "Boot Stores" or "The A 1 Clothing Stores," or something like that kind, and it is almost impossible then to know who is the defendant. There was a case tried before me the other day where the action was brought against "The Clothing Stores" or some name of that kind. A man appeared and he said, "I have had this served upon me," I said "Do you owe the money." He said, "No, I do not." I said, "Are you the Clothing Stores." And he said, "Yes, but I am only the Clothing Stores after a certain date." It was found that "A" had been owner of "The Clothing Stores" up to a certain date, then "B" had been owner between two dates and "C," the man who appeared before me, was the owner at the present time, and yet I was told that the man by whom the order was given and who had been "The Clothing Stores" at the time that it was given was actually serving in the shop. Whether that is true or not I do not know. I think it is very likely that I shall hear more about it, because the plaintiffs are going to issue execution on "The Clothing Stores." They came and asked me to allow them to issue execution forthwith when one or two days were still unexpired, so I have no doubt that we shall hear more more about it. There are a number of men who are undischarged bankrupts who are carrying on business under names such as The Clothing Stores. It has been suggested to me that something ought to be done to make trading by a debtor who is insolvent an offence, but that would be extremely difficult. I do not see how that could be done, because there are very few of the small traders who really know how they stand.

4030. Are you able to give us any other suggestion ?—I am afraid I cannot give you any other suggestion, because it is a most difficult subject to deal with, but I think the Married Women's Property Act has certainly been used in a great many cases to cheat and defraud creditors.

4031. (Chairman.) Would you, Mr. Addison, like to ask his Honour any questions.

4032. (Mr. Addison.) I am very grateful indeed to his Honour. I do not know that I need ask any questions, unless he can answer me on one point. It is suggested that the power of penal punishment should be given to the Court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy ?—Yes ?

4033. Have you any view on the subject as to how that could be given, say, by the County Court judge, having jurisdiction in bankruptcy ?—Would you suggest that the whole case should be tried before him, because that, I am afraid—I have had some experience in prosecuting bankrupts for taking away goods and offences of that kind—would be a very long proceeding. I am afraid that if you threw that upon the county court judges having bankruptcy jurisdiction, they would find it extremely difficult to do their ordinary work. I daresay you have had a good deal of experience in those cases, but I think as a rule you will find that a prosecution of that kind means not only one day, but generally a good part of two days.

4034. It has been suggested that in the case of a trader not keeping reasonable books of account, it should be made an offence which could be summarily dealt with by the Court having bankruptcy jurisdiction, and that the second offence should be trading with knowledge of insolvency ?—Yes, well, as to the non-keeping of books, it would be a rather difficult thing. I am afraid we would find that nine-tenths of the small traders do not keep books which really disclose a man's position. I have had the most marvellous books brought before me at different times in the County Court. I do not know whether they ever make balance sheets or anything of that kind.

4035. We have had a large body of evidence before us, urging that that should be made an offence ?—I think there are some cases in which it certainly ought to be an offence, because there are cases where men really do know, and had known for some time, that they were insolvent, but there are such a number of small traders who really do not know whether they are insolvent or not, that I think a very great deal of discretion would have to be given to the judge if that was to be treated as a criminal offence. It would be an exceedingly difficult jurisdiction to administer.

4036. Would there be any difficulty in the conduct of a prosecution—who should conduct it, and how it should be conducted ?—I suppose that the nominal prosecutor would probably be the trustee, and it would have to be put into the hands of a solicitor who would probably have to instruct counsel. Prosecuting is generally a long and elaborate performance.

4037. That would throw a great deal of extra work on the County Court ?—It would throw a great deal of extra work upon it. I do not think that, worked as they are now, it would be possible for them to do it. The difficulty with the County Court is this, that each day you have your business to do for that day. If you do not finish your business that day it is very difficult to get any opportunity of trying the cases that are thrown over for another month. So that if you found on a Monday morning one of those bankruptcy cases which would take you perhaps till Tuesday evening, there would be the whole of the Monday's work and Tuesday's work which would have to go, goodness knows where. That is one of the great difficulties. In the High Court these are now tried at the Assizes or the Central Criminal Court, where the judge is simply there to try prisoners, and where the list is taken until it is finished.

4038. The complaint is that the machinery is very dilatory, very uncertain, and very expensive ?—I think it is very expensive, and it is very cumbersome. That is just the same with perjury. The proceedings in perjury are extremely cumbersome, and the consequence is that except it is a very clear case, there seldom are prosecutions for it.

4039. I have listened to you with great respect. You think that there would be great difficulty in imposing that criminal jurisdiction on the County Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction ?—There certainly would unless the Courts are given a great deal more elbow than they are given now.

4040. (Mr. Peat.) Would your honour be so kind as to tell me what your inference is as to the number of administration orders which are worked through complete ? —The place where most are worked through that I know of is Derby and there certainly a considerable number are worked through. The Registrar at Derby would probably be able to give you some valuable information on that. I will write and ask him about it if you cared and I could send you the letter and you could judge whether you thought it worth your while to summon him or not.

His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.

4041. (Chairman.) Mr. Peat, just before we began I received from the County Court Judge of Lambeth a statement by his Registrar of the whole number of Administration Orders, the amount received and the number of those which were worked out and which were not worked out. I have also a similar statement from the Registrar of the Brighton Court. Both of those statements I received very recently and I am proposing to mention them and have them circulated to the Committee a little later on.

4043. That answer is quite enough. It accords with my own opinion and I should not ask you I think for further details. When you say that a request is not always followed by an Administration Order what is the usual cause why a request for an Administration Order is not granted ?—Very often because it is found that the debts exceed £50. Sometimes the man's debts run up to £45 or £48 and then some creditor comes in and says, "You owe me £8 and not £2 5s." and the man thereupon produces out of his pocket a bill showing £2 5s. Then the creditor says, "Oh, yes, but if you will remember there was an old account on which you had been paying me 1s. a month or 2s. a month for some time, which I closed about three years ago which latterly you have paid nothing upon and thereupon I had to sue you," or something of that kind. It very often happens in that way. I do not think that it is done so much in London, but it was a very common thing indeed down in Derbyshire. Generally when a new account was opened the creditor was rather anxious that the man should deal with him and the debtor was only too willing to deal, and this went on until about £6 or £8 was due. Then the creditor used to draw a line and say, "Now I will not allow you any further credit, you must pay in cash." Then that went on for a month or two and then gradually the second account credit would begin to work up and then perhaps a new line would be drawn and a third account would be opened. Then an action would be brought on the whole of the three accounts. That is the way I think it very often arises.

4044. Is there any means of checking the claims which are sent in ?—To check whether the debts are due.

4045. Or whether they are overstated or under-stated or whether there are any remitted ?—There are no means that I know of except that the creditors are there. The creditors will sometimes come and give some information about that and say, "So and so has relations, a brother-in-law, a sister or some one else, and then we inquire into it.

4046. But if the debtor and the creditor both agree that there is £10 due to the creditor there is no investigation to show whether it is or is not due ?—No.

4047. Pardon me asking you another question about a man's conduct. Now I find in one of these cases which you have been so kind as to pass over to me, a man from Newcastle-on-Tyne. You refer to that case in some observations you have made. He is a surgeon ?—Yes.

4048. He says that he sold his practice to his wife three years ago. He gives no information as to what he got for it or what he did with the money. He migrates to London where he does not do particularly well, and one of his Newcastle creditors writes to state this [reading letter] He sold his busines to his wife in Newcastle and went to London. Now what investigation as to the conduct of that man was made before an Order was made that he was to pay 2s. in the £ for an unlimited period practically. The date of that letter is the 8th of February, 1906. In January, 1906, an application for the Order was made, and the Order itself is made on the 2nd of February, 1906 ?—What date is the letter.

4049. That letter is dated 8th February, 1906 ?—You see, it came six days afterwards. I have been looking at the letter myself because I did not remember anything about that.

His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.

12 Dec., 1906.

4050. The Order is the 16th of February and the letter is the 8th, but it is not this one case that I am interested in. Here is a man applying for an administration. He alleges in his own application that he was in business as a surgeon in Newcastle, and that he sold his business to his wife; there is no information as to what he earned, or what he did with the money, or what he did with the proceeds of the sale of his business to his wife; no information except a letter from his biggest creditor who supplied goods to him as a surgeon in Newcastle giving information. Is it under such circumstances desirable in your opinion where there is no examination, no investigation as to the amount of the creditors' claims, or as to the debtor's previous transactions and circumstances, that you should increase the limit of those administration orders from £50 to £100—that is to say, in the circumstances is it desirable to bring more cases into the category of cases where no examination takes place either into a man's conduct or into his previous transactions ?—If you look at the creditors you will see that there is one at Newcastle on-Tyne, and the remainder of the creditors are nearly all of them agreed that the offer he made at the time was the best he could make under the circumstances. You see we had no means of inquiry into this Newcastle-on-Tyne thing. Therefore it seemed to me in the interests of the creditors that they should get what they could.

4051. Your Honour, I am asking with respect to instances where there has been no investigation and no means of investigation into the conduct of the debtor, into the amount of his debts, and into his previous history, and I want to know whether in those circumstances it is desirable to increase the limit from £50 to £100. I do not refer to the question of costs which you have very clearly shown us is a very serious blot on this mode of administration ?—I think it is for this reason—if they are not brought in there is still no investigation and there they remain. A judgment summons is obtained against the debtors and it may possibly be that they go to jail, but each judgment summons takes so much money out of the creditors' pocket, and if it is paid it takes so much money out of the debtors' pocket in addition to what he owes. Some of those people come with four, five, and six judgment summonses or orders which they cannot possibly comply with. It seems to be a waste of money more than anything else going against people who have got debts say of £60 or £70 who are only making perhaps 18s. or 20s. a week.

4052. I think you referred to the question of the compulsion upon a debtor to seek the protection of the Court. You pointed out that under the present Act he must have a judgment summons against him ?—He must have a judgment in the County Court—it need not be a judgment summons.

4053. That makes it, or appears to me to make it, a matter for the creditor to decide, whether that man is to obtain protection from the Court or not, and I should ask you, do you think it desirable that men in the position of the greater number of the people who seek that protection should be entitled to come in on their own account but without any pressure from anybody and do this—seek the protection of the Court which gives them an undisputed right to £20, that is whatever the value of their assets may be—which gives them an absolute immunity for a number of years except in regard to the £1 a month or whatever it is which they are ordered to pay, and which has no publicity attached to it, except I suppose some notice or other in the County Court, which enables these people to go on and contract debts as heretofore without any intimation to the men they are trading with that they are subject to an administration order. Is it prudent under these circumstances to say to a small debtor such as that, "Oh yes, come when you like, do not come when you are pressed"?—He may come, but then a notice is sent to every single one of his creditors.

4054. Scheduled creditors ?—Scheduled creditors.

4055. But not the man whom the debtor does not schedule. That is to say, if he owed a sovereign to me, and a sovereign to Mr. Richardson, he might schedule me, but not Mr. Richardson, and the man next door might go on lending him money or trusting him, unknowing that there was an administration order against him ?—They are published—there is a list of them published in the county court, and I suppose it gets into some of the trade papers. I do not myself read them, so I do not know. All I know is what is to be done with these people. In the case of a large number of judgment summonses, the proceedings really amount to a waste of money, both by the creditor, and the debtor. There is no doubt about it that a certain amount of money is collected for the creditors by means of these administration orders; when you can get the men to come, before they are hopelessly insolvent, a satisfactory amount is collected.

4056. But your Honour, do you find that these men earning £1 a week are ever solvent ?—No, I do not think they are.

4057. A man who is earning £1 a week is never solvent. His furniture is not worth £20, and you cannot take it. His £1 a week he spends most consistently, and whatever debts he contracts are subject to being paid by instalments, or letting the new creditor take the place of the old. I have no other questions.

4058. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to this case of C—— ?—Is he the engine-driver ?

4060. You mentioned that the new creditors, when there is an administration order, have to stand over until the administration order which is in force is completed. The debtor seems to have a right to contract any debts he likes after he has got his order for administration. Would you be inclined to put a bar against him in any way as is done in bankruptcy. In bankruptcy he is limited to £20. While a man was under an administration order, would you limit his power to contract debts ?—There is a limit in that sense, put upon him now. If a debtor contracts a debt of over £2, the person with whom he contracts may apply to the Court to have his order cancelled.

4061. (Chairman.) Perhaps that meets what you wish to get.

4062. (Mr. Richardson.) Yes, I think it does.

4063. (Witness.) But I certainly think it would do no harm especially since that decision of the Court of Appeal, if it was made more stringent, if he ran up new debts, because that case does put him in a very strong position indeed.

4064. Would you bar him from contracting any debt at all ?—Yes.

4065. With regard to book-keeping there is just one question that I want to ask you. I daresay you have found many times that books have been kept by educated people for a series of years, and properly audited, and balance sheets got out for years, and then for the one year prior to bankruptcy, evidently with a view to mystifying their transactions, they have ceased to keep accounts or have kept them in a very bad fashion. Do not you think that those people should undoubtedly be punished, with some term of imprisonment—seven days or fourteen days ?—Of course it is a very thorny subject, because one knows that so many of the poorer people are not able to keep books.

4066. I am speaking of business people ?—But how could you draw the line—it would be difficult to legislate for one class of people.

4067. I am saying if they had kept them and ceased to keep them. In a business that I am connected with I have found that people able to keep books and who have kept them properly for a series of years cease to do so, and that in the last year before their bankruptcy there is no record kept of stock so that the trustee cannot trace what stock a man has had—he cannot trace what he has sold and he cannot trace what cash he has had because his books have been improperly kept. I say that to such persons it should be absolutely certain that there should be punishment. They would keep books then at least in some fashion.

4068. (Chairman.) You were asking his Honour the question ?

4069. (Mr. Richardson.) Yes, I would ask his Honour the question.

4070. (Witness) Yes, I must say I would like to see a man of that kind punished, and I think he deserves to be, but the difficulty would be this, that I do not see how you could exactly frame a penal section with reference to a man who had kept books and who had ceased to do so. It would be putting a man who had kept books for a certain time in a worse position than a man who had kept no books at all, and it would be rather hard to do that.

4071. I think the tendency is to insist on books of some kind being kept by every trader—at least a Bought and Sold Book ?—It certainly would be a very good thing, if such a thing could be done. I am afraid the difficulty would be that you would hit a great number of people whom the law was not intended to hit, and that you would miss the one that the law was intended to hit.

His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.

4072. (Mr. Richardson.) It would be in the discretion of the Court ?—Yes.

4073. (Chairman.) I do not think that we ought to close our sitting to-day without thanking his Honour not only for his very lucid statement, but for the very great pains which his Honour has taken in affording us the information which he has done, and putting it in such an extremely interesting and connected form. It is a compliment which has not been too often paid to us during these sittings, and I think we may appreciate it all the more.

4074. (Mr. Addison.) I agree—I know something about Section 122 now.

4075. (Witness) I am sure it has been a great pleasure for me to come here.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 19th December, 1906.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., D.L., J.P.,
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. FRANCIS JOHN SIMS, called; and Examined.

4076. (Chairman.) This gentleman is Chief Clerk to the Director of Public Prosecutions and has come to kindly give us his assistance on the subject of prosecutions in bankruptcy cases.

Mr. Francis J. Sims.
19 Dec., 1906.

4077. I think that you have been engaged for about twenty-five years in the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions ?—Yes, for upwards of twenty-five years.

4078. I think that during the greater part of that period you have had to conduct prosecutions ordered by the different Courts which have bankruptcy jurisdiction ? —Yes, I have.

4079. And so you can give us the benefit of your experience ?—Yes.

4080. The Committee have had a memorandum from the Director of Public Prosecutions sent by instruction of the Attorney-General. Will you tell me if I am right in saying that what the Director of Public Prosecutions rather recommends is that he should have a discretion where an order for prosecution is made not to continue the prosecution if he thinks, on reviewing the evidence, that it would not result in a conviction ?—Yes.

4081. Perhaps you could tell us very shortly what, from your experience, is the necessity for that alteration in the law ?—Yes, at present the order to prosecute a debtor is made upon the report of the Official Receiver. It comes to us and we have to investigate the case and consider the evidence with a view to getting the prosecution upon its legs. Practically we have no alternative but to prosecute if the Court orders a prosecution. There is the order and the Director must not disobey it, and it follows that we often have to prosecute in cases in which we are satisfied from the beginning that the prosecution must be an abortive one—that either the sentence will be a purely nominal one, that the man will be bound over in his own recognisances, or more likely than not will be acquitted. Lord Desart wishes to put before the Committee this view that under the Prosecution of Offences Act he has a discretion in every case as to whether or not he will institute a prosecution, or carry on a prosecution. That is a discretion conferred upon him by the Prosecution of Offences Act and he exercises it subject to the control of the Attorney-General, and it is his invariable practice, if he is in doubt as to whether he would be justified in not instituting a prosecution, to take the instructions of the Attorney-General on the point. But subject to that he has that discretion vested in him. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, however, the order to prosecute is imperative, his discretion is absolutely taken away, and he is obliged to prosecute in cases which he knows must fail.

4082. Would it meet the legislative difficulty if the part of Section 166, which says, "the Director of Public Prosecutions shall conduct the prosecution," were simply omitted ?—The Director's view upon that is that sufficient would be done to secure the interests of justice if there were a statutory provision that all orders for prosecution should be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions for consideration as they used to be under the old Act. That it should be for him to decide whether in his discretion as a public functionary it was necessary in the interests of justice that there should be a prosecution, or whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant him in instituting a prosecution.

4083. Would that create any difficulty as regards a trustee in bankruptcy who is ordered to prosecute, or would it require some alteration of Section 16 of the Debtor's Act? —I do not think it would, because under the authority of a letter written by the Lord Chancellor, I think it was in 1876, to the County Court Judges, they were requested when making the order directing the trustee to prosecute the debtor, to direct him verbally or in writing to request the Treasury solicitor to carry out the prosecution. The Treasury solicitor in those days had a discretion as to whether he would, or would not, prosecute. If he considered the evidence was sufficient he would prosecute, and if he did not he did not prosecute, and there was an end of the matter.

Mr. Francis J. Sims.

4084. Then I think you have been good enough to prepare a return showing how many prosecutions have been sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions?—Yes, I have had a return prepared for the years 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905, and down to the present time, and I have also had a summary prepared. Perhaps if I read the summary it will give it in a few words.

4085. Yes, that will be very convenient?—In those six years, or five years and part of another, we have had reported to us 325 cases. We have instituted prosecutions against 358 persons. Of those 358 persons 222 have been convicted, fifty, or one in seven, have been acquitted, three convictions have been quashed by the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases, three bills have been ignored by the grand jury, in three cases the magistrates refused to grant process at all. Thirty-five persons absconded after process had been issued against them and before they could be arrested or summarily dealt with; in one case the Attorney-General entered a nolle prosequi; one case was adjourned sine die, the prisoner being too ill to be brought up; in two cases the orders to prosecute were annulled by the County Court Judge; eleven cases are pending; and in nineteen other cases for various reasons no proceedings were taken. In those cases counsel advised—and if we have any doubt we always go to counsel—that the prosecution could not possibly succeed, or that there were difficulties in the way of getting evidence. That is the summary and those are the detailed figures for each year.

4086. (Chairman.) Perhaps we might have those put in.

4087. Do you think it would be practicable or desirable to shorten the proceedings, that is to say that the Official Receiver might transmit a case direct to the Director of Public Prosecutions?—The Director's view, and mine, if I may say so, is that no practical advantage would be gained by that, because we would have an interim report necessarily incomplete in itself, and in all probability would say, after perusing it, "there is not enough here to justify us in instituting a prosecution—further examination and further investigation are necessary." Practically you would come back to the system at present in force of completing the examination and then getting the order.

4089. I do not know whether it is really a question which I ought to ask you, but I have had a great deal of evidence supporting the idea, that bankruptcy offences should be extended, and that trading with knowledge of insolvency and keeping improper books of account, betting and gambling and so forth might be made criminal. Do you think that would be an advisable thing or not?—As to a man carrying on business when he is insolvent, that would be purely a matter of evidence. It would be difficult to establish the fact to the satisfaction of the jury, unless the man kept books, that at any particular moment he was possessed of knowledge that he was insolvent. I do not know how you would get that evidence. The man would never admit it in his public examination and unless he kept books how could it be done? That is the practical difficulty. With regard to accounting for his deficiencies by saying that he had lost money by betting, that is practically provided for by a section of the Debtors Act, but there again you would have practical difficulties in the way of establishing the fact that the debtor had not as a fact made certain bets. I can call to mind a case from Yorkshire. There there was a very large deficiency on the statement of affairs and the debtor explained at his public examination that he had lost some £500 or £600 in betting. He gave the name of a bookmaker, and the names of certain horses which he said he had backed at certain races. I had two of the inspectors from Scotland Yard for a fortnight in East London trying to find that bookmaker and trying to find whether, as a fact, the debtor had made any bets with him, but we failed to prove that the man had not made bets, and we were advised by counsel that we could not expect to establish any charge upon that branch of the case. It is a matter of practical difficulty. But I quite see that the bankruptcy law might be amended: that it might be within the discretion of the county court judge to suspend a man's discharge for two or three or four years if upon his public examination he explained that his deficiency was due to his having been betting and gambling—to his having been guilty of reckless speculation. In that respect—although you could not expect that Parliament would make it criminal—I think that the law might, if it were necessary, be amended so as to give the county court judges discretion to suspend a man's discharge for two or three years as a punishment for having wasted his assets in that manner.

4090. (Mr. Smith.) May I ask if the Director of Public Prosecutions thinks it desirable that he should undertake all bankruptcy prosecutions?—He is not in love with them. We do them because we are obliged to do them, but I do not see any reason why the solicitor for the Board of Trade should not do them himself, except that it would mean an addition to his staff and there might be financial difficulties in the way.

4091. There are prosecutions, I think, at present undertaken by public departments—even by the Board of Trade in which the Director does not act?—Quite so.

4092. Such as prosecutions for criminal negligence on the part of the captain of the ship?—Yes.

4093. I suppose the director does not act in those cases?—No, he does not.

4094. And with reference to railways?—Yes, railway inquiries, and things of that sort.

4095. You think that he would not object to the removal of that part of his work?—I do not think he would for a moment. You would then have, of course, the department which had been investigating the debtor's affairs conducting the prosecution, and from one point of view, it might be more convenient to concentrate the whole of the work in that way. On the other hand by employing the Director you bring in a fresh mind, and if I may say so—I do not want to use the word in an invidious sense—an unbiased mind, because we should not be likely to be swayed by any view which the official receiver or trustee had taken.

4096. I do not know whether it has occurred to you that there is perhaps a distinction to be drawn between offences under the Bankruptcy Act and ordinary criminal offences, in the sense that one is rather in the nature of criminal negligence?—That is so.

4097. Rather than fraudulent intention?—That is so. The bankrupt at the present day is subject to a more drastic law than even a murderer.

4098. And it has been suggested by various witnesses that a considerable number of offences such as are now capable of being dealt with on the application for discharge, could be dealt with from a quasi criminal point of view, by the bankruptcy judge upon an application for discharge. For instance, it has been suggested that imprisonment for some, say, two weeks, some three weeks, some six weeks, and not exceeding a short period, should be inflicted as a punishment which the bankrupts would really feel to be a punishment, and which would act as a deterrent in cases which did not involve an actual fraudulent intention, but that where there was gross neglect contributing to the bankruptcy, do you think that any of the offences under the Bankruptcy Act should be—— ?—Dealt with by the judge?

4099. Dealt with in a summary way, either by the judge or by summary procedure before a magistrate?—I think that some of them might be dealt with summarily by the police magistrate. I do not think it is at all necessary that every bankrupt should be sent to trial—to the quarter sessions or to the assizes. It would shorten the proceedings, and would effect a very great saving of public money, and would insure prompt dealings with the offender—which is everything in bankruptcy cases—if there were that summary procedure.

4100. I suppose what the Director really feels is this, that in his position he is there to take up serious cases of crime?—Yes.

4101. Affecting the public interest ?—Yes.

4102. And, in fact, it is not his duty to take up cases in which he does not think that public interests are very largely concerned ?—That is exactly it.

4103. I notice in paragraph 2 of the memorandum a statement of the cases in which he institutes criminal prosecutions under the regulations made under the Prosecution of Offences Act ?—Yes.

4104. And under heading "D" he is instructed to prosecute where it appears to the Director "that the offence or circumstances of its commission is or are of such a character that a prosecution thereof is required in the public interests, or that owing to the importance or difficulty of the case or other circumstances the action of the Director is necessary" ?—Yes.

4105. I suppose the converse holds true, that where he does not think that his action is required in the public interest he would not prosecute ?—That is so.

4106. And that might, perhaps, account to some extent for the feeling which undoubtedly exists very largely throughout the country that these bankruptcy offences are not sufficiently prosecuted. The individual creditor feels that he has lost his money and he feels very much aggrieved and he is very angry because a prosecution does not take place. It is possible—it would probably be the case—that if a discretion were granted to the Director and he was acting upon the principles laid down here—which I think are very proper principles in their way, that this feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of the public might continue or be increased ?—I think we should have the same number of cases sent to us in the course of the year, and there would be the same evidence to support them, but the Director would not be called upon to prosecute in a case, as he is now, in which he is perfectly certain in his own mind that there must either be an acquittal, or that the result of a prosecution will be of no value whatever, either as a lesson or as a punishment.

4107. It is rather that latter part of your answer which I want to emphasize—that he desires not only to exercise a discretion with regard to probability of conviction but with regard to the importance of the matter involved ?—Quite so, it must be said that sometimes we have bankruptcy prosecutions which are of an extremely trivial character, and the figures I have handed in, when you come to examine them, will satisfy you that judges regard many of them also from that point of view by the very light sentences they pass. In a case of that sort the Director says, "It is very hard that I am obliged to prosecute in a trivial case of this description, while in more serious cases—not being bankruptcy cases—I have a discretion allowed me."

4108. What is the ground of objection to prosecute in those minor cases and on what ground would you say the Director would refuse to prosecute if the law were altered, as you suggest, in cases where he does prosecute at present?—In such a case, not being a bankruptcy case, he would not prosecute as the "Director of Public Prosecutions" because it would not be a case of "sufficient public importance or difficulty" to warrant his intervention.

4110. Then it practically comes to this that there are certain criminal offences established by the bankruptcy law which are often of such a trivial character that in the judgment of the Public Prosecutor he ought not to be called upon to entertain them ?—That is so, and therefore he ought to have a discretion.

4111. On the other hand if there is a feeling throughout the country that if in those smaller cases some prosecution should take place and some punishment should be administered with a view of deterring others from committing the same offence, then the Public Prosecutor would probably agree in giving the Board of Trade jurisdiction to take up the case ?—Yes, I think so.

4112. (Mr. Richardson.) I would like to ask one or two questions with regard to the summary proceedings. I think it is admitted that there are innumerable offences committed under the Bankruptcy Acts which are never punished at all. The question of book-keeping has been mentioned. It very frequently happens in bankruptcy cases that a man has, or a firm have, kept books properly for a number of years, but immediately preceding bankruptcy have ceased to keep books altogether or have destroyed them evidently with a fraudulent intent. Do you not think that a certain punishment—an absolutely certain punishment—should be given to those people ?—It is already an offence under the Debtors Act of 1869, to falsify or mutilate books within four months preceding the bankruptcy

Mr. Francis J. Sims.

4113. But I was referring to not keeping them properly ?—I do not think you would get Parliament to pass an enactment requiring every person to keep books.

4114. I did not say that, but there are thousands of cases every year of business people, well educated, who have kept books for years and then have ceased to keep them, or have kept them in such a fashion that nobody could prove from them what transactions have taken place for the twelve or eighteen months before bankruptcy. Do not you think that there should be a certain, although a short, term of imprisonment for that ?—I am afraid I cannot answer the question in that way. If it were known that where a man had kept books up to a certain period and then had ceased to keep them, and that if the fact came to the notice of the court, he would be liable to punishment it would result in this, that he would not keep any books at all and the thing would defeat its own object.

4115. Would you not also agree that those who are in a business, and conduct a business, should keep books ? I can quite understand that in cases of small people—people not well educated, and have little grocery businesses, that it may be impossible to expect them to keep books, but do you not think that where the businesses are of some magnitude, that they should be compelled to keep books or suffer imprisonment if they did not ?—I desire to meet you if I can, but I am afraid that that would be quite impracticable.

4116. There is another question of fraudulent procedure in connection with bankruptcy, and that is pawning. It frequently happens—especially in the jewellery trade—that a man will get a number of special things made for him within twelve months of his bankruptcy, and tell the manufacturer that he has got an order for them, but immediately he gets them he goes and pawns them ?—If it should be established that the man had obtained the goods on the representation that he had a customer to whom he was going to sell the article, that would be obtaining goods on false pretences, if it could be shown that no such customer in fact existed, and that the goods were pawned upon delivery. We have those sort of cases repeatedly: disposing of goods obtained from manufacturers. But defendants always set up the custom of the trade. A man may say that he has a customer for them when he obtains them, and intends to redeem them when he thinks his customer wants them, but in the meantime it may be that he files his petition, and the goods are no longer in his possession, but in the possession of the pawnbroker. In such cases he is indicted for having obtained the goods on false pretences.

4117. Can you suggest any way of dealing with it ?—It would be an interference with the custom of the trade all over the country. I did not think I would be asked that question. But it seems to me an improper proceeding.

4118. Do you not think that that custom of trade should be abolished if it covers fraudulent proceedings ?—If the custom of trade is intended to cover fraudulent proceedings I quite agree that it should be abolished, but again you have to look at what Parliament will do in a case of that sort. Parliament is likely to be very chary about interfering with an old-established custom of trade, but as a matter of personal opinion I think it would be desirable to do what you suggest.

4119. (Mr. Chamberlin.) The only question I should like to ask is this—in your first remark you spoke about prosecutions of various cases, and then you said that you should recommend that the suspension of discharge should be withheld. I only want to know whether in your judgment it is considered that the suspension of the discharge of a bankrupt is any punishment at all ?—I do not think it is. In effect all that it does is this—it deprives him for three or four years, or during whatever period the suspension may be for, of the power of obtaining credit for £20 and upwards unless he tells the person from whom he is seeking to obtain that credit that he is an undischarged bankrupt. If he conceals that fact and gets goods on credit to the extent of £20 and upwards, then he commits an offence under the 31st Section. That prospective is hanging over his head for three or four years as the case may be.

Mr. Francis J. Sims.
19 Dec., 1906.

4120. I merely ask that question because a good many witnesses who have come before us have told us that the suspension of discharge is regarded very little indeed by the generality of traders ?—I would not dissent from that statement at all.

4121. (Chairman.) Are there many prosecutions under Section 31 for obtaining credit without disclosing the fact of bankruptcy ?—Oh yes.

4122. Is that the offence which is most common ?—I think it is.

4123. I was going to (if you would not mind) read you a very short note that has been made by one of the registrars of the High Court on the question, in which he says : "I think that the Director of Public Prosecutions should have a discretion as to going on if he thinks there is not a reasonable probability of a conviction by reason of the witnesses not coming up to the mark, or some similar reason ; but I do not think that the Director of Public Prosecutions ought to be allowed to pick and choose which cases he will go on with, because that would make him a court of appeal from the registrar—I mean from the registrar of the High Court—who exercises the jurisdiction of a Judge." Do you think that that would meet with Lord Desart's approval ?—I do not think it would meet Lord Desart's approval. At present, under the Act constituting the office of Director of Public Prosecutions, he has a discretion in every case except murder. In murder cases he must act, but in every other sort of case he has a discretion, subject of course to the controlling opinion and advice of the Attorney-General. As I have said, in doubtful cases we consult counsel, and in very important cases we take the opinion of the Attorney-General as to whether or not there should be a prosecution.

4124. Do all bankruptcy prosecutions come to the Director of Public Prosecutions ?—Yes.

4125. I mean that a trustee does not prosecute on his own account ?—No, under the 166th Section they all come to us.

4126. Do you take the costs out of the estate ?—No, we take the county allowance. The State pays the costs of the prosecution and we take the county allowance in aid.

4127. You do not get anything out of the estate of the bankrupt ?—Nothing, we even have to pay the trustees their expenses for assisting us. That is rather an anomaly. The trustee gets the order to prosecute, and if we invoke his assistance we have to pay for it.

4128. Then does the county allowance really cover the cost of the prosecution ?—Oh, no, not one-tenth of it.

4129. Where does the balance come from ?—Out of the Consolidated Fund.

4130. So that bankruptcy prosecutions involve some considerable charge ?—Yes. I could give you the figures if you wanted them for some years.

4131. Yes, very much ?—They range from £3,800 in 1887 down to £1,478 last year, but the average would be I suppose about £2,200.

4132. That is what is charged to the Vote ?—That is what is charged to the Vote.

4133. (Mr. Richardson.) That is a small amount.

4134. (Chairman.) That is charged to the Criminal Law Charges Vote ?—Yes.

4135. I suppose before the institution of the office of Director of Public Prosecutions the trustees prosecuted themselves ?—They did up to a certain point, and then their solicitors' bills were of such alarming proportions that representations were addressed to the Lord Chancellor of the day—that was in 1876—and he then directed that, with the view of securing uniformity of practice and economy, the county court Judge when he made an order directing the trustee to prosecute should give him also a verbal order that he should employ the Treasury Solicitor to conduct the prosecution. We were able to do it, it was said, very much more cheaply and promptly than a private solicitor.

4136. Then I suppose the trustees in those days charged their bills to the estates ?—When there was any estate—there was not much left after the bill had been charged in some cases.

4137. Then do most of the prosecutions come from the provinces or do they come from the High Court ?—I think there are rather more in London than in the country.

4138. Is it in the London cases or the country cases that light sentences come mostly and the failures ?—I think that is pretty general ; I have not distinguished in the figures I have given you. I have simply given you the sentences in every case, but I have not given the places where the sentences were passed. I thought it was not necessary to do that. Some of them are strikingly light sentences, and the proportion of light sentences is great.

4139. I suppose that is due to the fact that the jurymen are tradesmen themselves ?—Yes, I suppose every juryman looks upon himself as a possible bankrupt one day, and "a fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind."

4140. I have asked some supplementary questions, but I do not know, Mr. Smith, whether you have any other question to ask.

4141. (Mr. Smith.) No, I do not think so unless there may be one which has occurred to me. I do not know whether it is the view of the Public Prosecutor that the failure of prosecutions is a very great evil to the country at large. I think that possibly if they are unsuccessful he takes a very serious view of the effect on the community at large ?—Prosecutions may fail for very good reasons, such as that a man is not guilty—or the judge may consider that the evidence is not sufficient. He may think that the man has been guilty of improper practices, but not of fraudulent practices.

4142. A sense of injustice might be created in the mind of the community if you prosecuted ?—Because the man got off ?

4143. No, if he were prosecuted and he was not convicted ?—I am afraid I do not follow you.

4144. I think I have seen it stated in communications from the Director that the failure of prosecutions is a serious evil ?—It is.

4145. Am I to understand that the evil arises from the sense of injustice which might exist in the minds of the community at an innocent man being tried, or on what ground does he think that that constitutes such a serious evil ?—It is a serious evil first of all that the Court having made an order to prosecute, and the Director having carried out that order, the jury has found itself obliged to say "in our opinion, as we are going to acquit the man, these proceedings ought not to have been brought."

4146. Does it not often happen that in a case where the jury have failed to convict that the judge says that it was a proper case for investigation ?—He does say that very often.

4147. Do you say that any serious harm is done in actual practice by the failure of prosecutions ?—It might tend, if you had a number of failures, to bring the practice of prosecuting into disrepute, because the public would say at once, "They embark on prosecutions whether there is any evidence or not ; see the proportion of acquittals there are ; it is obvious that the cases have not been sufficiently considered, otherwise so many people would not be acquitted." I should like to say that in cases other than bankruptcy cases we convict in 90 per cent. of our cases, perhaps in more, but certainly in 90 per cent.

4148. There is a much smaller percentage in bankruptcy ?—Oh yes, a marked difference.

4149. But that might arise, as you suggest, by the fact that there is a large fellow feeling existing on the part of the jury ?—It may be due to that.

4150. And also that there is on the part of some judges in Courts of Quarter Sessions an indifference in reference to some question such as not keeping of books ?—That is so.

4151. And therefore it is difficult to get convictions even though the facts might justify them ?—That is so.

4152. (Chairman.) I would like to ask you, if you would not mind, voluntarily to give us your opinion as to whether any of the offences in the Debtors' Act may with usefulness be made punishable summarily—I mean by proceedings before a magistrate. You mentioned Section 31. Is there any other which gets over the difficulty that has been expressed to us of the proceedings not being speedy ?—Yes. Section 13 of the Debtor's Act provides that, "If in incurring any debt or liability a debtor has obtained credit under false pretences or by means of any fraud, he shall be liable to certain consequences," etc. There the mere obtaining of credit is punishable by twelve months' hard labour, and I think that that is an offence that a magistrate might easily deal with.

Mr. Francis J. Sims.

19 Dec., 1906.

4153. Then I see that a more common offence is not delivering up property, or concealing property. Do you think that those might be made punishable summarily ?—I think those might.

4154. They are not very difficult cases ?—No, they are not very difficult cases. They are usually very clear. You find that the man has either buried the property, or given it to his mother-in-law or to his friends. There is no difficulty in establishing cases of that kind as a rule.

4155. Excuse me asking you a rather leading question, but does the Public Prosecutor prosecute in summary cases ?—Yes, we have prosecutions under the Mines Act, under the Motor Car Act in respect of cases of driving in the Royal Parks at excessive speed, cases under the Army Act, etc. all of which can be dealt with summarily.

Mr. Alfred Charles Jaques, called; and Examined.

4156. (Chairman.) I think that you are carrying on business in Birmingham and have done so for a good many years ?—Yes, I am a member of the firm of Edwin Jaques & Sons.

4157. Are they in Waterloo Road ?—Colmore Row.

4158. I think you act for the Treasury, do not you ?—Yes, I acted for the Treasury in a prosecution of a fraudulent bankrupt at Stafford Assizes last week. I got him fifteen months' hard labour; and last year I acted for the Treasury in the prosecution of a fraudulent bankrupt in Birmingham, and got him nine months' imprisonment. Those are the two last successes I have had.

4159. I think that you also represent the Birmingham and District Millers' Association—are you their solicitor ?—Yes.

4161. What you mention to us is that the refusal or withholding of the discharge is very little punishment ?—Yes.

4162. Is that your experience—that the majority of bankrupts do not apply for their discharge ?—They do not apply because of the facilities offered to them of going on trading simply under different names.

4163. And that you would regard as a danger to the community ?—I consider as long as that facility is open that fraud will be rampant. I feel quite strongly that it would be useless and unreasonable to expect a lot of illiterate men to keep anything like a set of books, or adopt any special system of book-keeping, but what I have always advocated is that no person should be entitled to trade upon credit unless he kept an account showing the whole of his receipts, and the whole of his payments. My object is this, I take part in very many public examinations now, conducted by the Official Receiver in Birmingham. I am interested for many members of other trades, beside the millers' trade, and as soon as we get a man into a corner, and try to get him to account for what he has done with a lot of goods he has just had, perhaps within a few weeks of his bankruptcy, we are met with this: "I sold them for cash; I have kept no accounts; I forget who I sold them to; my transactions during the last few weeks or months have been cash transactions; I have got no cash book, and I can give you no information." Now that simply stops tracing the proceeds of goods and very often large quantities obtained just prior to a man's suspension of payment.

4164. Would you recommend that such an offence should be considered to be a sufficiently bad case to be made punishable by imprisonment ?—I do not think it would be any use doing anything without you go as far as to make it a penal offence to dispose of goods obtained on credit, say within four or six months of a failure; without keeping an account and being able to supply at the proper time, the account of what has become of those goods, and where are the proceeds.

4165. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You say disposing of goods purchased on credit ?—I do, because very often the men who intend to do wrong, make over large quantities of goods to friends and allege that they have taken them in satisfaction of some existing debt.

Mr. Alfred C. Jaques.

4166. (Chairman.) Then what are your views upon the offence by a debtor of gambling, or accounting for his deficiency by pretended gambling ?—That point I have very carefully considered, and I have come to the conclusion that it would be best dealt with by adding it to the penal clauses in the Debtor's Act of 1869, and adopting pretty well the same words as are applied to illegal pawning, except that I should withhold the words "unless it could be shown that there was no intent to defraud." I should say that gambling within four months, whatever the intent might have been, should be a criminal offence. While we are on that point, I should like to say this: I have had a very large experience of those bankrupts who allege losses by gambling. I think I am right in saying that 7 to 8 per cent. of all bankrupts attribute some of their losses to gambling, or they admit that they have been gamblers. Some cases are most flagrant robberies. There is a case I have got before me in which I acted for a firm of distillers. The debtor acounted to the Official Receiver for £500 as losses in gambling in two days. I was acting for the firm of Dunville and Company, Ltd., to whom the debtor owed a large sum of money, and I issued a writ. I followed it up with a bankruptcy notice, because I knew the man was about to dispose of his house. While the bankruptcy notice was running, he disposed of his house; he received £500, and when we got our receiving order he paid over to the Official Receiver as the proceeds of the sale £81, and said that he had lost the balance at two race meetings. I attended the public examination, and closely examined the bankrupt as to those losses. He gave the name of the two meetings he had attended. He could not give the name of a horse he had betted on, or a bookmaker he had betted with. All he could say was he had had ready money bets—the whole of the money was gone and he could not account for it. I then applied to the court to adjourn the examination sine die on the ground that the bankrupt had not accounted for his estate. I was met with this: "I shall not adjourn the examination sine die; I can only do it in cases where bankrupts fail to account. This man has accounted. He tells you that he has lost his money in betting, and it is for you to prove the contrary." Of course there we were. The man a short time afterwards appeared again in trade on about the same scale as he had been on before, and we strongly suspected that it was with the money alleged to have been lost by betting.

4167. Now as regards married women trading, we have had a good deal of evidence as to the evil of their trading, and the difficulty of making them bankrupt and so on—what is your suggestion that could be made to in some degree counteract what goes on ?—In the first place I would make them amenable to bankruptcy laws exactly the same as men. I would make no exception whatever. I would make bankruptcy notices applicable to them as to men. I would make it compulsory that where a married woman is residing with her husband, that she should have printed on her stationery that she uses, and have put over the premises where she is trading the name, Mrs. So-and-so.

19 Dec., 1906.

If anyone afterwards liked to trade with her they would do so with their eyes open.

4168. I suppose you would make it an offence if a person traded without doing that like a company without calling itself "limited ?"—Oh, quite so, I should.

4169. I think you will agree with me as a practising lawyer that if you enact a law you have to see what you are going to do if it is broken ?—Yes, you must.

4170. Do you find anything to criticise in the realisation of assets, that is to say, as to there being unnecessary delay so that debtors can make away with them ?—Yes. The great difficulty we are under is this : Private meetings of creditors are called, generally by accountants who ask that the estate may be assigned to them as trustees for the creditors. If the creditors are not agreeable, and they say, "No, we prefer bankruptcy," the debtors very frequently clear out everything they have got, and by the time we get a receiving order after the petition has run, we have been heard, and the receiving order has been granted, we find that the whole of the assets have gone, and the creditors are left to bear the expense. I think in some cases it is purposely done to deter creditors from using the bankruptcy laws. There are a certain class of accountants in Birmingham who do all they can to serve their own ends by prejudicing the minds of traders to the bankruptcy laws. I have heard it said many times at meetings :—"You know if you go into bankruptcy by the time you get there, you will get nothing." That is held out as a sort of threat. Creditors have to be prepared if they go for bankruptcy to put their hands in their pockets and find, even in the smallest bankruptcy, about £20. There is £5 on the petition, and £5 deposit. Then frequently the debtor bolts ; we have to advertise him in the London Gazette and local papers, and by the time we have got an order for substituted service and receiving order, £20 has been spent, and the return is "No assets."

4171. In connection with that I think you have considered the question of whether, when the estates are small, the preliminary fees might be reduced ?—I have. I think in moderately sized estates the present fees are none too high. I think in small bankruptcies, say where the assets are £100, that the fees should be reduced to three or four guineas on the filing of the petition. I think that the expensive process of advertising a petition in the London Gazette and local papers should be avoided. I suggest that if a debtor has a business address, if he leaves it without anyone in charge, he should only have himself to blame if a receiving order is made in his absence. I think that a registered letter containing a copy of the petition should for all reasonable purposes be held sufficient.

4172. Do you think that any control should be exercised over trustees under deeds of assignment ?—I think the fullest control should be exercised—I think that it is absolutely necessary. In bankruptcy creditors are protected, because the trustee in the first place before he is accepted at all has to give a bond to the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade will not accept him even then if he has been guilty of misconduct in the past. The accountant trustees who have the deeds of assignment in Birmingham are not many of them chartered or incorporated even. They are often what I call the outside scum who live on the plunder that they get out of these estates. I think that trustees should be licensed by the Board of Trade, and that if they are found committing offences they should be disqualified for ever. There is one matter I should like, in passing, to mention. I am absolutely convinced that a large number of these accountants who act as trustees receive secret commissions from auctioneers, printers, and from everybody, in fact, with whom they deal ; but from auctioneers I believe some of them demand as much as two-thirds of the remuneration, and commonly one-half. Trustees under the deeds employ what I call second-class auctioneers, and they share their commission. It is commonly done, and I believe they get commission out of everything they do pretty well. I think that while the recent Act of Parliament with reference to secret commissions may go far to check that, at the same time I do suggest that if ever a trustee is found accepting either directly or in any way indirectly secret commissions he should be disqualified for ever for such office.

4173. It is rather a technical question but supposing that was so, and the debtor did assign his estate to such a trustee, would you make the assignment void or how would you get over that—you see the debtor assigns to what trustee he likes ?—I should make it that the release to the debtor would not operate, and to make a release of the debtor operative it should be a properly drawn, prepared, and registered deed, answering all the requirements of the law. There are a number of the class of accountants I refer to about Birmingham, and I dare say other cities—I have brought here letters from some of them to debtors in difficulties (producing letters). They have a system by which they communicate with all persons against whom judgments are registered. Of course they get from the County Court registers and in the commercial papers lists of all judgment debtors. Then they write to them in this way: "Dear sir. We see a County Court judgment registered against you in this week's Mercantile Gazette. We know perfectly well that this is not necessarily the result of inability to pay. If, however, owing to some temporary difficulty or through bad trade, you are being pressed by your creditors, and desire relief, we can without lending money immediately protect your estate from executions or other proceedings and simultaneously procure for you a long period over which to meet your existing liabilities. If you desire fuller particulars on the matter, write us a letter with just an outline as to your position, and you may receive information which will be greatly to your advantage. Your communication will be treated in strictest confidence. Yours faithfully." Now those are commonly published. I could not bring the original of this one. This is a copy I have taken myself.

4174. (Mr. Peat.) I am afraid that does not help us much ?—There is a circular of a firm of moneylenders at Birmingham. Of course I have the names of others in Manchester and elsewhere.

4175. (Mr. Smith.) Those are not chartered accountants, are they ?—No, they are nothing really—they are living on their wits. This I believe to be a fact, that with the people I have mentioned there is a system of taking what are called deeds of inspectorship whereby the poor debtor pays into their hands so much per week under the belief that that is going to be divided amongst the creditors from time to time until the creditors are all paid, but I do not know of a single case where the creditors have received anything. It seems to me that the debtors go on starving themselves as long as they can to pay the money to these people. But as soon as they cannot screw another shilling out of debtors they chuck them up and leave them to the mercy of their creditors. I have got a cutting from the Birmingham Post of the 13th November last in which one of the persons I have named is reported to have been before Mr. Justice Bigham for not returning his accounts to the Board of Trade. Perhaps you have seen that. I should like you also to have before you this. This is a new dodge which is now being practised. Another firm of accountants here started what they called a Creditors' Protection Association, and also a Wholesale Grocery and Provision Traders' Alliance, in which they say that they act for nothing—they do everything for nothing, and they are simply acting for the benefit of the creditors and offering them all sorts of inducements to join their so-called association. The association is simply a means of getting in touch with the creditors so that they can represent them at meetings and get hold of the assets as trustees.

4176. (Mr. Peat.) May I look at this ? (Document handed.)

4177. (The Witness.) I was going to say this before we leave the question of the hearing of petitions. I suggest that in every case where a creditor's petition is filed that an interim order be made, or rather that the Official Receiver shall forthwith take possession or have some supervision over the assets pending the hearing of the petition and the granting or withholding of the receiving order. Assuming that a receiving order is not made, the amount of supervision which the Official Receiver would have would not, as I see, very materially affect the debtor, and another thing is this : before the Court received a petition it might require an affidavit of facts put in so that it could in the first instance use a discretion as to whether it would receive the petition as a bankruptcy petition against the man or not. If there is going to be even seven days between the filing of a petition and the hearing, in many cases the assets will be made away with and fraudulently dealt with—that I am positive of. I think in the hearing of petitions the time might be shortened considerably. I do not think that seven clear days is necessary at all, especially in cases where a debtor has called his creditors together and put before them a statement of affairs showing himself largely insolvent, or that he has declared his inability to go on trading. I think in those cases the means of obtaining the protection of the estate ought to be very simple. At present the notice of a man's insolvency is not an act of bankruptcy, but I think it should be. There must be a notice of intention to suspend payment. I dare say you know that in a recent case it was held that notice of insolvency amounts to nothing —there must be a notice of intention to suspend payment of debts. I think that that is a very big flaw. I suggest that when a man declares himself insolvent the creditors should be in a position to protect themselves. There are certain contracts which I think should be dealt with—I mean particularly builders' contracts.

4178. (Chairman.) I am not quite sure that that comes within the terms of our reference ?—I thought it might under the Order and Disposition Clause.

4179. No, that hardly comes within what we are to deal with ?—That is a question at any rate which works hardship. Then the question of rent—is that within the scope of your reference ?

4180. Scarcely.—A recommendation from you, Sir, would be very useful.

4181. Still you might kindly give it to us.—I will. Now it is held that rent payable in advance is a preferential payment, so that a man may pay his rent upon the 29th September; he may fail on the 1st October and his landlord be entitled to six months' rent. Rent payable in advance, I say, should never be a preferential claim, I think that rent which has accrued due should be preferential only to the extent of three months, if at all.

4182. (Mr. Smith.) There is a suggestion on page 3—I do not know whether the Chairman referred to it, but it is suggested "That in cases where the debtor admits his insolvency" and (reading down to) "at an early date." Do you propose to work that out in practice, what would you treat as an admission of insolvency ?—Where he, either by himself, or through a solicitor or accountant, presents to the creditors, either by letter or at a meeting, a statement showing that he is insolvent or that he is unable to continue trading, that should justify the court in making the hearing of the petition returnable at three days, the service of petition to be sufficient if served by registered post to the debtor's trading address.

4183. In the notice that you refer to, would you require evidence that he was insolvent or that he had stopped payment of his debts ?—Yes.

4184. The difficulty is to know what notice you are to bring within the operation of such a clause ?—Quite so. Some of the letters that I have in my mind are that "Mr. So-and-so finds himself unable to meet his engagements and we shall be glad if you will attend a meeting of the creditors to be held so and so. We find that the liabilities are so much and the assets about so much."

4185. Would not that be an act of bankruptcy at present ?—It would be an act of bankruptcy but we could not get a receiving order straight away—we could present a petition upon it, but the worst part of it is the lapse of time. You see the seven clear days amounts really to about ten days.

4186. You are not at present expressing an opinion that it is desirable to extend the act of bankruptcy ?—No, I do not think so.

4187. I thought that you were referring to the practice of debtors calling their meetings in such a way as not to come within the Statute ?—As I said a few moments ago, I would make a declaration of insolvency an act of bankruptcy, because in face of the recent decision in which it is held that a declaration of insolvency amounts to nothing I would make it amount to something—I would make it as much an act of bankruptcy as notice of intention to suspend payment, or that the debtor had suspended payment.

4188. Would you make a notice calling the creditors together to consider his affairs an act of bankruptcy ?—Yes, I would.

4189. So would I.—Yes, I do not see why not. I have never known a meeting of creditors called unless it is for the purpose of saying: "I am insolvent" or "I cannot go on without indulgence"—or something of that kind. A meeting of creditors has been called before now to pay 20s. in the £ but the object of the meeting has been mentioned in the letter. There could be protection by anyone who calls a meeting for another purpose than for making a declaration for insolvency stating a purpose. Supposing a man was a builder, and he says: "Shall be glad if you will attend a meeting of the creditors herein to consider certain points relating to the building trade." It would be quite clear what the intention was.

Mr. Alfred C. Jaques.

4190. (Mr. Smith.) That would not be a meeting of creditors would it ?—Well, it might be a meeting of his creditors, because it would be to consult them upon matters in which they were interested with their customer, the debtor. A question might arise in trade on which the debtor perhaps would not like to act having regard to his liability to his creditors without consulting those creditors.

4191. I want to know if you can suggest any words for the purpose of avoiding those cases where at present the act of bankruptcy is not committed by calling a meeting of creditors together ?—You can call a meeting of creditors together by simply saying, "you are respectfully requested to attend a meeting to be held so and so." That is not an act of bankruptcy. In the notice you have got to shew that the debtor either has suspended or is about to suspend payment of his debts.

4192. (Chairman) Lord Justice Vaughan Williams used to consider that that was implied very much by the fact of calling the meeting, because the man could not honestly have paid in full during the period.

4193. (Mr. Smith.) I did not know that. Now there is a very great difference in the practice as to what is held to be an act of bankruptcy ?—I think the tendency of the recent decisions has been to require almost an absolute declaration of intention to suspend payment.

4194. Really, I did not know that ?—The most important case which dealt with the whole subject is——

4195. (Chairman.) Clough v. Samuel ?—Yes, that is the case.

4196. (Chairman.) I was counsel in that case.—Were you really. Do you not think that that case goes a long way ?

4197. Yes, but it was not a case of convening the creditors together. It was a case where the man went to his creditors and said that he did not think he should be able to go on. Mr. Justice Wright held that it was an act of bankruptcy, but the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords held that it was not.

4198. (Mr. Smith.) You recognise at all events that there is a great difficulty in extending the Act at present ?—There is.

4199. You cannot suggest anything definite ?—The only practical remedy that I can see would be to protect the creditors by adopting the Official Receiver as interim receiver from the moment of the filing of the petition.

4200. You say that the Official Receiver should be appointed interim receiver on the presentation of the petition. If anybody presents a petition in bankruptcy against a man, is the Official Receiver to be appointed immediately to take charge of his property without any evidence ?—I say that upon the filing of the petition instead of, as now, simply swearing that the man has committed the act of bankruptcy named in the petition, the circumstances constituting the act of bankruptcy should be set out in the petition, and the Court then should exercise its discretion.

4201. Without giving the debtor any opportunity of being heard ?—Yes, without giving the debtor an opportunity of being heard.

4202. I am afraid that that would be going a little too far ?—I do not mean in the sense that he is going to take away the man's property, but simply acting as interim receiver.

4203. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the large number of bankrupts who never apply for discharge ?—Yes, I think that bankrupts should be obliged to report at the end of each year where they are and what they are doing, to the Official Receiver.

Mr. Alfred C. James.

19 Dec., 1906.

I think they should have to do that. If they are in employment they should give the name of their employer, what their earnings are, and such information as will guide the Official Receiver as to whether he will move the Court to attach part of their income or not.

4204. Then you would require them really to submit an account of their transactions?—Not an account. Simply if they give their address, the address of their employment, their earnings, and so on, so that the Official Receiver might keep a watch over them. Then in case the Official Receiver was dissatisfied with their report or the report was not forthcoming, I should give the Official Receiver power to bring them in a summary way before the Court for examination.

4205. Would you not require the Official Receiver in every case to make a report as to the conduct of the debtor?—He would not make a report. He would simply receive the information himself and he would keep an eye upon these men and keep some check upon them. Of course there are lots of undischarged bankrupts who are trading prosperously about the country, but are lost sight of.

4206. The object is to bring the matter eventually before the Court so that the question of discharge can be dealt with?—Certainly.

4207. And before that is done you would require the receiver to make his report to the Court?—Certainly. I would not bring an undischarged bankrupt before the Court without the Official Receiver considered that there were reasonable grounds for doing so. Another thing, I think it would be a great protection if each Official Receiver at the end of each year had a list of the undischarged bankrupts in his office and that it should be open to inspection upon payment of a fee. I do not see that there would be any objection to that and it would be some protection to traders.

4208. You recommend that the failure to keep a complete account of cash transactions should be made an offence punishable by imprisonment?—I do.

4209. Would you allow the Court to enforce that imprisonment, or would you have it referred to the nearest Court of summary jurisdiction?—I should allow the judge, not the registrar, of the Court in the district in which the proceedings were. While you mention that I think that the power given by the Act to the judge to deal with criminal questions ought to be exercised, instead of going before magistrates always.

4210. I see that you complain that bankrupts frequently trade under different names. Have you ever thought of a remedy by means of a registration of firms, a registration of persons who trade in names other than their own?—Yes, I have thought of it. I think that undischarged bankrupts who are trading under other names should be liable to penalties, but I am afraid it would be impracticable to expect every trading firm, if they were solvent or insolvent, to register.

4211. I wanted rather to ascertain your view upon that point. Would it not facilitate the tracing of bankrupts very considerably?—It would absolutely, but following up that, I think that it should be a serious offence for an undischarged bankrupt to trade under another name.

4212. Then as to a question that you have not dealt with here at all, the registration of hiring agreements. Have you had any experience on the subject of hiring agreements?—Yes, I have, and I think that all hiring agreements relating to trade chattels and also household furniture should be registered. I think also that the Order and Disposition Clause in the Bankruptcy Act wants strengthening. Now, it is evaded, as probably you know, on the ground of custom. In about half a dozen trades custom is set up so as to defeat the Order and Disposition Clause. The object no doubt of that clause was to make all trade chattels pass to the trustee in bankruptcy, and I do not think that it should be evaded by any means.

4213. Would not the registration of hiring agreements be rather a large undertaking—would you not limit it?—I think it would be a very great protection, I do not see that it would be so great; I cannot see any difficulty myself or any objection.

4214. Do you not think that the advantage to be derived from the registration would be sufficiently covered if it provided that hiring agreements over £30 in value, following the precedent of bills of sale, should be registered? This would exclude the small matters that very likely do not affect the credit of the person concerned?—Quite so. It would exclude sewing machines and different oddments like that. I think that is an excellent suggestion to fix a sum of about £30.

4215. Have you had any experience about the assignment of book debts?—Yes. The assignment of present and future book debts most certainly should be registered.

4216. They should be registered?—Absolutely, and registered as a bill of sale.

4218. Would you register a single assignment of book debts or only assignments when they are general?—I should all, I think, because there are many men in business who do the bulk of their trade with one house and if you left a gap it would work a hardship.

4219. (Mr. Peat.) I think you mentioned that in your experience you found that both chartered and incorporated accountants had been guilty of taking commissions.

4220. (Chairman.) I do not think he said so, he said that these people were neither chartered nor incorporated accountants.

4221. (Mr. Richardson.) Arising out of Mr. Smith's question in regard to the debtor calling his creditors together, I would like to ask—did you ever know a debtor to call his creditors together for any other purpose than that of considering his financial position?—Never.

4222. Then why quibble about making it an act of bankruptcy, because if there are 999,999 and there is only one case by way of exception, why try to legislate to excuse that one?—If I had my way I would make the convening of all meetings an act of bankruptcy under any circumstances; but there are some people so sensitive on that point that one is afraid to go so far.

4223. Would any debtor call his creditors together except to consider his position; it is impossible for him to do so; with regard to voluntary arrangement are you in favour, or is your society favourable to the majority governing the minority?—No. I do not think so. Sometimes small creditors are obstacles in the way of an advantageous arrangement going through, but if you are going to make the majority govern the minority——

4224. I mean a fair majority in number and value?—Yes. I am afraid that then you are going more upon the lines of the 1869 Bankruptcy Act, and opening the door to fraud.

4225. Now you know the limit of objecting creditors is three months?—Yes.

4226. Would you curtail that time to one month. Would you not think that a man ought to make up his mind in a month?—Yes. The only thing is this. Of course, sometimes creditors are abroad, and it is difficult to communicate with them, and work the thing by post with them in a short time. You have to have letters to and fro perhaps by several mails. I should think that two months or six weeks would be sufficient. There was a point which I think was mentioned to you, and on which I should like to say something, and that is committees of inspection. It has been suggested to you, I think, that all committees should be paid for their services. I believe that would be a very dangerous thing to do, for this reason: If committee men are paid some of the more unscrupulous ones would simply vote their trustee increased remuneration in consideration of having a good allowance made to themselves. I think it is far safer not to have remuneration for committee men. Remuneration under deeds of arrangement, I suggest, should be subject to the supervision of the Bankruptcy Court in the district. Where a trustee fixes his own remuneration, if you are to get it reduced now, means commencing an administration action really in the county court.

4227. (Chairman.) Yes, it does?—And I do think that any creditor for anything like a reasonable amount, say £20, should have the right to go to the Court and put the case before the Court to review a trustee's claim for remuneration. Sometimes very extortionate amounts are deducted. Now all creditors who are losers are apt to say:—"We won't throw good money after bad. It is a long and tiresome business to bring the trustee before the court, let it go."

4228. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to undischarged bankrupts, would you think it desirable that undischarged bankrupts should be compelled to come up once in three months to give some report of what they are doing. A bankrupt is undischarged he is under no obligations to come up, he is simply allowed to go his own way, and he is not troubled any further. Do not you think if he was compelled to come up once in three months until his discharge, that it would act as a great deterrent ?—Yes, it would, but my suggestion for an annual report, or even a quarterly report if you like, from the bankrupt, was intended to meet that. I think it would be dangerous to impose it upon an honest man who is struggling on in a situation, or something of that sort, and pull him up every quarter before the Court. It is advertising him, and perhaps preventing him gaining his discharge.

Mr. Alfred C. Jaques.
19 Dec., 1906.

4229. (Mr. Smith.) I did not suggest before the Court, I suggested the Official Receiver.

4230. (Mr. Richardson.) Yes, the Official Receiver.

4231. (Chairman.) It would be much less formal.

4232. (Mr. Peat.) Like a man on ticket of leave.

4233. (Witness.) Yes. I did not mean that, but if he had, when he closed his public examination, a form given to him with half a dozen questions on it, he might answer them at the end of six months or twelve months, send them to the official receiver, and then the official receiver could act further on that report if he thought proper.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 16th January, 1907.

PRESENT.

Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. Registrar HOPE called; and Examined.

4234. (Chairman.) I think that your Honour has been Registrar since 1891 of the High Court of Justice in Bankruptcy ?—Yes.

4235. And I think you have been kind enough to answer one or two points which I think I mentioned to you, and that you have communicated with the other learned registrars as to some of the questions which have been referred to this Committee ?—I have communicated with them on the question of prosecutions, and with reference to the other point which you mentioned as to whether there should be any power in the Bankruptcy Court to inflict a sentence.

4236. I daresay you are aware that the Director of Public Prosecutions recommends and desires us to report that he should have a discretion—where an order for prosecution is made—not to continue the prosecution if he thinks, on reviewing the evidence, that it would not result in a conviction ?—On that I have the unanimous opinion of the registrars for what it is worth and I have reduced it to writing. Perhaps it would be convenient if I read it.

4237. (Chairman.) Yes, it would.

4238. (Witness.) "The registrars are asked whether in their opinion it is desirable that the enactment contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Section 166 should be modified"—That, I understand, was the question, in substance.

4239. (Chairman.) Yes.

4240. (Witness.) "That section provides that where the Court orders the prosecution of any person for any offence under the Debtors' Act, 1869 or Acts amending it, or for any offence arising out of or connected with any bankruptcy proceedings it shall be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute and carry on the prosecution." It has been suggested that this should be modified so that in lieu of its being 'the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute and carry on the prosecution,' the order for prosecution should be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions "for his consideration"—I understand that that is the substance of it.

4241. (Chairman.) Yes.

4242. (Witness.) "And that he should have a discretion vested in him by statute as to proceeding with the prosecution or not doing so. Under the Debtors' Act, 1869, Section 16, where a trustee reports to the Court that in his opinion a bankrupt has been guilty of any offence under that Act or where the Court is satisfied upon the representation of any creditor or member of the Committee of Inspection that there is reason to believe that the bankrupt has been guilty of any offence under that Act the Court shall, if it appears to the Court that there is a reasonable probability that the bankrupt may be convicted, order the trustee to prosecute the bankrupt for such offence. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Section 164, extends the above enactment so as to include the official receiver in the term "trustee" and by far the greater number of reports now made to the Court (at least the Court in London), come from the official receivers. If the proposed modification of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Section 166, were in effect to carry with it a modification of the Debtors Act, 1869, Section 16"—I understand that to be the gist of the memorandum—"so that reasonable probability of conviction would cease to be the test for the institution of a prosecution, and some other test would be substituted for it, the registrars do not think the modification desirable. The policy of the Debtors Act is plainly in favour of bankrupts having to submit to prosecution where the reasonable probability of conviction exists, and having regard to the extremely lax manner in which any bankrupt who brings himself within the Debtors Act has invariably carried on his business or behaved during the bankruptcy proceedings it does not appear to be a policy which requires reconsideration. That policy was emphasised by the legislature in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Sections 165 and 166, and the Bankruptcy Act 1890 referred to the Debtor's Act, but made no alteration in the policy of prosecution. There appears to be a feeling (in which the registrars do not concur) that bankrupts are, or are likely to be, unduly harassed by some prosecutions coming within the terms of the Debtors Act, Section 16. The offences are mainly defined by the Debtors Act, 1869, Sections 11, 12, and 13. It is, of course, special legislation, but when examined closely

it does not appear to create any hardship for an honest trader. Section 11, Sub-sections (1), (2) and (3) apply to discovering and handing over of property, books and documents to the trustee in the bankruptcy. The moral duty is plain and the bankrupt's attention is always called to the statutory obligations if he duly attends on the official receiver or trustee." I think, also, as a matter of fact, his attention is called to it by some documents which the official receiver sends with the receiving order, "Section 11, Sub-sections (4), (5), (6), (7), (8), (9), (10), and (11) relate to intentional concealment or removal of the bankrupt's property or intentional concealment or falsification of documentary evidence of his financial position. Section 11, Sub-sections (12) and (16) relate to intentional misleading of the creditors; (13) and (14) to obtaining credit or property by false representations and (15) to pledging property not paid for. Section 12 refers to a bankrupt absconding with property, and Section 13 to any person defrauding his creditors. In all the above cases there is an element of real dishonesty and there does not appear to be any good reason why the provisions intended to check such practices should be relaxed. A man must be intentionally dishonest to come within the provisions and if he has been intentionally dishonest it does not seem unduly harassing that he should have to stand a prosecution. It is the case that in some instances prosecutions fail under the existing practice and that in others the sentences are light"—that was another point that was taken—"but from an administrative point of view it is desirable that the possibility of prosecution should exist in every case within the Act rather than that a man should be tempted to consider that what he may think to be a minor offence, will not subject him to the odium of prosecution; and for the reasons I have given it does not seem that such a probability is a hardship on the bankrupt. The registrars think that the existing practice has worked well notwithstanding occasional acquittals and many very light sentences. They recognise that under the existing practice cases have arisen in which, owing to the disappearance of witnesses or to witnesses failing to adhere to their statements as made in the early stages of a bankruptcy, the reasonable probability of a conviction"—required by the statute—"has ceased to exst when the matter has been further sifted by the Director of Public Prosecutions with direct reference to proceedings before a magistrate. The Director of Public Prosecutions does not act as a court of appeal from the Order of the Court and in our opinion he ought not to do so, but such cases"—those are where the people are not prepared to swear up to what they have said before—"would presumably be treated as non-effective by him in the future as in the past."—I think he has simply disregarded a certain number of cases where they had the man put through the mill in the Official Solicitor's office and where he did not seem prepared to swear up to what he said before. That seems to be the way of dealing with it. "But they think that such considerations do not point to the desirability of altering the test as laid down in the Debtors Act, Section 16 for the institution of proceedings. The apparent importance of individual cases if applied as a test might often be fallacious. A case may seem small and technical, such, for instance, as one relating to the destruction of some small book or note relating to the bankrupt's affairs and treated by him as immaterial—but there are many cases where in the absence of proper trading account books (which absence is lamentably common) a book or note alleged by the bankrupt to be unimportant may in reality be the clue to much which the trustee should know, and it seems desirable that the imperative obligation of disclosing such a book or note should be brought home to traders in the most forcible manner. Such instances might be multiplied. On the other hand there may be cases in which a book or note is not handed over or disclosed to the trustee but comes incidentally to his knowledge. A technical offence may be committed, but it may turn out that there is nothing of importance in the book or note. In such a case it is conceived that no order for prosecution would be made under the existing practice, as it would be fairly clear that there was neither an intention to defraud, nor any reasonable probability of a conviction. A further suggestion has been made to the effect that at some stage in the bankruptcy proceedings the Court in Bankruptcy should have power to order the imprisonment of the bankrupt"—The majority of the registrars—I do not think they are all agreed about it—do not agree with that suggestion—"It seems that in bankruptcy as in other cases uniformity of procedure prior to conviction should be ensured as far as possible—and uniformity of sentence so far as that can ever be obtained. Approximate uniformity in both cases is in their opinion more likely to arise from leaving the criminal courts to deal with the cases than by conferring an extraneous jurisdiction upon civil courts. It seems also that the suggestion would in all probability deprive the accused of the right to be tried before a jury. It appears that all offences deserving punishment under the criminal law should be left to the courts which ordinarily exercise jurisdiction in criminal matters." I should say that since I brought that before my colleagues I have noticed that under the Act of 1861 there was a power in the Court in Bankruptcy to try misdemeanours which were equivalent to misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, but I am told by Mr. Registrar Brougham, whose experience I think extends back to the working of that Act, that in practice that was found not to work—that a few orders were made but that it did not answer, because the machinery was wanting, I think, for conducting the trial properly. I think also there was some difficulty in the matter of compelling the attendance of the accused. That only refers to a matter of machinery.

4243. (Mr. Addison.) It goes back as far as the Act of 1849 I think, and I never heard of a prosecution under that Act.

4244. (Chairman.) In the evidence before the House of Commons Committee one of the learned Commissioners gave evidence that at an early stage they refused to exercise jurisdiction.

4245. (Mr. Addison.) Under the 1849 Act?

4246. (Chairman.) Under the 1861 Act. Under the 1849 Act the man was imprisoned, I think, and got out if he obtained a certificate of discharge. They sometimes refused to let him out. I am speaking rather from memory, and perhaps I may be wrong.

4247. (Witness.) Under the present Bankruptcy Act there is a power to commit for trial so as to avoid the process of going before the magistrate, but Mr. Justice Cave, when the Act came into operation, considered the matter, and I, I believe, gave directions in substance that the power was not to be exercised and I believe it never has been exercised, as a matter of fact.

4248. (Chairman.) May I ask in reference to the special points that are mentioned in our Terms of Reference whether you think, or the learned Registrars think, that there is any improvement to be effected as regards the investigation of the conduct of the debtor, or whether the existing system works pretty well as regards elucidating all that there is to elucidate?—I think, as far as I have been able to observe, that what with public examination and the possibility of private sittings everything is found out, except that very often there is great difficulty in tracing what has happened to the assets, or in discovering what is likely to happen to the assets, but I do not know that you could strengthen the procedure in any way.

4249. It has been pointed out to us that the sharp debtor knows pretty well that if he has not done anything which would render him liable to prosecution and does not apply for a discharge, after the public examination is over practically everything is over; but you do not think that one can recommend anything to add to the disabilities or disagreeable position of the bankrupt who has done wrong?—I should not like to see a power of imprisonment.

4250. And you cannot stop short of that very well?—Of course you might insist that every bankrupt should come up for discharge.

4251. That is what I was just coming to. The second question that we deal with is the question of discharge. Under the present system if a man's assets are not equal to 10s. in the £ he gets a suspension of discharge of two years almost automatically because the one exception hardly ever applies. Do you think that it is desirable to retain that 10s. clause or to abolish that so as to leave a large discretion with the judge or, in London, with the Registrar, as to dealing with the debtor's conduct?—I certainly should personally like to see the 10s. clause displaced, and I think we should all be of the same opinion about that, because I think that in the bad cases there is sure to be some other offence that will catch the man. I think it does operate hardly upon some of the small, honest cases—cases that you cannot, properly, call misfortune within the decisions under the Act of Parliament, but what the ordinary man would call misfortune in trade.

4252. Assuming that were so, do you think that having two years prescribed as a minimum penalty it is desirable to maintain it, or that it would be better to give the Registrar or Judge complete jurisdiction to inflict what penalty he thought fit—refusal, or suspension or money order ?—I should personally think that the discretion might be left to the tribunal which deals with the discharge were it not that I believe the experience of the working of the previous Act is rather against my opinion. I understand that under the previous Act the opinion of traders and, I think, of the Houses of Parliament, was that some people got off too easily, that the only way of getting a level was to have a minimum.

4253. I rather gathered from what your Honour just said that you think that it would be a good thing to provide that the bankrupt should come up to have his case dealt with irrespective of whether he applied for a discharge or not ?—I think so. I think it would be a good thing to revert to the Act of 1861—I think that is the one—under which a day was appointed for the discharge at the end of the public examination. The other Act which dealt with it was the 1849 Act.

4254. (Mr. Addison.) It was the same under that ?—Except that there was this difference, that in the one case you fixed the public examination and discharge at the same time, but I should like to say that it should be fixed after you have done the public examination, as then you have some idea when the discharge ought to come up and you could fix it then. I should say that it ought not to be earlier than, say, six months after, so as to give time to work out the estate.

4255. (Chairman.) Do you think it would have a good effect to make an order on a bankrupt at that time that he should either report to the Official Receiver, or come before the Official Receiver at stated periods to say what he was doing and account for his earnings ?—That is a matter I have not considered. I think it might be rather harassing to some traders. With regard to that question about appointing a day for the discharge at present, of course, the bankrupt has to pay fees but I think he ought to be exempt from them if the day is fixed against him. It has been suggested to me, by one of the Official Receivers, I think it was, that if you had a fixed period for the discharge being heard it would be a good thing also to put it upon the trustee to send a kind of summary of the proceedings to every creditor at a fixed period before the discharge came up, so as to put them in possession of the fact that the discharge was going to be considered, and also of the state of the bankruptcy at that period.

4256. (Mr. Smith.) To put it upon the Official Receiver or trustee ?—The Official Receiver or trustee. It might cost some money but I do not suppose that a circular to 100 creditors would cost very much 4257. (Mr. Smith.) No, I do not think so.

4258. (Witness.) A kind of summary of the estate and of the bankrupt's conduct.

4259. (Mr. Smith.) An extremely useful suggestion.

4260. (Witness.) So as to call the attention of the creditors to the matter.

4261. (Mr. Peat.) Suppose the trustee had no assets ?—I agree that is a difficulty; but he ought not to take the trusteeship unless he is prepared to see it through, ought he ?

4262. I am afraid that is rather a drastic remedy ?—I agree. It would not really cost very much because it would mean a sheet of paper and say the addressing, at the outside, of 100 envelopes.

4263. And printing, which might be considerable, depending on the information which has to be comunicated to the creditors, addressing, stamping and issuing, possibly receiving replies and having to respond to them ?—Well, I do not know that he need do that last.

4264. I am afraid I can see considerable possible expense if there are no assets. The cases which I have a little experience of are those where there are vastly more than 100 creditors ?—Then in such cases there is generally some asset. Mr. Registrar Hope. 16 Jan. 1907.

4265. Yes, unless you are pretty well up to the finish of the estate and have divided your assets, and as very often happens the bankrupt goes up for discharge after you have divided the estate and wound it up ?—The suggestion was made to me.

4266. (Mr. Peat.) I think it would be a very excellent suggestion if the trustee was only bound to do it in case he had funds.

4267. (Mr. Smith.) Are you alluding to the expense incurred by a non-official trustee or do you include the expense incurred by the official trustee ?

4268–9. (Mr. Peat.) The official trustee, I suppose, would have some recourse against a common fund. I have no objection to having recourse to any fund, but I certainly would not put a statutory obligation upon a man who has no funds with which to discharge it.

4270. (Chairman.) Has your Honour considered any of our other Terms of Reference at all ?—No, not very closely.

4271. I was just going to ask you as to your experience, whether you think that the law as to making married women bankrupt might be advantageously altered so as to make every married woman who trades liable to bankruptcy ?—I should think that should be so if she does trade.

4272. At present the married woman who trades is rather a privileged person ?—Yes, if she is wise enough to trade under a firm name it is almost impossible to hit her.*

4273. (Mr. Smith.) I understand with reference to the discretion asked for by the Public Prosecutor that you suggest he should have such discretion in a case where there is fresh evidence brought to his knowledge, or where evidence already given fails to be supported ?—I think so. I think that it is unreasonable to ask him to proceed under an order made on certain evidence if that evidence afterwards breaks down.

4274. That is the extent of your suggestions, and the registrars do not go further than that ?—I do not think the registrars see any objection at all to the whole thing being placed within the discretion of the Director of Public Prosecutions, so that he should be the only person responsible in the matter. But if the Court is asked to make an Order they think it ought to be carried out. Provided the responsibility is thrown on the Director of Public Prosecutions to proceed on the line which the Act of Parliament indicates, which is that of reasonable probability of conviction, he might deal with the whole matter without any order of the Court.

4275. I quite understand that, but I understand that it is the practice at present that the Director of Public Prosecutions does in effect modify the Order by refusing to proceed if fresh facts come to his knowledge ?—I have known of two cases myself, one of which I can remember the name of, and the other I cannot.

4276. I believe no one has ever suggested that he should carry out an Order where fresh facts have come to his knowledge, which modify the circumstances under which the Order had been made ?—I have never heard of such a thing.

4277. With regard to the suggestion of the Bankruptcy Judge dealing with offences under the Debtors Act, why do you think that the Bankruptcy Judge could not exercise that jurisdiction. Is it simply on the ground that it comes under the Criminal Law or is it on the ground of want of facilities ?—You want to have depositions taken, and you must have a certain special procedure for it.

4278. I think that the Bankruptcy Court is not provided with the technical machinery which is given to a magistrate for taking preliminary evidence ?—No. There would be matters of that sort.

* Note by the Witness.—"Almost impossible" is perhaps too strong, but the firm name does add very materially to the difficulty of dealing with a married woman whether trading alone or with a partner. It might be possible to enforce the registration of all trade names with the names and status of the members of the firm, or a married woman or an infant trading under a trade name might be treated as a person under no disability unless his or her name and status were registered.

Mr. Registrar Hope.

4279. Supposing the legislature resolved to treat this question as a summary offence do you see any objection to the Bankruptcy Court exercising its jurisdiction straight off and sending a man to prison if it considered there were offences that ought to be treated in that way?—I think that the principle of Criminal Law is that a man is entitled to be tried by a jury.

4280. That assumes that the bankruptcy offences come strictly within the Criminal Law. I think some witnesses whom we have had before us, eminent men, have drawn a distinction between offences under the Criminal Law pure and simple, and offences under the Bankruptcy Law?—All the Debtors Act Offences, or nearly all of them, assume trial by jury. The words "Unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud" occur in the sections time after time.

4281. But there are offences where the debtor is amenable, I think, to the Criminal Law where there is not necessarily a dishonest intention?—Under the Debtors Act in nearly every one I think a dishonest intention must exist. I went very carefully through them.

4282. What would you say to the suggestion to carry the punishment of the debtor further by introducing imprisonment as the penalty for misconduct in his business, for carelessness, neglect, or anything short of dishonesty?—It is only my personal opinion, but I do not think that a man ought to be imprisoned except for a criminal offence.

4283. You are aware that he used to be imprisoned for debt?—Yes, he was, and some people think he is still, although that is not the right reading of it.

4284. And the law was expressly relaxed by granting him immunity from imprisonment under certain conditions—his coming into the Bankruptcy Court and purging himself—that was the principle of it, was it not?—Yes, I think so.

4285. If it is suggested that we have gone too far in that direction, and that in order to make traders more careful we should revert to the old principle of imprisonment, that is to say, should require the debtor to purge himself from offences before he escapes imprisonment to which he used to be subjected, do you see any objection to that on legal or moral grounds?—I do not see what the expression means "by purging himself" in this connection.

4286. What I am suggesting to you is that there is a difference between imprisoning a man for an act which is not dishonest, but which may be grossly injurious to the trade of the country if the practice becomes general, and imprisoning him for dishonest intention to defraud?—Yes, I think there is.

4288. (Chairman.) Have not you overlooked the fact that imprisonment for debt was used as a means of getting money? It was a form of execution. You took the man into custody, until he paid.

2489. (Mr. Smith.) I want it still as a means of getting money, or at least as a means of preventing the loss of money. What I suggest is that the debtor has committed an offence by becoming bankrupt, and it is his duty to purge himself, and unless he does so, and shows that his offence has not been brought about by his own misconduct, that then the law of imprisonment should take effect?—I can only say that I do not agree.

4290. Supposing that the legislature enacted that, would you see any difficulty in a bankruptcy registrar carrying it out?—No, I do not think so, subject to the question of machinery, of course. [After a pause.] It would be very difficult to carry it out. It is rather a new point to me in the way you are putting it. The suggestion is that it should be done say after public examination, or after the discharge?

4291. Yes, or on the day when the bankrupt comes up for the decision of the Judge with reference to his whole conduct. If the Judge comes to the conclusion that the bankrupt's conduct has been so grossly careless as to deprive him of any title to discharge, or even, worse than that, to merit a short term of imprisonment; the suggestion that is made on the part of a large portion of the mercantile community is that the Judge should there and then pass a sentence of imprisonment. Do you see any difficulty in the registrars in the Bankruptcy Court enforcing such a provision if the legislature gave them the necessary power?—No, I do not, subject to our having tipstaffs, and people of that class to carry it out.

4292. (Mr. Peat.) I do not understand that your Honour holds the view that it is desirable?—No. I do not at all. I think, whether you call it criminal or not, it is the same thing in substance to the man. You lock him up and you deprive him of the liberty of the subject.

4293. You make a misfortune or a matter of mismanagement a crime, which it is not at present?—You make it rather a primâ facie crime to become bankrupt, and that does not appeal to me.

4294. (Mr. Smith.) I rather object to the expression making it a crime, but I should treat it by making it punishable with imprisonment. At least that is the demand, but my question was really with reference to the method of carrying it out. Then with regard to the objection to the 10s. in the £ clause, have you had any cases in which you have seen hardship arise under that?—Yes. In my opinion I have had many small cases.

4295. In what way does the hardship arise, because the debtor can purge himself, and say that the bankruptcy had arisen from causes which were not under his control; in which case the section does not apply?—You are suspending for two years a small man who has really been stupid and unfortunate, and nothing more.

4296. Still you must come to the conclusion, must you not, that the bankruptcy has arisen from causes which were within his control?

4297. (Chairman.) No, the onus is on the bankrupt.

4298. (Mr. Smith.) I suggest that the Judge must come to the conclusion that he has failed to satisfy the Court, at all events, that he is free from blame?—I think that the two years' suspension is a very heavy thing, especially for a small trader.

4299. The evidence we have had here tends quite the other way, namely, that suspension is of no value whatever?—I think for a small trader it is a very heavy punishment—I am not talking of big traders. A great majority of the people we come across in London are very small people indeed, who are dependent on some small shop. Something very often goes wrong. If they make one bad debt it may upset them. Of course you may say they ought not to make bad debts; but they are not perfect.

4300. No doubt the section was intended to catch the larger trader?—A few weeks' illness may often suffice to upset the business of a man in a small way.

4301. Then you would abolish that clause?—Yes; I would, personally.

4302. (Mr. Addison.) There has been one question about book-keeping which has been very much pressed; it has been suggested that the non-keeping of books might be the subject of punishment to be awarded summarily by the Court as an offence?—As a criminal offence?

4303. As a criminal offence?—Then my objection to it is very much the same as that which I have indicated to Mr. Smith—that you would be creating an offence for that.

4304. In the case of the non-keeping of books the evidence is before the Court?—Yes, it is.

4306. I understand that you say that it is for the Court to deal with each case?—Yes, if you can say that he has dishonestly failed to keep his books—it would be a very difficult thing to adjudicate upon—that might be another matter.

4307. Another point which has been brought before us is that the large number of undischarged bankrupts, numbering I think over 70,000, is a very undesirable thing in the interest of the community?—I think very much so; and that is one of the reasons why I am desirous that there should be some means of forcing a discharge in every case.

4308. Has it come before you that they soon get into trade again or incur obligations by becoming members of firms ?—Yes, we get the same individual not only once but twice, and sometimes three times, coming to the Court. In such cases the bankrupt not only incurs liabilities, but the assets in some cases go to the wrong people.

4309. Yes, that is so, and the later creditors are in a very awkward position ?—They are in a very awkward position. A man perhaps changes his name, or takes a firm name, or goes to another part of London and starts in business again. The new creditors do not discover anything about it until he becomes bankrupt again.

4310. A good deal of evidence has been given before us that the dormant hand of the trustee which may be stretched out to claim a man's assets often presses very hardly upon subsequent creditors ?—I think so, but we really do not see so much of that as the trustees and the official receivers, although we are cognisant of the fact that it is so. The assets that the creditor thought he was going to have are found to belong to the trustee in the previous bankruptcy, which possibly took place in Birmingham or somewhere else in the provinces.

4313. (Mr. Addison.) Something of that kind would be better than keeping the bankruptcy open for a very long time by reason of the withholding of the discharge ?—Yes, I think I am right in saying that the judicial objection to a judgment in that form has been that the judgment is such a millstone round a man's neck that it is not fair to force him to submit to it if he does not wish to.

4314. The want of discharge should be equally a millstone round his neck?—He is done with it in two, three, or four years, or whatever the term may be, while the judgment is registered against him and everybody who likes to search can see that it is registered against him, and that injures his credit.

4315. Do you think the substitution of an order that he should come up and be examined as to assets for two, three, or four years and be liable to account for a certain proportion would be useful ?—Yes, that would be rather a new idea to me. I think that might be a useful thing subject to there being a discretion to make the order. I think that to make it a general rule for every bankrupt to do so might create a hardship.

4316. What was in my mind was rather this: that keeping the bankruptcy open so long from want of discharge is very undesirable ?—Yes, I think so.

4317. The object of bankruptcy is a two-fold one, first to see that the assets are properly distributed amongst the creditors ?—Yes.

4318. And secondly, to relieve a man in a proper case The Court can apply the first part by administering his assets rateably and properly among the creditors and as regards the second part may say, "We think that you are not entitled to your discharge, or only partially to your discharge." I do not know whether that would be possible so as not to keep the bankruptcy open ?—You mean to say that for two years, or every year he was to come and report himself.

4319. Yes, or for so many years possibly ?—But giving him his discharge.

4320. Giving him his discharge.—Then what are you to do if he reports himself ?

4321. The Court would be entitled to make a summary order for payment by him of so much ?—He becoming a ticket-of-leave.

4322. My mind is rather directed to the second branch of the subject. The Bankruptcy Court has administered his assets, but it ought not to relieve him from his obligation to his creditors, except in a proper case. If it was not a proper case the Court should have the right to impose some conditions ?—I do not quite understand whether you would say that every man was to do it.

Mr. Registrar Hope.

16 Jan. 1907.

4323. I would give the Court a very wide discretion as you have suggested ?—Subject to that, I like the suggestion.*

4324. (Mr. Chamberlin.) That would be a discharge without a discharge, would not it ?—It would be a discharge and not a discharge.

4325. (Mr. Richardson.) And it would mean also, would it not, an estate being kept open for a number of years.

4326. (Mr. Addison.) No.

4327. (Mr. Richardson.) I understood Mr. Addison to say that the Court would make a summary order to pay.

4328. (Witness.) To pay to the trustee or the official receiver, I suppose ?

4329. (Mr. Addison.) During some years the bankrupt should report himself, so that at some future time the Court might say, if the facts justify it, "You are in better circumstances now, and we shall make an order on you to pay so much, or such a proportion, of your earnings."

4330. (Witness.) "We grant your discharge subject to your reporting to the trustee at the end of such and such a time what your position is, and then you will have to submit to an order for payment if you have money."

4331. (Mr. Richardson.) That is what I mean by saying that it keeps the estate open.

4332. (Chairman.) No, the estate would be closed, the man would be free from the process of his creditors, and there would only then be the liability to the Court, and he would be subject only to the administration of the Court.

4333. (Mr. Richardson.) But there would be some assets to be distributed years later.

4334. (Mr. Smith.) The effect would be that you would restore the legal status of the debtor.

4335. (Witness.) He has his discharge now, subject to judgment.

4336. But you attach importance to the conduct of the debtor after his discharge ?—I think it is an advantage over the judgment system, because under the system which Mr. Addison suggests you would find out whether or not the man had means At present you have the judgment, and the difficulty is to find whether he has means. In theory you can by means of private sittings and inquiries of that sort find out to a certain extent, but I do not think that it is very easy to do so as a practical matter.*

4337. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Then you would have to coin a new word for discharge if you discharge a man and yet he is not discharged.

4338. (Witness.) You discharge him now, subject to judgment. You discharge him personally from his debts.

4339. (Mr. Addison.) I was going to ask further, do you think anything could be done to simplify the proceedings where a judgment has been obtained. I find my clients grumble dreadfully about the delays in obtaining a receiving order where they have got a judgment for a debt under Order XIV. at Common Law. Do you think we could simplify that process in any way ?—Do you mean the process of bankruptcy notice ?

4340. Yes, one knows that one can stave off adjudication sometimes for six or eight weeks by disputing everything ?—Unless you return to something like the old system of what was called striking a docket. I do not profess to be able to define what it really meant but that was a procedure by which you produced your judgment. You had your right against your debtor subject to his displacing it. Then I understand you had the man in the grip of the bankruptcy law subject to his showing his right to come out.

4341. Again there is the question of expense which is largely complained of in small matters—the £5 stamp, the £5 deposit money and the expenses of advertising ?—I have always thought that the £5 stamp is rather heavy, but that is a matter for the Revenue.

* See note by the Witness on page 189.

Mr. Registrar Hope.

decisions of Bankruptcy Judges that he has to have a very full opportunity of disputing every step because the matter affects status. As long as that is the principle I do not see how you can help it. You must have a certain number of stages—you must have delay if you want to make a bankruptcy notice of it or the equivalent, and then you must serve him.

4343. It is not an easy subject ?—No, it is not.

4344. But the ordinary mercantile man who has got his judgment under a bill of exchange on an Order XIV. summons is very much put out by having to prove everything over again in bankruptcy ?—Unless there is another act of bankruptcy. I think that sometimes they do not work the other acts of bankruptcy enough. But there is a difficulty in proving them sometimes.

4345. Are there any other suggestions that occur to you how we might amend the proceedings ?—No, I do not think so. I do not think I have studied it enough. If we could reduce the number of adjournments on petition I should be very glad. I have thought about that but I find it very difficult to arrive at.

4346. (Mr. Peat.) In your very large experience of bankruptcies have you found any very considerable percentage of them which can be said to arise altogether apart from the action of the bankrupt himself, that is to say, apart from the culpable action of the bankrupt himself and entirely arising from misfortune ?—Very few purely from misfortune.

4347. Would you say 1 per cent., 2 per cent., or ½ per cent.?—I could not put it into figures. I think stupidity or want of business capacity, if you call that a misfortune, gives rise to bankruptcy very often.

4348. It is not a misfortune, I am afraid, recognised by the Court ?—No.

4349. You suspend a man for two years ?—In order that he may learn better, that is the theory I suppose.

4350. But there is no considerable number of bankrupts in your experience who are bankrupts through no fault of their own ?—I should say not certainly.

4351. And therefore the two years' case comes in always? —Yes.

4353. You exercise it now by suspending a man for five years ?—Yes, you do.

4354. Or two or three years ?—But then you are to see under your suggestion what proportion of his earnings he can afford to pay and yet keep his business going and his family alive. It is rather a difficult thing to do.

4355. Yes, I am aware of that ?—I do not say that it is insuperable but I do think it is difficult 4356. But at the same time it would be very inconvenient for a bankrupt and also for his customers and traders—those who trade with him in future—not to know whether he was responsible for £500 or £5,000 ?— I am afraid I do not quite follow the question from that point of view.

4357. Assume that a man receives his discharge after his examination and he is left to submit his affairs at a later date or periodically, and that then at that later date the Court should decide whether he is to pay £500 or £5,000 out of his then assets. That seems to me a greater hardship and more difficult for those who trade with that bankrupt than if the Court were to measure the sum which he has to pay out of future assets at the time that he is discharged by giving him his discharge subject to his submitting himself or his affairs to the examination of his trustee or the official receiver to see whether the sum which the Court has adjudicated that he must pay is available ?—I think that the calculation would be a difficult one to make. As I understand Mr. Addison's suggestion in the procedure which he suggests, when the application was made ultimately for the bankrupt to pay something, you would then consider the whole of his circumstances. You would say: What is your trading position, what are your liabilities, what can you afford to pay ? but you would not do anything to affect his credit or to affect his existing creditors.

4358. Then my criticism—if I may use the word "criticism"—is the one that Mr. Chamberlin made, that it is no discharge at all ?—I appreciate Mr. Chamberlin's observation and also yours, but it is the phrase that has always been used in the case of a man who has a judgment against him, and I think it comes to be a question of words as to whether you should alter the expression "discharge."

4359. Your opinion, which I desired, was whether you think, when the bankrupt is examined and his examination is concluded and the question of his conduct and discharge is taken into account, that at that time—not at a later date—the Court should say: "You receive your discharge at once subject to submitting your accounts at a later date for paying out of your assets £100, £500 or £5,000," or whatever the figure may be, at once, so that the man may know what it is that he has to face in the future. I wished your opinion as to whether that course was preferable to that of leaving the man open, and his assets open to be attacked for an indefinite time ?— I think myself that it is preferable to leave the discretion to be exercised when the facts are thoroughly known. The future is so uncertain that it would be very difficult to arrive in advance at any just appreciation of how much he could or could not pay. The Judges have gone so far as to say that you must not enter any judgment unless you think that the man can probably satisfy it— unless he consents to it—and I think they have said that for that reason. The reasons in the reported cases are that the burden of a judgment may do away with a man's motives for exertion, and give rise to questions between the judgment creditor and new creditors.—See re Shackleton, 6 Morrell, 304, and re Bullen, 5 Morrell, 243.

4360. Pardon me for following up the matter a little further ?—Certainly.

4361. The bankrupt as a rule has a trade of some sort which by misfortune has resulted in his losing money ?— Yes.

4362. I will assume that he has been guilty of some indiscretion which has contributed to his bankruptcy. In order that that man might trade immediately as a discharged individual the Court would there and then when his discharge comes up for consideration, instead of suspending him for three or five years, or two years, say to him, "You are in a position to trade at once, but out of your trading profits or out of your assets you should pay a fixed sum," depending on the man's guilt which could only be found at the time of his examination and not some years later. However I understand you to hold rather a different view ?—I do rather. I do not know that I made myself plain. I think at that moment you have not got sufficient materials to ascertain what he can pay either by way of a lump sum or by way of percentage as you might have at a later period.

4363. Then your Honour will allow me to go back on your answer with regard to the books ?—Yes.

4364. I daresay you have found that a very large percentage of bankrupts have kept no books at all ?—Yes, a great number.

4365. Would you think it prudent to insert any provision in future legislation making it compulsory upon every trader to keep the following simple accounts, that is an account of his receipts and payments and an account of any trading and book debts at the end of every year ?— I should like to see it done but in the small class of trader I think you would find even that would be difficult.

4366. You mean to make it a criminal offence. It is at present an offence in bankruptcy ?—Yes, which is punishable by suspension, but I think you go beyond that. I should not like to see it done. I believe it is done in Germany.

4367. And in France also ?—Yes, but I do not know what the effect of it there is.

4368. Every trader has to produce his account from his journal marked by the Board of Trade ?—The kind of people I am thinking of are the small people—with whom I have a great deal of sympathy—a man who works himself, and his wife and daughter, and who are quite illiterate and who keep a little shop among them. I do not think that they could do those kind of things, because they are tremendously difficult to that class of people.

4369. Could not you in legislation leave room for such persons to escape ?—If you could do that the proposal might be desirable.

4370. If a man could prove that he was illiterate or for some other good and sufficient reason had failed to keep these necessary and simple books ?—If you could guard it in that way, I should think it would be a desirable thing. I think you ought to guard it by legislation in some way. I think you ought not to leave it to discretion it if was possible to avoid doing so.

4371. (Mr. Richardson.) Still on the non-keeping of books, do not you find that a great number who have kept books have ceased to keep books ?—Yes—the first symptom of their going wrong.

4372. They are perfectly able to keep books ?—Yes.

4373. And do not you think that there should be a certain punishment for those people, people who are able to keep books, have done so for years and years, and have ceased to do so. What do they cease to keep books for ? No other reason than that of cheating creditors ?—I think that is a very strong argument for making it compulsory—making it punishable, the not keeping of books, if you can safeguard the people who cannot do it. That is the difficulty I see about it. I see no difficulty about the big man who can employ clerks and accountants ; he can do it and ought to do it. But in my opinion, I may be wrong, there are a great number of small tradesmen who would find very great difficulty in keeping books in such a way as is suggested.

4374. Now in cases of bankruptcy it is always extremely difficult to trace a transaction of the previous twelve months or two years ?—Yes.

4375. And that is very often the means of keeping a bankruptcy estate open a long time. Such people as are referred to have kept their books properly. The contention of the mercantile world is that in cases of that sort, there should be certain punishment to deter traders in future from ceasing to keep books. Would you personally be in favour of certain punishment being given to tradesmen of that kind ?—If you could limit it to cases where you could show the element of dishonesty, yes. By punishment I understand you to mean something equivalent to making it a criminal offence—imprisonment or something that has the stigma of the prison upon it.

4376. Yes ?—If you can limit it to cases of dishonesty, yes. But mere negligence I do not think ought to be punished by imprisonment.

4377. With regard to the suggested circular you spoke of, I take it that it was the opinion of the registrars generally, that a circular should be sent to all the creditors ?—No, that was a suggestion that came to me in a conversation that I had with one of the official receivers.

4378. I think that suggestion a good one and it would cause the creditors to interest themselves in the meeting, and probably cause a good many to come who otherwise would not. It has been objected that where there are no assets there would be no money to pay for the circulars ?—I cannot say as to that.

4379. (Chairman.) I do not think Mr. Registrar Hope knows that.

4380. (Mr. Richardson.) The vast majority of cases have some assets and if that is a good provision I do not think the mere fact that there are cases where the trustee would have no assets to carry out such provision should prevent such a provision being made.

4381. Do not you think it desirable that that provision should be made and leave it open, if there were no assets, the trustee could not be compelled to issue such a circular ?—I should think that that might meet the objection which was taken by Mr. Peat.

4382. The trustee could not be compelled if he had no assets but generally it would be a good thing to have such a circular issued to creditors ?—You are aware that a circular is issued to all creditors before the public examination—what is called the summary. The other suggestion is that before the discharge there should be a circular which would be a very much shorter thing. It was a suggestion which seemed to me to be a good one subject to the question of expense.

4383. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it in what you said you are averse to encouraging imprisonment for contravention of the Bankruptcy Act ?—Yes, I am speaking generally. Imprisonment for civil and not criminal offences does not commend itself to me.

4384. Perhaps you have noticed that the last two or three gentlemen who have asked the question have spoken of a "certain" punishment. I take it that in your opinion it is inadvisable to inflict imprisonment, that is to say you would not like to see the Bankruptcy Court made a Criminal Court ?—No. Except for cases of real dishonesty I do not like the idea of imprisonment.

4385. We have had a large number of witnesses before us and the consensus of opinion from the mercantile witnesses is that suspension of discharge is no punishment at all—that the non-granting of discharge is no punishment at all. Therefore of course, if that is true, if there is any truth in that contention, what is punishable and what is not punishable—— ?—That is a matter with regard to what the commercial world thinks about it, and that other people can answer better than I can. I should have thought to an honest trader suspension would be a punishment. You say that the dishonest trader does not consider it so.

4386. Personally I entirely follow your view as to the small trader as to keeping accounts or as to not keeping accounts, but do not you think it would be a very difficult matter to distinguish between the man who could and the man who could not keep accounts ?—Yes, I do.

4387. And therefore would it not be a very onerous duty to put upon somebody to say that certain people should be imprisoned for not keeping books of accounts, and certain people should not be imprisoned ?—Yes, that is what I meant to express before. I see great difficulty in limiting it to cases of dishonesty, and unless you could do so, I do not think it would be desirable.

4388. There is just one question I should like to put to you about that matter of discharge. Do you not think that it would be some damage to a man's future credit if he had hanging over his head the millstone that so soon as he got into better circumstances he should be hauled up for judgment again, and made to disclose his assets, and to say how much he could pay out of monies he had earned since his bankruptcy. Presuming that the man were made to pay £500 ; if that fact were known, would it not damage his credit and prejudice him in his buying ?—That I think is the objection to the judgment system at the present time—that it injures his credit if he has a judgment entered against him, because everybody knows that. The suggestion of Mr. Addison is that there should be nothing hanging over him, but that if his position was such, that he could afford to pay something later on, then at that time he could be forced to pay. His creditors in theory would be perfectly safe because his business position would be considered at the future moment when the payment was ordered to be made so that you would not abstract the assets from the existing creditors.

4389. But if it was uncertain what order would be made by a judge, if it was at his discretion to order a man to pay £500 or £1,000 out of his assets, and if that was hanging over a man's head would not his then creditors take that into consideration ?—I think you would assume that the Judge would not order him to pay £500 if he owed it to creditors. That is what it comes to, is not it ?

4390. Do I understand that you are favourable to the suggestion of Mr. Addison or that you are not ?—I am favourable to it subject to considering it a little more closely because it is a new idea to me.

4391. It seems such a very important suggestion that I should like to know from a gentleman of your experience whether you really think that it could be made workable ?—It does commend itself to me offhand, but still I should like to consider it a little more closely as to how it would work in practice.*

* Note by the Witness.—With reference to Answers 4323, 4336, 4391 and 4393, I have considered Mr. Addison's suggestion further and spoken to some others about it. There is some difference of opinion—but for myself I think that the suggestion might work in practice if the sitting to consider what sum, if any, the bankrupt should pay was public, and notice of it was sent by the Official Receiver to the creditors, so that any creditor having knowledge of the bankrupt's position could either attend or give information to the Official Receiver. That would, I think, reduce the difficulty now experienced in finding out whether a bankrupt can satisfy a judgment (see Answer 4336). Certainly it would be an objectionable procedure for the bankrupt—but, assuming that further punishment and deterrents to reckless traders are desirable, they cannot be devised without causing inconvenience to those who are subject to them.

4392. (Chairman.) I daresay as a proof of His Honour's evidence will be sent to him, that possibly between now and some future time in returning the proof, if His Honour has anything to add to it, His Honour would kindly do so upon this subject.

4393. (Witness.) I will do so certainly.*

4394–6. (Mr. Chamberlin.) My only point in elaborating this question is that in my judgment it is making a discharge not a discharge, and that is the reason why I wanted to come back to it?—Yes.

Mr. E. W. HANSELL, called; and Examined.

Mr. E. W. Hansell.

23 Jan. 1907.

4397. (Chairman.) Gentlemen, Mr. Hansell has come to kindly give us the benefit of his assistance upon some points in our Terms of Reference.

4398. We need scarcely ask you, but I think you have been twenty years at the Bar?—Yes.

4399. And have practised a great deal in bankruptcy cases?—Yes.

4400. And have edited the last three or four editions of Williams on Bankruptcy?—The last six.

4401. And I think you now are Principal Standing Counsel to the Board of Trade in bankruptcy matters?—Yes.

4402. I think you have had before you for your consideration and have been good enough to look at the Terms of Reference to this Committee?—I have

4403. I was going to ask you if you would be so good as to deal with Questions 1 and 2 together. Perhaps I may say that a great deal of evidence has been given before the Committee from various bodies suggesting that the powers which the court has, as at present exercised, are not adequate to punish a debtor who has been guilty of misconduct, and that the result of the present state of the law is that the country is flooded with an immense number of undischarged bankrupts simply because bankrupts find it more comfortable to be undischarged than to come up again and get their discharge. Perhaps you could favour us with your views on those two questions?—In dealing with what is obviously a very undesirable state of things, namely, having this large number of undischarged bankrupts loose in the country, I thought of two ways of proceeding, first of all, by making an application for discharge compulsory—I will deal with the details in a moment; and, secondly, by adding some provisions to Section 31 of the Act, the section which makes obtaining credit for £20 while undischarged a criminal offence, punishable with not more than one year's imprisonment. I think it would be undesirable to create a sort of intermediate class of persons consisting of the people who have had bankruptcy proceedings brought against them but who have not yet had their discharge dealt with. Therefore what I would suggest for your consideration is this clause which I have drafted somewhat roughly upon a clause in the New South Wales Bankruptcy Act. Of course I know nothing about the practical working of that Act, but it seemed to me to express in fairly clear words what I want to do. What I suggest is that every bankrupt should be compelled within a certain time after the close of the public examination—I think that probably is the best time to take, because then more is known about him, and so on—if he does not apply voluntarily, to come forward and ask for his discharge and have the question of his discharge dealt with. Section 43 of the New South Wales Act, Sub-section 2 which I have here—it is Act No. 25 of 1898, gave me the groundwork of the proposal which I am venturing to put before the Committee. The section in the New South Wales Act dates from the sequestration, which, I suppose, is equivalent to our receiving order. I think myself that with regard to a limit of time, it might be a shorter limit perhaps than the one in the New South Wales Act, but I think the date to measure from would be the close of the public examination when, presumably, the debtor's affairs and conduct have been thoroughly inquired into. I prepared a draft somewhat roughly which I thought might express what I want to suggest as a remedy, "If the bankrupt has not within six months." I put six months of course as a hypothetical figure for consideration. The time in the New South Wales Act is nine months from the sequestration. I was proposing to put six months or thereabouts from the close of the public examination, "If the bankrupt has not within six months from the date of the closing of the public examination applied for his discharge, the official receiver shall apply to the court for, and the court shall grant, a summons requiring the bankrupt to appear before the court on a day and time to be named in such summons, and show cause, if he has any, why an order of discharge should not be granted or refused, and on such appearance the court may deal with the case and grant, refuse, or suspend the discharge, and otherwise deal with the bankrupt as if the order had been applied for by him. If the bankrupt refuses or neglects to comply with the summons the court may, by warrant, cause him to be apprehended and brought up for the purposes of the hearing of the application." Of course the object would be to compel his appearance rather than punish him for this particular thing. Therefore I think it would be much better to have a warrant to cause him to come up and be examined with reference to his discharge rather than to make it a contempt of court, or something of that sort, of a punitive character. Then I was going to suggest that a difficulty has arisen under Section 27 of our Act—the Private Examination Section owing to the view that has been taken hitherto that the order for the attendance of a witness to be examined under Section 27 must be personally served. I have had before me once or twice lately, cases where witnesses have consistently avoided service, and useful information has not been obtainable. Therefore, I was going to suggest that if such a clause as this were adopted, there ought to be a provision allowing service by registered post letter, addressed to the last known address of the bankrupt, which of course could be got at the public examination. If you do not have something of that sort I think you will find it very difficult to enforce his attendance. I have just drafted rather roughly a clause to that effect, "The summons may be served on the bankrupt by registered post letter addressed to his last known place of business or residence and notice of the place, day and time of the hearing of the application shall be sent by the official receiver to each creditor whose proof has been admitted before the close of the public examination."

4405. On the matter?—Yes, that is what I meant.

4406. Application if he came voluntarily ?—Yes, voluntarily—attendance, or something of that sort, if he came under the order of the court.

4407. Then you would contemplate that he should be dealt with in the same way as he is dealt with now ?—Precisely.

4408. (Chairman.) There is another difficulty. May I ask you have you considered whether any alteration should be made in the rules as to discharge? That is to say, as to the necessity of suspending a discharge if there is 10s. in the £ deficient, and the sort of arbitrary minimum of two years ?—I think that the thing that most wants altering is the compulsory suspension for two years. That in practice, I think, has been found to work very hardly. You get a number of cases of honest debtors with whom you must deal in one of two ways—either by giving a minimum of two years, or what I might call evading the Act by allowing judgment for £5 or some nominal sum of that sort. On the other hand if you get a bankrupt who has not been an honest bankrupt, you can hardly begin at the other end of the two years—I mean you can hardly have the two years first and then start the punishment for his offences from that date. The result is that the honest bankrupt, to my mind, gets a very much severer punishment in proportion to his offence than many of the dishonest bankrupts. I think that the registrars might most certainly be trusted to deal with each case fairly upon the merits. I must say that, speaking for myself, I think a system of a minimum punishment is wrong in principle altogether. I think the question of punishment ought always to be left to the discretion of the courts and you must trust the courts to use it wisely, as indeed they do. With regard to the 10s. clause I think it might be worth considering whether it would be advisable to make the question of suspending the discharge until 10s. has been paid read until 5s. has been paid. I say that because I think from my experience that the registrars in the courts generally consider that a very severe order indeed, that of suspension until 10s. in the £ has been paid. I have heard, more than once, I think, the registrar say that they would rather give a good term of suspension than make that order, because in many cases it is a millstone round the man's neck for ever, practically.

4409. Then there is another difficulty and that is that it has been suggested to us by a great many witnesses that the particular offences of not keeping proper books, gambling, and speculating with creditors' money, should be made punishable in the same way as some of the offences under the Debtors' Act are punishable, or even by summary imprisonment by the judge or registrar himself. Could you give us your views on those points ?—With regard to the latter, the summary punishment. I think it must be remembered that there are a very great number of bankruptcy courts in the country—county courts which have bankruptcy jurisdiction—and that very often the bankruptcy jurisdiction in those courts is exercised without the presence of a bar or body of solicitors, and therefore it would be somewhat dangerous, I think myself, to extend the power of summary punishment further than it exists at present. With regard to making them offences under the Debtors' Act, unless one can go back to the very old period when bankruptcy itself was a crime, it does seem—at least I would suggest that it seems—undesirable to multiply criminal offences, if it can possibly be avoided. I cannot help thinking that even with regard to these two offences the courts take a sufficiently serious view of them, and do in practice inflict a considerable suspension when those offences are proved. Might I add with regard to the case of the books, that the books offence varies perhaps as much as any one of them. You may get a man who has kept excellent books really, but which are technically short of all the books that such a trader, if he was in a big position and could afford extensive help, would keep, and I think you might add some general words in that section, such as, "Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the debtor's education and position at the time." As the law stands at present a man who could afford to have his books kept in the best possible way is in exactly the same position as the very poor man who is perhaps making a livelihood with very great difficulty, and also has to keep the best books he can. There are cases, I think—I cannot give you instances—but I believe there have been cases where poor traders, who cannot afford clerical help, have endeavoured to keep the best books they could, but could not possibly bring themselves into the position under the law as it stands of being able to say that they have kept books which sufficiently show their position although they had no dishonest intent at all.

4410. So that you would give the registrars discretion about that ?—Yes, that is what I meant.

4411. I do not know whether, connected with that subject, you have at all considered whether it would be desirable to extend the power of the court to make money orders upon bankrupts, I mean by compelling them to account for their future earnings, or compelling them to pay something. Of course one knows that the courts have rather made the money order of no practical effect, because they never make one unless they can see that the bankrupt is likely to earn something, which presumably is not the case. It has been impressed upon us by some of the witnesses that it would be desirable to make a debtor come and pay unless he can show that he cannot pay ?—I think it is very difficult to enforce any provision of that sort. The money orders at present fall, I should think, roughly into two classes—one where it is very important for a man, to enable him to begin business again, to get an immediate discharge, and where his friends put down a considerable sum, or secure a considerable sum, for the benefit of the creditors; and the other where you get the ordinary money order—namely, judgment against him for so much, and where he is obliged to come and give his account yearly or half-yearly, whichever it is—I forget for the moment. I fancy it will be found, but the official receivers will know better about it than I do, that in the latter case judgment is a very ineffective thing indeed.

4412. (Mr. Smith.) He does not give accounts at present ?—Yes, he does.

4413. (Chairman.) He has to file an account of his business every year ?—Yes, I think that is a very ineffective weapon indeed.

4414. (Mr. Smith.) I think so.

4415. (Witness.) Therefore, I do not think I would recommend that. May I say, though it is not quite absolutely on this section, that there is something rather similar in the case of compositions. As the Committee know, at present if any of these offences are proved, the court must be satisfied that there is 7s. 6d. I think that sub-section might very well be omitted. I think the registrars might be trusted not to allow a discharge where the circumstances did not justify it. There are many cases where the debtor can pay 2s. 6d. in the £, and where the creditors would only be too glad to have it—honest cases, I mean—and I think the limitation at present very often deprives the creditors of a substantial dividend.

4416. (Chairman.) Perhaps I may, in connection with that subject, before continuing with Mr. Hansell, say that Mr. Registrar Linklater, who is one of the most experienced of the registrars, entertains the opinion that the 7s. 6d. clause operates to exclude a great many useful compositions.

4417. I do not know whether you have been able to give any attention to Clauses 4 to 7 of our Terms of Reference ?—Mr. Chairman, may I, before I come to that, add what I thought was a second branch really of, and which really has more to do with, Clauses 1 and 2 and that is, whether or not Section 31 ought not to be strengthened. During the last two or three years the London Bankruptcy Court has been, it is hardly too strong a phrase to say, swamped by a number of alien Jews who have dealt in various trades in different parts of London. Then they go bankrupt and they start immediately again under another name. Half the rotten credit as far as it has come before me in those courts has arisen from cases of that sort. I thought you might shorten the period of undischargedness—if I may use the word—as you would do if you brought up everybody within six months from the close of their public examination. There ought to be some stringent provision to prevent this trading in other names and false names by persons who are still undischarged. In fact I would submit that an undischarged bankrupt ought not to be allowed to trade during the period he was undischarged. It would be a question for the jury whether he was trading really and truly, or whether he was really and truly the servant of somebody else. Of course, one does not want to prevent a man from earning his livelihood and I think if you thought it would be desirable to make people come up for their discharge, it would also be desirable to see that during the period they are undischarged they did not trade—that they were not the real persons trading. I think you might possibly do that by adding to Section 31 as an offence first of all the attempting to obtain credit as well as obtaining credit; secondly, trading after refusal of discharge or while undischarged under an assumed name or style or in the name of any other person; and thirdly, entering into partnership with any other person while undischarged. On the second head, trading after refusal under an assumed name and so on, it would be a question of fact in each case, if the man was prosecuted, as to whether he was honestly a servant. A man may be honestly a servant of his wife for all I know, but if he is a servant then of course the jury would acquit him, so that you would not shut him out from a means of honestly earning his livelihood, but you would prevent what I know happens a great deal among these aliens, viz., trading under cover of some other name.

4418. (Mr. Evans.) Just upon that may I ask a question——

4419. (Chairman.) Certainly.

4420. (Mr. Evans.) Do you propose to alter the amount for which it is forbidden to obtain credit?—I have not considered that.

4421. You see the class of person to whom you are now referring may go on trading somewhat extensively without obtaining credit to the extent of £20 from any one person?—Yes, I am much obliged, I had not thought of that. What I wanted to suggest to the Committee was something to prevent him trading at all.

4422. And therefore you must have some narrower limit than that amount?—Much narrower, if you have any limit at all. I am afraid I had not thought of that. I should think some very small limit would do because it is the small people that bring about all this.

4423. Your object would be attained by saying that he must not trade by obtaining credit at all?—I quite agree. I should leave out any limit at all.

4424. (Chairman.) The next point to which I think the Terms of Reference direct one is as to the after acquired property of an undischarged bankrupt or had you taken Question 4?—I had just made one note under Question 4.

4425. That is as regards the realisation and administration of property?—I think you have probably had it before you before. As it stands at present if an official receiver refuses to appoint a special manager there is no appeal, and inasmuch as there are cases sometimes where the creditors at all events—who very often know most about it at that stage—are very anxious to have a special manager appointed I think you might give them a summary right of appeal to the registrar from a refusal of the official receiver say on a day's notice on an affidavit of grounds and fitness. It is a very small point which is needed in practice.

4426. And then as regards No. 5 of course you are familiar with the difficulties that arise under that?—Yes. I have only two observations to submit to the Committee about that. First of all, what I suppose would be almost universally agreed is that the doctrine of Cohen v. Mitchell should be extended to land, but I do think it might be limited, having regard to what I have said about undischarged bankrupts. I do not think that the protection of Cohen v. Mitchell ought to be applied as it is under the present law to persons who deal with the bankrupt knowing he is undischarged. As the rule in Cohen v. Mitchell is laid down it is immaterial whether the creditor knows or does not know that the person with whom he is dealing is an undischarged bankrupt, and I think if you could limit that it might also be another preventive against undischarged bankrupts going on in the way that they are doing at present.

4427. Then as regards married women do you think that they might be made liable in respect of their separate estate, even when they are with their husbands if they are carrying on a separate trade?—I thought it was hardly necessary to limit it to carrying on a separate trade. What I would have suggested was that in any case where you could get the Scott v. Morley judgment against a married woman it ought to be available for bankruptcy proceedings.

4428. Quite so?—And a necessary consequence of that would be, if you are to make it effective, that it should be lawful to issue a bankruptcy notice upon a judgment in the form of Scott v. Morley which you cannot do at present. At present a married woman can snap her fingers in almost all cases at the creditors. Occasionally you get a proof of separate trading, but it is not very often. Then there is the case of the lady who got married between the petition and the application for the receiving order and got off on that ground.

4429. Do you think that under No. 7 any alteration of the law is required—we have not had many complaints about it?—I have not any suggestion to make about that. It seems to me that the only one that perhaps presses hardly—that as to voluntary settlements—is sufficiently protected by only setting it aside so far as is necessary to pay the debts. I do not think that any alteration is necessary under the head No. 7.

4430. Then passing to No. 8 can you say what you think should be an amendment of the law as regards providing for any official control of the accounts of trustees under deeds of arrangement?—Yes, I have considered that a good deal. May I say in order to make it intelligible that I think one must first determine whether you are to have everything, so to speak, gathered into the net of bankruptcy, or whether you are to have an alternative system in which the creditors are masters rather than the court. Personally, I think that the alternative system, with certain safeguards, is much the best. I think most of the big people in the City will tell you that there are many cases where the estate is more advantageously wound up under a deed than it is in the bankruptcy court—advantageously, I mean, to the creditors—and therefore speaking for myself, I think it is desirable to have the alternative system of distribution more or less under the control of the creditors themselves (with certain amendments which I will suggest in a moment) or bankruptcy, and if you are to have the alternative system I think it would be a great mistake to engraft the official system of bankruptcy upon the mere voluntary system of deeds of arrangement except so far as may be necessary on certain points to try and prevent dishonesty on the part of the trustees and people connected with the administration of the estate. There is, of course, the requirement of the accounts from trustees under deeds of arrangement by Section 25 of the Act of 1890, and I thought perhaps it might be useful to the Committee if they had the figures for last year of cases which have been dealt with under that section, the section which compels or requires trustees under deeds of arrangement to send in their accounts every year to the Board of Trade. In 1903 there were 3,911 deeds registered. I have looked at the numbers for the two years before; they are very much about the same, and I am told that you may take that as a very fairly representative number. The number of cases that came before the Board of Trade solicitor with reference to these accounts was 398, and the number of trustees concerned was 148, and there was one trustee who had no less than forty-four cases brought up against him. Out of these 398 it was only found practicable or necessary to serve notices of motion in fifty-five cases. Twenty-five out of those complied at once and filed accounts or complied without an order of the court. In twenty-five cases there were orders made by the court and five remained over to be dealt with. The only observation I wanted to suggest upon those figures was that having regard to the bulk of deeds of arrangement it seemed to me that the system was working satisfactorily from the point of view of accounting by the trustees, and also from the point of view of the creditors. If you get any further control you interfere not only with the control of the creditors over the property comprised in the deed, but you make that system very difficult to administer because, after all, the deed originates in the will of the debtor—I mean you cannot make him execute it. He either does it of his own motion as is done in many cases, or he does it on the representation of a number of his principal creditors who think that it is the proper thing that he should do. But the difficulty is at present that if the trustee does not do his duty under the trust deed or any difficulty arises, as far as I know there is nothing to be done except commence an administration action which is a cumbersome and expensive thing. I was going to suggest to the Committee whether a provision could not be made with reference to deeds of arrangement similar to that which applies to a voluntary liquidation under Section 138 of the Companies Act, namely, that you might go before the court in a summary way by summons, which is the cheapest possible way you can do it for the determination of any question arising under the deed. I would suggest that a section of that sort might be recommended giving power to the debtor, trustee or creditor, to apply to the court in a summary way to determine any question that had to be determined under the deed.

4433. Have you considered whether a difficulty would arise supposing the trustee did not give security ? I mean whether it would follow that a deed would be void, or what ought to be done ?—I think it would be rather difficult to avoid the deed. I should have thought that then an application would be made to the court under my proposed section to appoint a new trustee.

4434. That I think exhausts that ?—May I say one word more about this ?

4435. Please do ?—The other thing I wanted to say was that there should be some provision that a trustee under a deed should vacate office if a receiving order was made against him just the same as under the Bankruptcy Act. But then there is one other matter—I think it is germane to this—which I wish to put before the Committee. Certainly in the last two or three years there have been a number of cases—I have known of them myself or heard of them—where one of the creditors, very often not a big creditor and frequently actuated by some ulterior motive, has insisted on going into bankruptcy. I thought that you might have some limitation, at all events, to this extent, that the creditor should not be allowed to petition on the deed as an act of bankruptcy unless with the concurrence of some proportion of the creditors—what proportion the committee could determine—what should assent in writing to bankruptcy proceedings. Ig would be very difficult to prevent a creditor petitionine on some fresh act of bankruptcy, but I think he might bf very well prevented from using the deed as an act o bankruptcy unless he was supported by a majority in number and value, or whatever might be the proper proportion, who should express a wish in writing for bankruptcy or unless he made out a primâ facie case as to failure to keep books or with reference to an offence under the Debtors Act or Bankruptcy Act—a criminal offence I meant—or a case of fraud or fraudulent breach of trust.

4436. I think that exhausts Paragraph 8, does not it ? —Yes.

4437. Have you looked at Paragraph 9 with reference to the registration of documents ?—I am afraid only in a very general way. It seemed to me that it was rather undesirable to have more registration if you can help it. For instance, as to hiring agreements, there are many honest hiring agreements just as there are many dishonest hiring agreements. Supposing a young couple wish to furnish their house and they registered the hiring agreement it might be fatal to them. Therefore, personally, I would not be prepared to advocate any extension of the system of registration beyond what exists now.

4438. (Mr. Evans.) One other matter with regard to Section 31, Mr. Hansell. That prohibits an undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit to the extent of £20 from any one person. You would propose, I understand, that he should be prohibited from trading altogether, either with or without the knowledge of the persons with whom he proposes to trade after his being undischarged ?—Yes.

4439. It would not matter if he told them according to your proposal whether he was an undischarged bankrupt at all ?—No, it would be an entirely different limitation from that of obtaining credit according to my idea.

4440. You want to place upon him during that period an absolute disability as to engaging in trade at all ?—From engaging in trade at all and leaving the jury to safeguard any man who has honestly got a position as an employee.

4441. Several suggestions have been made to us for the improvement or the strengthening of the Debtors Act in order to have more frequent and successful prosecutions. Have you considered that matter at all ?—I am afraid I have not specially.

4442. According to your proposals the period of undischarge, if I may use that phrase, would be very much limited in nearly all cases would not it ?—It would be be limited.

4443. In almost all cases ?—I think so.

4444. In that event have you considered the justice or the feasibility of giving some power apart from the judgment or the order under the judgment to appropriate some of the future earnings of the undischarged bankrupt after the period of undischarge has gone for the benefit of his creditors ?—I had not considered any additional powers to those already possessed.

4445. I mean after he has been given a discharge. Supposing a man has been living recklessly and has paid only 1s. in the £ to his creditors and suppose he gets his discharge in six months possibly conditionally, or possibly unconditionally. Suppose immediately afterwards he engages in trade, on the Stock Exchange, or what not and makes large sums of money. Is it not very difficult to make an order which would be effective on a man after his discharge has been completed ?—I should have thought that you must almost leave that to the good sense of the court to see that he did not become a free man too soon. It seems to me that the discharge would be almost a useless thing unless from that moment he is a free man.

4446. Absolutely free ?—Absolutely free.

4447. Of course the order submitting to judgment for a certain sum of money has regard to the past conduct of the man and to whatever then may be known about the future possibilities. You do not think that it is possible, do you, to secure for the creditors of a dishonest bankrupt after his discharge sums of money out of large future earnings ?—No. I think that the moment that the hour for discharge has struck, so to speak, or when it has become absolutely effective, you can do nothing further. In the case of a judgment the judgment would stand as such and there would be no difficulty in enforcing it.

4448. No, to the extent of the judgment ?—To the extent of the judgment, but I do not think you could effectively make a fresh order or that it would be desirable that there should be power to make a fresh order after the discharge has become complete, otherwise it seems to me that the discharge would be a very n gatory thing.

4449. (Mr. Chamberlin.) In other words you would make a discharge, a discharge ?—Yes.

4450. We have had a great deal of evidence brought before us by traders who have given evidence as to the non-keeping of accounts. I take it, Sir, that what you say you would like is to make some difference between those who can and those who cannot keep proper accounts ? —Yes, I want to make the discretion a little more elastic because I think there is hardly any offence perhaps which varies more in its circumstances than that one.

4451. That is to say, in the cases a man who is able to keep books of account and has kept books of account, when he discontinues keeping those books of account for the sake of hiding up his earnings, you would make that a serious matter ?—Yes, a very serious matter indeed, but as regards the little shopkeeper who has got no assistants except a girl or a boy I would give power in his case to treat it as a different class of offence from that of the kind of which you were speaking.

4452. Do you consider it to be very detrimental to the trading interests of the country that we should have a large number of undischarged bankrupts going about ?—I personally think that it is. I should perhaps be puzzled to give a very specific reason for it, but it does seem to me that it leads to a great deal of obtaining credit in one part and then going off to some other part. I mean when he is undischarged a man does not care very much one way or another.

4453. Do you think that with a certain class of people they do not care whether they are discharged or whether they are not ?—They do not care in the least.

4454. And therefore it is no punishment ?—It is no punishment and some of them I think would rather remain undischarged. I have in my mind the aliens one sees in the London Bankruptcy Court who manage to get credit from respectable firms. In about four months they may be off to some other district. They may have been trading in the north of London and then they go to the south, and from the south they go to the east, and from the east they go and try the western air.

4455. (Mr. Peat.) On the subject of books your suggestion was that the compulsion should be limited by the means and education of the debtor. Do you suggest that if a man does not keep books who has the means and the education to do so he should not be guilty of a criminal offence ?—Not criminal, all I meant to suggest was this, that instead of a cast iron rule which applies to all classes of traders as the section stands at present by inserting some words such as these: "having regard to all the circumstances of the case," or something of that sort, the court should be given the discretion to discriminate between the one class of case and the other.

4456. That is to say that the sole punishment for a man capable of keeping books and who has kept books, but who ceases to keep them is to be the question of discharge ?—I think so, unless of course it amounted to a criminal offence, to fraud or something of that sort. I was not suggesting that the criminal law should be extended with regard to books.

4457. Just so. Then possibly it might not accord with your view to suggest that even the smallest shopkeeper is capable of taking stock at the beginning of the year and at the end of the year. With that minimum information a debtor would disclose what payments he had made and if he had been gambling or if he had been horse racing it would be seen and it would also be seen what he had been spending. It would also be seen if he had lost money and the amount of money which he had lost in any period. I do not ask you to suggest it—it would be my own suggestion rather, and I would ask your opinion upon it, that every trader should be compelled to keep such a minimum statement of accounts and that if he failed to do so—unless either his means or his education made that impossible—it must be assumed that he had failed to do so for some fraudulent reason provided that he subsequently became bankrupt. However, that is not your view ?—That was not quite my view, that it should be so expressed. I wanted myself to leave it in the discretion of the court. If the court thought that the trader you speak of could have kept the minimum set of books I should have supposed that the court would have said that if he had not he then brought himself within the section as it stands.

4458. But the section as it stands surely does not allow him to be imprisoned, it only allows his discharge to be suspended?—Quite. I have not contemplated that in any sense with regard to the non-keeping of books, and if I may respectfully say so, I think on general principles it would be rather undesirable to do so on the principle of not multiplying criminal offences more than you can help. I daresay it sounds rather a priori than practical, but I only want to show why it is that I say that.

4459. In France and other Continental countries it is compulsory to keep books ?—A criminal offence ?

4460. I think so, but I cannot answer as to that for a dead certainty, but I believe so. Then with regard to your suggestion that an undischarged bankrupt must not trade, and can only earn a living by being a servant, that raises the question of differentiation between bankrupts. A person who becomes bankrupt who is a trader would according to your view be unable to carry on business for a period, it might be of years, while a person who is a broker, who is a commission agent who does not trade, would forthwith be in that position, because he does not trade. He merely acts as a buyer—as a go-between between two people ?—When I used the word "trading" I meant to say carrying on any business.

4461. That is to say if a man is an accountant and is unlucky enough to become a bankrupt he may not do accounts in future. Your view would prevent that man continuing his occupation—you may call it an occupation instead of a trade.

4462. (Mr. Addison.) You limit it to traders, I understand.

4463. (Mr. Peat.) He does not desire to do so.

4464. (Witness.) I do not at the moment. I meant by traders not any such definition of traders as there was under the old Act. I cannot see why there should be any difference from this point of view between a trade and a profession.

4465. I understand you to say "occupation" is the better word ?—Occupation if you please.

4466. My difficulty with regard to that is that you have the debtor for an uncertain period without means of livelihood unless he becomes a servant to somebody else, that is to say his means of livelihood, even if his friends came forward to assist him with capital, are gone except as a servant. Now the criticism upon it is that it seems undesirable to so limit a debtor's chances of making a living, and to keep him in the flotsam and jetsam of the people for an uncertain period of years. I suggest for your consideration that it might be better that a debtor should receive his discharge subject to a money payment. If he has done wrong let that wrong be represented by judgment against him, but do not stop his means of living. If he has been honest give him his discharge. If he has committed offences such as not keeping books, and others matters of that sort, let that be represented by a money payment to come out of his future earnings. You thereby enable a man to trade and keep him from the unfortunate position of being unable to find a situation and not allowed to follow his occupation. It occurs to me also, that the suggestion to stop him following his occupation might be overcome by scheming debtors and those are the class of men we have to deal with who would get a dummy to be the person nominally responsible, the debtor's income being, say 95 per cent. of the profits ?—It is exactly that sort of case that I thought the jury would deal with. It would be a question of fact then in that case whether he was not simply trading under a cover name.

4467. Then say 50 per cent. of the profits ?—I mean whatever the percentage was, if he is using a dummy, the jury would probably find that he was trading whatever the consequences might be, but if he really and truly was a servant then they would acquit him. You see it is just like a person who practises any profession, that of a solicitor or any other profession, under cover. It is a question of fact for the tribunal—aye or no—is the so-called head of the firm merely a dummy who is put up to hide the undischarged person, or is he the real person to whom the undischarged bankrupt has become a servant or employee.

4469. By the scheming person for whom you have to legislate. It is only the scheming person who does that sort of thing ?—Yes, what I thought was that the moment you get liberty to trade, you get the present state of things by which the undischarged bankrupt at once begins again in the name of his wife, or in a somewhat similar name very often, and yet it is his business all the same. I do not see how you are to stop that sort of thing, except by making it a matter for which punishment would be inflicted.

4470. You would punish that criminally, but you would not punish the very thing which leads more to bankruptcy than anything else, namely, absence of books ?—I am afraid that is so. I mean that that was my view.

4471. Yes, absolutely. However, I understand your view to be unshaken and that it would be preferable to leave a bankrupt without income unless he could get it as a servant, rather than that he should, when he comes up compulsorily for his discharge, get his discharge, whatever offence he has committed being represented by judgment against him ?—My reason for it is, that I think judging by the experience of judgments in the past, it would be enormously difficult in most cases which you want to hit, namely, those in which these little schemirg people are concerned, to enforce that judgment. I quite accept, if I may say so, the desirability of lettirg a man ea n what he c:n, but I think the judgment you propose would, in practice, probably turn out to be quite as ineffective as the present judgments which in most cases are absolutely disregarded. I think they would tell you that the amount which they get under these judgments—judgments which are spread over terms of years—is not worth talking about. The moment the discharge is granted and there is a judgment against the scheming debtor we are talking about, he does not bother about coming to render his account, but he simply goes away somewhere else and you cannot trace him.

4472. But if it is made compulsory ?—It is made compulsory now, but I am afraid in practice he does not do it but that the official receivers can tell you better than I can. I do not think I am going beyond the mark in saying that in many cases it is a pure form. I know that in appearing for the bankrupts one has not infrequently very gladly accepted a judgment. I think the Chairman would remember that from his own experience.

4473. If it was commensurate with his means or probable means I do not see how it should be ineffective. I quite admit that if you put a judgment for £1,000 against a small grocer it is hopeless, but if it is commensurate with his prospects I think it would be a different thing. However, I do not want to pursue the point any further.

4475. (Mr. Addison.) I want to clear up one point. I do not think on reflection you would quite use the word "occupation." For instance, it would prevent a physician or surgeon from practising. A solicitor of course is subject to the Law Society and to the Master of the Rolls and he must have a certificate to practise, but would you not be going too far to say that a man should not follow his occupation ?—The difficulty I feel is this——

4476. It might destroy the very means of paying anything?—That would apply to each class, and I cannot quite see myself what would be the justice of applying one set of things to a person whom you might put in an arbitrary category and call a trader and not apply the same system to a person who would not be in that category.

4477. Do you not think that that is a strong argument against applying your rule ?—I am afraid that I am not quite sure that I do. You must make up your mind whether it is desirable that an undischarged bankrupt should be allowed to——

4478. To earn money ?—To earn money.

4479. (Chairman.) What I think Mr. Hansell meant was that he should not be allowed to do it on credit because a bone setter or a doctor does not want credit.

4480. (Mr. Addison.) I should agree to that; he should not be allowed to do it on credit. However, I think we might pass from that. There are one or two small matters further you have not been asked and I know you have had a large experience. What is your opinion of the present system of proxies as to their being burdensome to the creditors in respect of unnecessary restrictions ?—I have not considered it for the purposes of to-day although I have considered it, I think, very carefully in an opinion I had to write some time ago. My general recollection is that it seemed to me that the regulations as to proxies were unnecessarily strict—that is to say the regulations as to the persons by whom they might be signed and so on.

4481. (Mr. Peat.) And filled up ?—And filled up. I think if business is to be conducted properly there ought to be a much larger number of persons who might be authorised by the creditor.

4482. (Mr. Addison.) By means of a general proxy ?—Yes.

4483. Now with regard to deeds of arrangement being made binding you have suggested that the creditor should not be entitled to upset the deed unless a certain proportion of creditors united in his application to the court and treated it as an act of bankruptcy ?—Yes, not to treat it as an act of bankruptcy.

4484. Supposing that for any reason that mode of dealing with the subject was not considered satisfactory, would you accept as an alternative that where a deed was assented to by a great majority it should not be set aside unless on application to the Court and on sufficient grounds ?—I think, myself, that an arrangement other than administration in bankruptcy is very difficult to make binding on the minority unless you go through the provisions of the act of bankruptcy under which such an arrangement can be made. I think it would be very difficult to make a deed which is outside the Bankruptcy Act and outside the Court altogether, in its inception at all events, binding upon or even prima facie binding upon a minority.

4485. But I misunderstand you. I thought when you spoke of a deed binding unless the creditor had a certain number of creditors associated with him in applying to the Court that you were speaking of a deed outside the Court ?—Yes, so I was, but what I intended to say with regard to it was this, that where an ordinary deed of arrangement has been entered into a creditor should not be allowed to come and file his bankruptcy petition upon that.

4486. I mean the same thing ?—As an act of bankruptcy.

4487. That he should not be allowed to treat it as an act of bankruptcy where the deed had been assented to by a substantial majority unless the Court thought it was a fit case ?—I put it the other way that where the deed had been executed by the debtor—and I think I thought in my own mind although I did not express it—at all events assented to by some of the creditors, that one creditor should not be allowed to come to the Court and use that as an act of bankruptcy unless he had backing him up in the application to the Court a substantial number of creditors.

4488. That is a more stringent provision than the one I was suggesting ?—A little more.

4489. (Chairman.) Except, Mr. Hansell, that under your idea even if the deed was binding he might be made bankrupt under another act of bankruptcy. Of course under Mr. Hansell's suggestion if he was made bankrupt under another act of bankruptcy the deed would be upset.

4490. (Witness.) I mean to leave the creditors free to make use of any act of bankruptcy except that one. A creditor sometimes waits very nearly to the end of three months and then he comes in and uses the deed as an act of bankruptcy and gets a receiving order, whereas he might not be able otherwise to get another act of bankruptcy in time to upset the deed.

4491. (Mr. Addison.) Would you approve of shortening that period of three months ?—For relation generally ?

4492. In the case of an act of bankruptcy under a deed of arrangement ?—I should have thought that three months was a very reasonable time.

4493. Of course it greatly prejudices the trustee under the deed in speedy realisation and division ?—Yes, it does. That is what I meant to say, but that is a question which perhaps those familiar with the actual work of realisation could answer better than I could.

4494. From your experience, can you say whether you think the procedure is too slow and too expensive at present in the case of a creditor who has, we will say, got a judgment under Order 14 or an ordinary judgment on a debt—seeking to get a receiving order in London ?—With regard to the first step I do not think seven days for the bankruptcy notice are too much. I think it is a reasonable time to give a man in which to turn round, and one has known of bankruptcy notices being complied with within the time. You can hardly shorten that period. With regard to the petition it would be very difficult in practice, I think, to get an appointment much before eight days from the filing of the petition and, of course, you have to prepare the affidavits of debt and so on. If it is an act of bankruptcy such as absconding and so on it may want a good deal of proof. I do not think you could very satisfactorily shorten the eight days. Of course in special cases there is power given to abridge.

Mr. E. W. Hansell.

4495. I daresay you know there are considerable complaints amongst the mercantile community as to delay and expense ?—I did not know that there had been any complaint of delay—I mean it had not come before me until you mentioned it this moment. The expense, I suppose, is chiefly as much as anything with regard to fees.

4496. Yes, they are heavy ?—The stamp, and so on, but that is an Imperial matter.

4497. There is one point I should like to know as to whether it has come before you. It has, to a certain extent, come before me, and that is the case of a business where there may be a valuable goodwill. There is no power before the appointment of a trustee to realise that goodwill. The special manager is a mere interim manager, and I should like to know whether cases have come before you in which it would have been desirable on application to the Court with the approval of the creditors to get an order for the immediate sale of such a thing as the goodwill of a business ?—I do not remember any case in which that has come under my consideration. But is not there some difficulty always in selling property until the property has been divested from the debtor ?

4498. A power might be given to the Court of course ?—I can quite understand it being said that perhaps on the receiving order the property ought to vest so as to shorten the period of vesting but I should have thought it undesirable to give power of sale during the period when the property had not been di ested from the debtor.

4499. The particular cases which have come before me are perhaps not likely to occur again—they have been cases of country banks where the goodwill has gone into space ?—Yes, I think that is the only difficulty that occurs to me about it—selling the man's property before the Act of Parliament has taken it out of him.

4500. I think there is one matter I wish to refer to further and that is the assignment of book debts. Have you found that in your experience the assignment of book debts by a debtor is a common thing—the assignment of book debts in favour of a particular creditor ?—Do you mean an assignment of book debts by way of fraudulent preference ?

4501. To secure a past debt. In the City we do not come across those things ?—I do not remember at this moment many cases where they have been attacked as a fraudulent preference.

4502. Have you come across many cases where there has been an assignment of book debts to secure past debts ?—Yes, a good many I think and more often to secure a past debt and future advances, but I think I have known them simply to secure a past debt, but I do not remember any case where it has been done by way of fraudulent preference.

4503. Frequent or unfrequent should you call those cases ?—The assignment of book debts ?

4504. Yes ?—I think I should say frequent—certainly frequent for past and future advances and not infrequent for past debts only.

4505. On the subject of discharge, which is a most difficult subject, the feeling that I have is this that bankruptcy is intended to produce two results—that is to distribute a man's assets rateably—that is one thing—and the next is to give him a discharge in a proper case. Query whether the court should give a man a discharge for the balance of his debts where he does not deserve it. Then there is the further difficulty, as the law at present stands, that if you keep the bankrupt undischarged you have him incurring fresh debts—getting goods perhaps from various persons and then the trustee in the old bankruptcy comes forward to the great prejudice of those who have subsequently become creditors. The idea to my mind was rather that we should stop that—close the right of the trustee to lay hold of what you may call after acquired property, but in some way leave the debtor liable to be called upon yearly or otherwise if he were in a position to do it to make some payments out of his earnings for his debts. As a scheme it seems reasonable. The difficulties I quite agree will be very great in giving effect to it. Is that proposition at all one that would commend itself to you ?—The difficulty is to my mind that you have got to deal with a body of creditors who are ascertained, that is to say, creditors whose debts will be provable in bankruptcy, and then a potential body who may or may not come into existence afterwards, and of course you may get cases of hardship both on the one body and on the other. It may be for instance that the man at the moment of his bankruptcy having incurred a great many debts had practically got no assets. He might then go on trading and incurring fresh debts and then he might come into a very large sum of money afterwards, but the old creditors would be left out in the cold in such a case as that.

4506. So I think they should be ?—Of course if you think they should be, then the simple way I suppose would be to delete altogether the provisions as to the vesting of after acquired property in the trustee.

4507. Yes, with a right to have the man brought up and made to account for a proportion of his earnings or his profits ?—That right would be subject to the payment of all the subsequent creditors. I think it is very difficult indeed to suggest a scheme which will be absolutely fair to both classes of creditors.

4508. We all agree that the long suspension of the discharge is very undesirable ?—Is very undesirable.

4509. Many chambers of commerce and other bodies do not think that the bankrupt is sufficiently punished at present, and there can be no way of punishing him otherwise than in connection with a criminal offence or by taking some of his future earnings ?—I am afraid I have not quite thought of the matter in the way you are putting it so as to be able to suggest any kind of remedy that would be effective.

4510. That is what we have to try and do, and it is very difficult ?—With regard to the creditors who are subsequent to the bankruptcy ?

4511. Yes ?—I am afraid I have not thought of anything more than I have already suggested about it. I am sorry that it had not occurred to me quite in that light.

4512. (Sir Edward Fithian.) With respect to the assignment of book debts, I should like to know whether the answer you gave with regard to hiring agreements would also apply to assignment of book debts—that is, that you are rather against registration ?—Of course as the law stands with regard to the assignment of book debts the assignee has to take the risk of reputed ownership unless he gives notice to the book debtors, and very often if he does give notice to the book debtors it at once precipitates matters. Registration would be very fatal to the assignor, and the assignee has got to run the considerable risk which he does run of having them taken away under the reputed ownership clause.

4513. But have you considered the interest of the creditors who find when the bankruptcy takes place that a large portion of the assets upon which they have been relying are swept away for the benefit of one creditor ?—But, with great respect, do you think that an ordinary creditor who gives credit does in fact rely upon the existence of book debts. I should have thought that he knew very little about it. I know he is supposed to under reputed ownership, but I have always thought it a very mythical reliance.

4514. The creditor anticipates book debts as part of the assets he can rely on in the event of bankruptcy, and if those are pledged to one creditor he is placed in an awkward position ?—I should have thought that in a great many cases the creditor did not know whether there were or were not book debts, or at all events did not know what the extent of them was in the slightest degree.

4515. No, that is a matter that the creditors are extremely anxious to know, namely, whether the debts are available, and by registration they would know that?—I do not know, I am sure, that there would be any practical objection to registration of assignment of book debts.

4516. At any rate you have no objection to it?—No, I do not think I have.

4517. That will be sufficient for my purpose. In regard to the question of discharge, have you experienced any difficulty in proving that the debtor has omitted to keep the usual and proper books of account in his trading?—I do not remember at this moment any case where the Official Receiver's report has been upset upon the ground that the books which the debtor has not kept are not usual in that particular trade. I think, speaking generally, there are certain classes of books which it is assumed all traders should keep, such as a cash book, bought and sold ledger, and so on.

4518. Words of this kind have given considerable difficulty in Scotland under the Scotch Debtors Act, and the failure of that Act is attributed very largely to the insertion of those words?—I can only say that I do not think that in my experience I have known of any debtor who has successfully contended that. Yes, there is the case of Mutton, an old case where they certainly did contend in one particular trade that certain books were not necessary, but I think, taking the general run of cases, it works out by a sort of rule of thumb and that the real point is not so much whether the man has kept books A, B, and C, but whether the books he has kept show his financial position.

4519. I take it that you recommend a reduction of the period of suspension in many cases?—Yes, there are certainly cases where I am convinced that the two years' minimum has operated very hardly indeed.

4520. Would not the effect of your recommendation be rather to weaken the operation of the Bankruptcy Act than strengthen it?—I had not so intended. I had intended to strengthen it, because what I intended was to give the Registrars a much wider discretion. The object of reducing the minimum is simply in the interests of the honest debtors, but it will leave the same powers that they have got with the possible exception of making an order for suspension till payment of 5s. instead of 10s. As to the period of suspension, it will leave them with the same powers to punish the fraudulent debtors as they have at present, and in fact I want to give them rather more.

4521. The general complaint of the trading community is that the Act is too weak, and requires strengthening?—Of course it was with the object of strengthening what I think is the weakest part of the whole thing that I made this suggestion about Section 31.

4522. We have had a large amount of evidence showing that the suspension of discharge is not really regarded as any punishment at all?—The evidence, as I gather it, shows that they do not care in the slightest degree whether it is suspended or whether it is not. They do not even come and ask—they go one better on that.

4523. Does not that rather point to this, that we ought to have some more drastic punishment?—Well, it was with the idea of making the thing more drastic, and yet at the same time not extending the criminal aspect of it, that I suggested compulsory discharge, and what I think Mr. Peat, at all events, thinks my rather too drastic suggestion as to the position of undischarged bankrupts.

4524. In regard to trading?—In regard to trading. It was with that object that I tried to make the suggestion for strengthening the Act, and the only way that I think it can properly be done is in the way I have suggested.

4525. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I understand you to make it compulsory, and that they should be compelled to come up?—Certainly, with the provision of having a warrant against them if they did not.

4526. (Mr. Smith.) Mr. Addison stated that the object of the Bankruptcy Law was twofold—the distribution of assets, and the release of the debtor, but do not you think that there is a third object also to be kept in view, namely, the prevention of the abuses which lead to bankruptcy—the commission of the offences which are mentioned in Section 8, and which tend to produce bankruptcy. Do not you think that there is the public interest, the interest of commercial morality which ought to be aimed at by the Act?—I quite think so, and I think that is why those offences were put in. I quite assent to that.

4527. Do you think that the present system, as settled by the Bankruptcy Act, and as administered by the courts, goes as far as legislation can legitimately be expected to go?—I think so with the amendments I have suggested, unless you are going back to a very ancient idea, and regard the bankrupt as ipso facto a criminal person who is outside society, as I think he was in the Middle Ages. Mr. E. W. Hansell. 23 Jan. 1907.

4528. You have just stated that this clause would be put in to effect that object and that you would not like to do anything to weaken that?—Not the least—when I say "not the least" I am not at all sure that the assets offence—the provision with regard to the 10s.—is a very valuable provision. I do not suggest its being abolished, because I want to abolish the minimum punishment, but if you keep the minimum punishment and you have the assets offence you get the hardest cases of all in my experience, where they are obliged to give two years, because they cannot quite prove that the failure to pay 10s. in the £ was due to causes over which the bankrupt had no control.

4529. Would you punish a debtor for these offences notwithstanding that the debtor may be supported in his application for discharge by the creditors?—I do not think that that really comes in at all. Given that those are offences which ought to be stopped, then I think you should not have regard to the fact that the creditors support, and in my experience the supporting creditors on a discharge are generally instructed by the same solicitor who appears for the debtor.

4530. And you think that the Act properly excludes the wishes and desires of the creditors. You would not like to see the system re-established of discharging the debtor upon a resolution of creditors?—No, not at all. I think the present system is much better where the creditor can appear and either object or support, though in most cases the court pays very little attention to supporting creditors, because they are either relations or friends.

4531. Do not you think that the system of voluntary arrangement tends to encourage the evasion of those provisions?—Then the only alternative is to have nothing but bankruptcy, and I think there are many cases—what I may call the higher class and better class of cases—where the creditors themselves can and do manage the affairs better under a deed than under the provisions of the Act.

4532. I quite agree. I think there are many such cases. On the other hand are there not a great many cases, where deeds are resorted to by a debtor and the consent of his creditors obtained, where investigation would show that there had been misconduct of all kinds?—I cannot say that such cases have come under my own observation, but it was rather with the view to something of that sort that I suggested that even one dissenting creditor might use the deed as an act of bankruptcy if he could show a prima facie case of misconduct.

4533. But is not the very object of bringing the man into court to ascertain whether there is a prima facie case? As a rule the creditor cannot know the facts about his debtor until he has brought him to the court and the examination has taken place. Now there is no examination under a deed of arrangement, and no power of examining the debtor on the part of an independent creditor?—But must not a man be presumed to be innocent until he is shown to be guilty?

4534. I quite agree, but I am putting this as a reason why nothing should be done to encourage or facilitate executing deeds of arrangement which might have that result. You would not like to encourage either making approval of the vast majority of the creditors binding on the minority, or making it easier for a bankrupt to evade a searching examination in bankruptcy by resorting to a deed of arrangement. You see you suggest that a creditor should not be allowed to make a deed of arrangement the basis of a petition in bankruptcy. Why should not he be allowed to make the execution of a deed of arrangement, which sweeps away the whole of his assets, the basis of a petition in bankruptcy?—The reason I gave was this. I did not mean to prevent him making it the basis of a petition, but I meant to avoid the case, which I certainly have known myself, of one creditor—and very often not a big creditor—but just large enough to present a petition—for some reason, apparently quite foreign to the distribution of the assets in the best possible way (very often waiting until nearly the statutory period of three months has elapsed, and because a little pressure applied has not met with any answer), coming forward with a petition at the last moment, which the court is absolutely bound to accept, although it may know that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the creditors wish for the deed. The case of ex parte Oram which prevents the court even adjourning a petition to consider whether the scheme or deed outside the Act will work well, puts it in the power of one creditor from spite, or through not getting a little backsheesh, or something of that sort, to throw the whole thing into bankruptcy. It was for that reason that I suggested that he should have the support of whatever number might be thought right of creditors, who should signify their assent to bankruptcy in writing, or give a prima facie proof of the things you mention, such as misconduct, or the commission of one of the criminal offences.

Mr. E. W. Hansell.

4535. I quite understand that view, but I understand you propose to abolish the section of the Bankruptcy Act which defines it as an act of bankruptcy that if in England or elsewhere he makes a conveyance or an assignment of his property?—No, not in the least. I do not propose that. I am sorry I have not made myself clear. What I intended to recommend was to let the deed of assignment be an act of bankruptcy, but not to let the creditor use that particular act of bankruptcy as the basis of his petition, unless he is supported either by some of his fellow creditors or gives prima facie evidence of misconduct which the court ought to inquire into.

4536. I suppose it would not be very material, because in most cases you would be able to prove some other act of bankruptcy; but in principle, if it did operate at all, it might operate in many cases unjustly, I submit?—With respect, it is not always so easy to prove another act of bankruptcy.

4537. Then I say it would operate unjustly, because over against the cases you mention which, in my opinion, are much fewer than are generally supposed—cases of blackmail—you have cases of creditors who have got reason to believe that the debtor has been guilty of various acts of misconduct, and who honestly desire to have an investigation by the Bankruptcy Court. You have cases like that, where the creditors are driven to found their petition on the fact that the whole property which they are entitled to share in is to be swept away under the deed of arrangement?—With great respect, I do not think my proposal would prevent anything of the sort if they have good reason to believe that he has been guilty of offences which ought to be inquired into and in respect of which they could make out a prima facie case.

4538. I suggest not?—Then where there is good reason for believing——

4539. They may have good reason for believing it although they may not be able to satisfy the court by evidence?—I do not think you can make a man a criminal by faith, can you?

4540. Supposing they have a strong suspicion?—I do not think that a court ever acts on suspicion. The lines betwen suspicion and making out a prima facie case may be lines that converge naturally.

4541. I am assuming a case where the creditor has a judgment for his debt, and where there is no question about his debt, and he says, "I do not wish to come under this deed of arrangement; I want to have it come into court for investigation. I have no act of bankruptcy under which I can proceed—although I have got my judgment—except the fact that the debtor has parted with all his property"?—The judgment creditor could make a new act of bankruptcy.

4542. You do not think that he should be allowed to use the fact that the debtor has executed a deed?—No, if he is a judgment creditor he will get an act of bankruptcy in seven days and he will be all right.

4543. With regard to deeds of arrangement I have just one or two questions to put to you. You recommended that the trustees should be obliged to give security. Would you do that if the creditors do not want the expense of giving security?—The reason I made that recommendation was a twofold one. First of all, I think I found it in a report—I think the report of the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy.

4544. Very likely?—I thought so—it was a report to which I paid great attention and respect. That was the first reason, and the second reason was that I was very much impressed by the case I have mentioned which came to the Court of Appeal the other day, where the trustee under the deed was himself an undischarged bankrupt. They applied that he should give security for costs, and the Judge at Chambers held that they could not make him give security for costs, but the Court of Appeal said yes they could.

4545. Is not that contrary to your principle that there shall be a voluntary arrangement between the debtor and his creditor?—Voluntary, but subject to some reasonable control.

4546. Very well. Then is it not a reasonable requirement that their accounts should be audited?—I do not think so. I think that either you must let the creditors manage or the Department, one of the two. I do not think both.

4547. You are aware that the Board of Trade have no power to deal with the accounts beyond putting them into a pigeon hole?—I never knew what became of them after the application in court with which I have to do.

4548. Although they have representations from creditors that the trustee has acted dishonestly they cannot interfere in it?—I think in many cases, having to give an account is a very wholesome deterrent and I think it is the only plan which I can think of which stops short of taking the real control of affairs out of the hands of the creditors and putting it into the hands of the Department.

4549. You would not listen to any complaint by the creditor of maladministration and bring it before the court or otherwise?—I wanted to exclude the Department from that by the clause I suggested for the summary method of applying to the Court in Bankruptcy as they do in winding up. I suggest there should be a clause similar to Section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, which would enable any creditor, trustee, or person interested to go to the Bankruptcy Court by summary process, by summons, and get any question determined.

4550. Would not that be a much more expensive and elaborate process than going to the Board of Trade?—I suppose it would be more expensive.

4551. If the Board of Trade are entrusted by the Legislature with supervising the administration of estates in bankruptcy and the auditing of accounts why should trustees under deeds of arrangement be summoned before the court and not before the Board of Trade?—For this reason, that if you are to have a dual system I fancy, looking at it from the point of view of the creditor, the creditor will say, "If it is to be my affair let it be my affair." I only gave this remedy over to the court to prevent injustice, and it seemed to me that the court was the natural place to go to rather than the Department. I think the moment you give any control to the Department—the Board of Trade—the creditors will say you are gathering us all into the bankruptcy net and you are doing away with the dual system. That may be right but it is not my view.

4552. I will not press that question further. What is the date of that Act of New South Wales?—It is Act No. 25 of 1898.

4553. That is a comparatively recent Act.

4554. (Chairman.) It is a consolidation Act.

4555. (Mr. Smith.) I have seen the Act, but I wanted to bring out the fact that it is a comparatively recent Act, and you suggest that following the precedent there the bankrupt should come up in every case for consideration?—Yes.

4556. What order of discharge should the court there make; should it make the order it makes at present—do you propose any alteration in that?—The clause I drafted was that when he comes up like that, which has to be within a very short period, six months or thereabouts, from the close of the public examination the court should deal with the case exactly as if he had come up on his own initiative, so that if a bankrupt was anxious for his discharge he would apply at once.

4557. You do not propose any alteration in the conditions?—Not in the least, because the period I have suggested is a comparatively short period and I do not think it would be fair to impose any further penalty on the bankrupt who had not applied possibly from want of means.

4558. With regard to the two years' limit and the 10s. limit, I understand your view is that a larger power should be left to the court, to the discretion of the court?—Yes.

4559. Do you recognise the fact that the Act of 1890 was passed simply because it was supposed that in many cases the court was too lenient in the exercise of its discretion and that it was intended to limit the discretion of the court?—I do not really know. I did not know that that was the history. I daresay it was; I was really only speaking from the practical point of view. I thought that particular clause of the minimum punishment has been tried and found wanting and is objectionable.

4560. I think it was found that in many cases very short nominal periods of discharge were made in very bad cases and that in other cases the courts did not consider the non-payment of dividend made any difference as to the conduct of the debtor, and in other cases yo sanctioned compositions of 6d. in the £. I put it to you that the object of the Act of 1890 was to put a stop to those abuses, if possible. In the face of that will you suggest going back to the old system and giving an unlimited discretion to the courts to deal with these matters?—Yes. I think of the two evils, if they both be evils, you must choose the less. You ought to and must trust the court.

4561. You think that the present system does not work satisfactorily?—I do.

4562. Then I will take that answer. On the subject of proxies, what alteration would you suggest in the present system of proxies?—I am very sorry that I did not consider the subject of proxies apropos of this examination. I did not know that I was going to be asked about them. I did not go into the question.

4563. Then I will not press it if you have not considered it?—Speaking generally, what I meant to say was this, that I thought that it might be left to the creditors more to say to whom they would give the general proxies and who should fill them up, and that the present regulations as to being in the handwriting of creditors were tiresome.

4564. Have you considered the abuses which arose under the 1868 Act under a similar system; have you considered the practice that prevailed under the old Act of accountants and creditors going round touting practically to get proxies and selling them to each other?—You may have your provision against touting perfectly well and against accountants doing what you say.

Mr. E. W. Hansell. 23 Jan. 1907.

4565. There is a provision which is absolutely valueless?—Strengthened with——

4566. But you cannot strengthen it unless you prevent the proxies themselves being valid—at least that was found in 1883?—Is that quite so. Does it make it less easy. I do not know, I am sure, but I should not have thought that the mere fact of the proxies being filled up by someone who is trusted by the creditor with that power would lead to more misuse of proxies than if he had to take the proxy in his hand and fill it up himself.

4567. I can assure you every point of that kind was considered in 1883 and nothing was introduced except with the view of stopping specified abuses?—You have got to make the machine work.

4568. And does it not work at present? Have you had any complaints from creditors that it does not?—I have had several complaints. Not long ago there was a great complaint on a question about a rubber stamp—a thing which might have done for it, but in this particular case there was no choice but to reject the proxy, although it was perfectly honestly given. I think you must make the machine to work.

4569. I suggest that it does work. Out of 100,000 proxies that have been granted under the Act of 1883 I can tell you this fact, that I do not think there have been twenty complaints by creditors to the Board of Trade?—I certainly have heard complaints, not to the Board of Trade, but from other people who have not troubled the Board of Trade.

4570. But from creditors?—Yes.

4571. Not professional agents?—No. Cases submitted on behalf of creditors who thought that the present restrictions were unnecessarily irksome. That is what it comes to.

4572. Yes, I have heard of them often enough?—Therefore I think that the abuse I speak of—— 4573–5. Is a real abuse?—I think that the creditors think so, or I will not call it an abuse, but an unnecessarily tiresome limitation.

Mr. Richard David Muir, called; and Examined.

4576. (Chairman.) Mr. Muir has been kind enough to say that he would come and give us his assistance upon the question that the Attorney-General instructed the Director of Public Prosecutions to refer to us, which was the question whether the Public Prosecutor should have a discretion as regards bankruptcy offences. Mr. Muir, I think you have been standing counsel to the Treasury for a great many years now?—My first appointment was in 1898.

Mr. Richard D. Muir. 23 Jan. 1907.

4577. I think you have had considerable experience in the conduct of prosecutions for bankruptcy offences instituted by the Public Prosecutor?—Yes, I suppose about one quarter of them in London during that period.

4578. Now the point which the Director of Public Prosecutions has principally submitted to the Committee or at least the Attorney-General, is this:—That under the Act if the registrar or judge orders a prosecution then the Director of Public Prosecution is obliged to carry it out, and he suggests that we should recommend that he should be given an absolute discretion to refuse to conduct such a prosecution if he thinks that a verdict of guilty would not be obtained. Could you give us the benefit of your experience and your views on that subject?—My view is that nobody ought to be tied down to go on with a prosecution when he thinks the facts will not substantiate the accusation that is made. Those powers of ordering prosecutions were given in 1851 with regard to perjury to all sorts of judges and to magistrates, and they were exercised. They were so given because it was found that perjury was very prevalent in the courts and it was thought that something ought to be done to stop it. But they have been found to work so badly that practically the section of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1851, which gives those powers, has fallen into entire disuse, and within my experience the few instances in which the judges, or magistrates have ordered such prosecutions have been cases in which no such prosecution ever should have taken place. The judge feels incensed at what he regards as perjury on one side or the other, and he orders a prosecution, and it is found when the prosecution is started that there is not the necessary evidence to support it. It fails and it brings prosecutions for perjury into disrepute. I think the general principle is a good one, that where the person in charge of a prosecution, especially the head of a public department, feels that he cannot support it he ought to be at liberty to retire from it.

4579. Then you support on the whole the view of the Director of Public Prosecutions?—I do. I do not think myself that if the law were altered in the sense suggested that it would make any very great difference in the number of prosecutions proceeded with. I think, although some prosecutions perhaps fail because they ought never to have been instituted that the number of such prosecutions is very small. I recognise that in bankruptcy prosecutions there is a very large percentage of failures to secure convictions, but I think those failures are to a very large extent to be attributed to causes other than the ordering of prosecutions, which should never have been commenced.

Mr. Richard D. Muir.

4580. Do you think that any of the offences under the Debtors Act might be made punishable on summary conviction instead of going for trial before a jury, or that that would be unsafe ?—I think it would be quite safe to entrust magistrates to deal with cases which they considered plain and punishable with the ordinary limit of summary jurisdiction, without a right on the part of the accused to be tried by a jury, namely, three months imprisonment with hard labour, but I do not think that the duty ought to be imposed upon magistrates of summarily dealing with any class of bankruptcy offence without giving the magistrate at the same time a right to send the case for trial if he thought it complicated and difficult. However plain bankruptcy cases may seem when they are started they have a way of developing into very complicated enquiries indeed, and in such cases I do not think the duty ought to be cast upon the magistrate of dealing with them summarily.

4581. There is only one other question on which I wanted to see whether you could help us at all. Do you think that any of the bankruptcy offences might be extended, such as, for instance, that failure to keep proper books of account where it is plainly attributable to a fraudulent intention might be introduced among what one might call bankruptcy offences in the Bebtors Act, or do you think that there are enough in Section 11 ?—I think it would be very difficult to define the line at which failure to keep proper books of account should become a criminal offence. I cannot myself think of any definition which would in my opinion justify the mere non-keeping of books of account being treated as a crime.

4582. (Mr. Smith.) I understand you to say that you concur in the suggestion that the Public Prosecutor should have a general discretion not to carry out a prosecution if he thinks the evidence is insufficient to support it ?—I do.

4583. Would you give him power to act upon his own judgment as to what he might think to be the importance of the case so as not to carry it out if he thought it was too trifling a case ?—That is a question of policy, upon which I do not feel qualified to express an opinion.

4584. (Mr. Addison.) Have you at all considered whether punitive powers in some cases might be given to bankruptcy registrars or county court judges ?—I have the same objection to such powers as I would have to the ordering of a prosecution to go on without giving leave to anyone to stop it. I cannot help thinking that the Court of Bankruptcy must in such cases be in the position of both prosecutor and judge, and that is a position in which no man or body of men ought to be placed.

4585. (Mr. Addison.) That answers the question.

4586. (Witness.) There is one thing I should like to say as the result of my experience in prosecuting in bankruptcy cases. I understand that there are complaints that, first of all, prosecutions are too few. The responsibility for that, must, I think rest with the Court of Bankruptcy itself which at present has the power to order as many prosecutions as it thinks right. Then I understand this also : that in such prosecutions as are started it is thought that the convictions are too few. I think that in bankruptcy, as in all cases in which convictions are considered to be too few, that defect must arise from one or both of two causes—either that the tribunal which has to try the cases has a leaning towards the persons accused which prevents them from convicting those persons of the charges of the class that are being dealt with, or that the difficulty of obtaining the necessary evidence is in many cases insurmountable. I think both those causes operate in bankruptcy. I find that juries are most reluctant to convict men of their own class who appear to have borne good characters. Juries are called upon to deal with such cases among a number of other cases dealing with the ordinary criminal classes, and, further, those composing juries are all, or nearly all of them, liable to become bankrupts. They always are able to put themselves in the position of the man in the dock in a bankruptcy case when they cannot at all put themselves in the position of the man in the dock in an ordinary criminal case and they are apt to say to themselves : "Some day I may be a bankrupt through no fault of my own. A creditor who feels vindictive may be able to get up a prima facie case against me on something like the evidence that is now being given," and they are therefore looking for a way out of conviction against the man who is standing before them and in whose place they may one day stand. A tribunal which is looking for a way out of conviction can generally find it. I think that attitude of mind on the part not only of juries but to a less extent of judges accounts for a great many of the acquittals in bankruptcy cases. I think also that the prosecutors in bankruptcy cases ought not to be called upon to prove as much as they have to prove under the 11th Section of the Debtors Act. Every state of mind and of knowledge which has to be proved against an accused person in bankruptcy has to be proved by the prosecution. I am aware that some of the sections have been so framed that it has been held that the onus of proving the want of guilty knowledge or intent is thrown upon the accused, but as they stand in practice, it is not so. The prosecution have to prove up to the hilt a guilty knowledge or a guilty intent in every case. I think myself that many guilty persons escape by reason of the failure of the prosecution to prove the state of mind of the accused person which can only be properly known to himself. Many recent Acts of Parliament have thrown the burden of proving the state of mind with which an act is done which act will probably end in somebody being defrauded, upon the person who does the act, and I myself think that if the bankruptcy law were amended in that sense—and I see no hardship in its being so amended with regard to accused persons, who can now give evidence—that many more convictions would follow, and that the long preliminary stages which are used not only by juries and defending counsel but by judges for biasing the mind of juries against the prosecutions in bankruptcy and in favour of the accused might be safely removed. For example, the destruction of books is a very common thing in my experience in bankruptcy cases, but it is very seldom indeed that there is any prosecution for it, because you have to prove affirmatively that the defendant has made away with or destroyed his books. You can very rarely do it. You can prove that the books were in use and in his office up to the very day of his bankruptcy, and that from that day they have disappeared, but juries will not upon that mere suggestion of destruction of books find that they have in fact been destroyed by the debtor. I think that in such cases where you do prove that the books were in his possession up to within a reasonable period before his bankruptcy, and were not found in his possession at or immediately after his bankruptcy, the onus should be thrown upon the defendant of showing what had become of them. And many of the sub-sections of Section 11 might be similarly dealt with to the great benefit of the administration, in my opinion, of the criminal sections of the bankruptcy law.

4588. (Mr. Smith.) Then that would not be the same as the present proviso "unless the jury is satisfied that they did it with intent to defraud" ?—I think that proviso is useless because it imports into the preceding part of the sub-sections an intent to defraud as necessary to the offence itself.

4589. And the courts have insisted on the other side doing it ?—It is not the courts, it is the juries.

4590. Do you think it would be possible to draft a clause which would alter that state of things ?—I do; indeed, I think it would be comparatively simple, with the aid of such precedents as the Merchandise Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Acts.

4591. There is a great tendency sometimes at quarter sessions to take very lenient views ?—I do not see why cases under the bankruptcy penal clauses were made triable at quarter sessions. I do not myself think that is a very good tribunal for trying them.

4592-3. (Mr. Smith.) I agree.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.

JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. SPENCER PHILLIPS, called; and Examined.

Mr. Spencer Phillips.
30 Jan. 1907.

4594. Just to get it on the notes I may ask you, you are President of the Institute of Bankers, and Chairman of Lloyd's Bank ?—Yes.

4595. And I presume have had a very large experience in all the commerce connected with banks ?—Yes.

4596. I do not know if it would be convenient for you if I were just to take one very special question that we have been asked to report upon, and that is the question of the registration of assignments of debts and other commercial instruments ?—Yes.

4597. May I ask if you could kindly state to us your views as to whether it would be desirable that assignments of debts should be registered, or whether you think that it is better to leave things as they are, in short, would you tell the Committee what your views on the question are ?—My opinion is that all general assignments of present and future debts should be registered. The effect I think of such a registration would be practically to compel the debtor to pull up before pawning his book debts. Therefore from a creditor's point of view it would seem to be the best and fairest thing that could happen, because the creditors would all share and share alike in whatever liquid assets were left. You see under the present law individual creditors benefit at the expense of the rest. If they can succeed in terrifying the debtor into giving them an advantage they will try to do so, but I do not think that it is in the general interest that they should get that advantage.

4598. Then as regards particular debts I rather gather that you would not extend your recommendation to them ?—I think that is rather a different and a difficult question. I am not sure that it would be advisable to stop, we will say, a big contractor from assigning his retention money because that is not on the same platform as general debts. You see, as a rule, in the case of contractors all their capital is engaged upon the work they are doing, and therefore at certain periods they are obliged to get an advance in order to enable them to complete their contract. As a rule you see they would not have very much security to offer unless they could give it on the retention money of what looked like a solvent debtor to them.

4599. Have you any views upon the other branch of mercantile instruments that we were asked to report upon, that is to say, what are generally known as hiring agreements, as to whether they ought to be registered ?—It is not a thing naturally that would come under one's cognisance as a Banker, but with regard to those particular things I should think speaking broadly they should be registered. I mean men get credit through having a certain amount of furniture in their house, but if that furniture is only there under the hiring system, they are sailing under false colours.

4600. And the same applies, I suppose you would think, to machinery and things of that kind that are now so much heard of ?—I think so undoubtedly.

4601. May I ask in what you have said about general assignments of book debts, do you think that represents the opinions of the great banking houses generally ?—I should say it did, because their view is rather that all a man's cards should be on the table, and that he should not be sailing under false colours. I have no doubt as in everything else you would find a diversity of opinion amongst us, as there is a diversity of opinion upon every point under the sun I think.

4602. Is it your experience at all that you find book debts assigned, or is your experience the other way ?—As a rule I should say they were not assigned, because of course an assignment of book debts is the very last straw which indicates the position of a trader. When a man assigns his book debts he is generally in difficulties, but as you are perfectly well aware there are numerous cases where they are assigned.

4603. Dealing with one or two of the other questions, according to your experience is the law as it at present stands in reference to the punishment and prevention of misconduct by bankrupts in your opinion too lenient or too strict, or could you give us your views upon it ?—My own views are that it would be an advantage if they were made rather more stringent. I think, for instance, a bankrupt should be compelled to come before the court for his discharge within a specified time, and should not be allowed to remain in a neutral position as he is allowed to do at present, and then he should either be discharged or punished by further suspension. It would be well I think that that should be notified in the gazette. I would go a little further. I think that an official list of undischarged bankrupts should be published in the gazette once or twice a year. It should have a wholesome effect in preventing them trading. There is another view that rather bears upon your question. I think that any neglect to keep proper books and failure to furnish a complete account of receipt and payments within twelve months of bankruptcy should be punished in the same way by fine or imprisonment.

4604. You would extend the present law with regard to that ?—Yes. If I am correct I believe under the present law a bankrupt may not incur, and that it is an offence if he does incur, a debt for more than £20. I think I should even lower that down to £5, and I certainly should not allow a bankrupt to trade under an assumed name.

4605. One very distinguished gentleman who came and gave evidence said he would make it an offence for an undischarged bankrupt to trade under an assumed name ?—Yes, I think it should be undoubtedly made an offence. I agree with that.

4606. I do not know whether you are a magistrate ?—I am a magistrate, but I never act. I have no time. I have only sat on the bench once in my life.

4607. I was only going to ask you with reference to your saying that the non-keeping of proper books should be made punishable by fine or imprisonment—would you give jurisdiction to the justices or to the Bankruptcy Judge ? That is rather a lawyer's question ?—Primâ facie I think the Bankruptcy Judge should have that jurisdiction.

Mr. Spencer Phillips.

4608. Have you in your experience come across cases of difficulty through an undischarged bankrupt acquiring land on which banks have been asked to make advances and then trouble arising?—I cannot recall any particular case within my recollection.

4609. That was apropos of a question that has been referred to us whether, where people have engaged in transactions relating to land, mortgages and so forth, with an undischarged bankrupt, the present law, which allows the trustee in bankruptcy of the undischarged bankrupt to swoop up all the land which he may have acquired, and thus prejudice the people who have advanced money on the security of it, should be altered so as to give them protection?—You see if they were compelled to get their discharge, or to be suspended for a further period, and that was notified in the Gazette it would be the fault of those who had advanced the money if they did not search the Gazette. I think it might be got over in that way.

4610. Then there is the question of a married woman trading. At the present time a married woman almost has a sort of immunity?—Quite so.

4611. Would you be in favour of putting a married woman practically on the same footing as a man?—Undoubtedly she ought to be, I think under the ordinary Bankruptcy Law. Creditors have often been defrauded by the immunity which a woman at present possesses.

4612. (Mr. Addison.) You mean a married woman who trades, I suppose?

4613. (Witness.) Yes, who trades.

4614. (Chairman.) Then as regards deeds of arrangement outside bankruptcy would you be in favour of placing the trustees under those deeds under any special control such as to have their accounts audited, and to give security?—Yes, I think I should, I should put them under the Board of Trade as in bankruptcy, and they ought to give security. I have known one or two cases where mischief has happened.

4616. (Mr. Chamberlin.) In connection with your remarks about the registration of hiring agreements, of course with your knowledge of affairs you would be aware that that would be very inconvenient to a certain class of people, for instance the buyer of a motor-car on deferred payments, or various other chattels that are bought at the present time by means of deferred payments. If a thing like that has to be registered—if the purchase of a motor-car in that way had to be registered, it would not be very palatable to a large number of people?—That is perfectly true, but I think if a man buys a £1,000 or £1,500 motor-car he ought to pay for it. You know, I think, perfectly well that in these days many people buy a £1,000 or £1,500 motor-car without being able to afford it. I heard of a man on the Stock Exchange the other day who bought three motor-cars of about £1,500 each, and in two months after that he was either a bankrupt, or had to make an arrangement with his creditors.

4617. Yes, but the tendency of the present advertising age is to induce people to buy things upon deferred payments?—True.

4618. I have no doubt that you would qualify your evidence upon that point. There would be a certain section of the public who would be very much inconvenienced by registration?—Then probably the debtor—I mean the man who came to get an advance on his book debts—had been overtrading, otherwise it would not have been necessary for him to assign his book debts.

4619. I was talking more about hiring agreements. If I used the word "book debts," I did so inadvertently. But as regards the matter of the assignment for book debts, as a banker of course you are very often brought into contact with contractors in a large way of business—builders, ship-builders, and people of that class, and it might act very disadvantageously if what were called book debts were registered in those cases?—I think I said that as far as a particular book debt goes there is a good deal to be said why it should not be registered, but I think a general assignment of book debts should be. A particular book debt or a particular retention in the case that you mentioned I think should not come under what I would call a general assignment.

4620. We have had a good deal of evidence before us during these last six months, and various prominent commercial men have urged that some of these acts which are thought detrimental to commercial morality should be punishable by imprisonment. Are you in favour of going as far as that?—I think you know, speaking from the moral point of view, that it is much more disgraceful for a man in a good position, and of good education, to go and obtain money, or goods, under false pretences than it is for an unfortunate individual who is starving to take a loaf of bread. In that point of view they should be put on the same platform, providing of course that it is not the result of misfortune overtaking a man. I think you know, at present the law is too lenient towards a man who incurs debts knowing perfectly well that he cannot discharge them.

4621. Perhaps you are aware that it is found very difficult to get convictions against bankrupts, and that generally juries are very sympathetic?—Yes, I expect they are.

4622. Would you kindly tell us whether there is any real punishment in the suspension of discharge in your view?—The only punishment, I conclude, is that the bankrupts cannot trade again.

4623. There are a very large number of men who do not come for their discharge?—You mean bankrupts who are not traders.

4624. Men who have come to grief somehow or other We are told on the one hand that it is a punishment not to be able to trade as a discharged bankrupt, but on the other hand we are told that there is a certain section of the public who do not care whether they are discharged or whether they are not?—I do not think that any one naturally would trust an undischarged bankrupt.

4625. But as a banker you would say possibly that it is not at all events a good thing to have a large army of undischarged bankrupts such as is now the case?—No, my idea is that after a certain time a man ought to be either whitewashed or punished in some way.

4626. Have you any views at all upon the subject of the advantage of a deed of private arrangement over a bankruptcy?—Only that it is supposed that the private arrangement is a cheaper mode of winding up an estate than bankruptcy.

4627. That is rather a debateable point, I believe, but in the City of London, for instance, the large city warehousemen and so on appear to be in favour of deeds of arrangement as compared with winding up under bankruptcy?—I think that is probably accounted for by their kindness towards the debtor. They do not want to be hard upon him, and there is a sort of stigma attached to bankruptcy which does not certainly attach so strongly to deeds of arrangement.

4628. Might I ask you one question in connection with an estate being wound up under a deed of arrangement? We have had evidence as to the hardship which exists where one creditor stands out as against the rest of the creditors. An estate is thrown into bankruptcy because of that opposition?—Yes, that was a point that occurred to me. You see, an awkward creditor very often gets paid in full in order that the estate may not be thrown into bankruptcy, but on the other hand it may be within the creditor's knowledge that he has been fraudulently treated by the debtor, and it would be hard on him to have to submit to a majority of creditors many of whom might be creditors for very small amounts. I think there are two sides to that question.

4629. Would you suggest that any pro rata arrangement should be made as to minority and majority ?—Yes, I think a pro rata arrangement very unfair upon a large creditor if he should be overridden by a lot of small ones.

4630. (Mr. Richardson.) I take it that you are absolutely in favour of hiring agreements being registered in respect of furniture and so on ?—I think they should be.

4631. May I take it that your reason is that those hiring agreements can only be used by traders who are selling goods that are not perishable to the detriment of traders who are selling perishable goods ?—That is a factor, undoubtedly.

4632. And that one section of the trading community thereby gets an undue advantage over another section ?—That is so naturally.

4633. Mr Chamberlin asked you a question about book-keeping and imprisonment. Are you of opinion that where men have kept books who are able to keep books and have ceased to keep books for the purpose of mystifying the trustees in bankruptcy and preventing them tracing their transactions, they should be imprisoned? —Yes, I think they should.

4634. For a limited time—say for only fourteen days ? —Yes.

4635. Where a man is fraudulent and has fraudulently ceased to keep books for the purpose of mystifying the trustees in bankruptcy and preventing their tracing his transactions during the previous nine, twelve, or fifteen months, you are in favour of a term of imprisonment for such an offence ?—I think it should be made a misdemeanour.

4636. Then you said you would not allow bankrupts to trade under an assumed name. Now, that is a very difficult question to get over, and I would ask you, can you suggest a method by which they could be prevented ?

4637. (Chairman.) Perhaps I might, as you were not here last Wednsday, Mr. Richardson, ask you to permit me to supplement a question I put to Mr. Spencer Phillips with reference to a suggestion which was made by Mr. Hansell that Section 31—which enacts that a bankrupt may not obtain credit over £20—should be enlarged so as to make it a punishable offence if an undischarged bankrupt traded in an assumed name ?—Yes.

4638. (Mr. Richardson.) Quite so, but how would you prevent him trading in an assumed name. That is what I want to know. My name is Richardson ; I fail and I commence again in the name of May, which is one of my Christian names and a family name. How are you to know that there is not a person of the name of May behind me when I am trading in the name of May—how can you find that out ? That is the difficulty I see, and I am anxious to discover some method by which you can prevent an undischarged bankrupt trading in any other name than his own ?—If you make it a punishable offence I think the fact of the penalty would probably act as a deterrent.

4639. I think it would be difficult to prove ?—In six cases out of seven it would stop them, if not in nine cases out of ten.

4640. It might act as a deterrent if there was a provision in the Act ; but it would be difficult to enforce, I am afraid. Then with regard to private arrangements, you are in favour of the majority ruling the minority. I presume you mean by that in value and in number and a fair majority ?—I think it ought to be a very considerable majority—the amount, not the number.

4641. Do not you think that the number should also have something to do with it b cause occasionally two large creditors might swamp a larger number of smaller ones. If you have number and value then you have two safeguards given ?—Yes, you might combine the two.

4642. As you know now three months is permitted for a dissenting creditor to have the option of enforcing bankruptcy. Do you think the period should be reduced to one month ; do not you think a month is a sufficient time for the creditor to say whether he will enforce bankruptcy or accept a composition ?—I think, perhaps, there may be reasons why a month would be too short ; a couple of months might do.

4643. Three months is too long ?—I think a couple of months would be sufficient.

Mr. Spencer Phillips.

30 Jan. 1907.

4644. (Mr. Peat.) I think in reply to the Chairman you stated that the assignment of book debts to be registered is to be a general assignment of book debts present and future ; did I understand you to say so ?——Yes. I said present and future, but I think a general assignment of book debts whether present or future should be registered.

4645. That is an assignment of all that the debtor possesses in the way of book debts ?—Yes.

4646. Of course they come in in a month's time as a rule ?—Quite so.

4647. The assignment would not be of great value, unless it included future book debts ?—No.

4648. I rather grasped that your meaning was that where a man assigned his debts and his future debts, giving a continuing security to somebody, that the continuing security should be registered ?—I think that any general assignment should be registered whether it is present or future.

4649. Just so. I take that answer. Suppose a trader, say, a ship-builder, assigns to his bankers the debts due on half-a-dozen ships. As you are aware, a ship-builder contracts for a £40,000 ship ?—Yes.

4650. And he receives certain instalments and those instalments become book debts. Now assume that he had half-a-dozen vessels on his stocks, and assigned the instalments from each of the half dozen, and that those were his only book debts except a shilling or two, or a pound or two, or a thousand or two dependent on the extent of the man's business, would you then say that such an assignment should be registered ?—In the case you put I should say it would not be necessary because you say he had no other debts.

4651. That would be an assignment of the whole of his book debts ?—Yes.

4652. You do not think that such an assignment ought to be registered ?—That is a peculiar and, I should think, a rather uncommon instance, is it not ?

4653. It is not uncommon because, as you mentioned, a contractor is on the same lines ?—Yes.

4654. An engineer is on the same lines ?—Yes.

4655. There are many of what we call heavy trades on the same lines ?—Yes.

4656. And if you made a general rule that all such assignments were registered it would very considerably cripple them, the bank customs of the world being as they are ?—Yes. I can see your point.

4657. I understand your reply to the Chairman to mean that if there was a present and future assignment of book debts that clearly ought to be registered ?—Yes.

4658. But I accept your answer as you have given it. Then on the subject of hire agreements I think that probably your remark that those ought to be registered is made subject to some limitations as for instance, I daresay both you and I have gas fires and meters in our houses. You may not, you may have an electric meter ? —Yes, I have a gas meter.

4659. That would not require to be registered ?—No.

4660. Therefore there is some limitation ?—Yes.

4661. Then we will assume, as I know and you know, a railway company here and there hire their locomotives and wagons. Would you think that such a hiring agreement ought to be registered? They hire their wagon sheets too.

4662. A railway company hires its wagons and locomotives. I will give you one or two other cases. A colliery owner leases a pit and the machinery ; an owner of a manufactory leases the machinery and the power ; a wagon company leases hundreds and thousands of wagons ; in fact these heavy branches of trade as distinguished from furniture and pianos and encyclopædias and so on. I wish to know whether in that suggestion of hire agreements you had them in your mind ?—Oh no. I did not mean ones of that sort, not those large ones. I meant rather the smaller man who was getting credit because the furniture in his house was supposed to be his own.

Mr. Spencer Phillips.

4663. Even in regard to that a case came before me the other day of a doctor, a young doctor, who married and hired his furniture, or a portion of it, payable in three instalments. What a sad thing it would be for that man in his own district to advertise that he had hired £100 worth of furniture! Perhaps your view still remains the same that all furniture hired should be registered ?—That doctor, although it might be very hard upon him to have to register his agreement would get credit from his butcher and baker on the strength of his furniture that they would think was his own.

4664. May I not ask you whether the hire of furniture is not such an everyday and common transaction that one assumes that it is done and that people do not give credit on the strength of it ?—I am not cognisant of those things.

4665. One other subject I should be glad to ask a question upon, and that is deeds of arrangement. You suggested that under deeds of arrangement the audit should be in the hands of the Board of Trade; would it equally meet your view that it should be made compulsory in every deed of assignment that a committee of inspection should be appointed and that that committee should audit the accounts of the trustee ?—Yes, I think it would —either the one or the other.

4666. (Mr. Addison.) I think, Mr. Spencer Phillips, with regard to hire agreements you started by saying that they did not come under your personal notice ?—No, they are things that I have never individually seen anything of.

4667. I may take it that in your practice as a banker you do not necessarily give credit to a man because he is living expensively, in an expensive house ?—No, rather the other way, I think.

4668. May I hand you that paper. I do not know whether you have seen that; if you would look at the names on the other page, it is the Manchester trade ?—I know the chairman, yes. I see all the big wholesale houses.

4669. It is what is called the Manchester trade in London. On the second page I have crossed a paragraph. It is a resolution passed at a special meeting held by them recently. I wish to ask you whether you agree with that paragraph marked wth a cross ?—I take it that their reason is that an official control would be more expensive.

4670. I mean would you agree that the Manchester trade, as it is termed is, as we have been told, a highly organised trade ?—It is.

4671. And they appoint their own accountants, their committee of inspection and look very sharply after things ?—Yes.

4672. And therefore they say that that is their conclusion ?—I must candidly admit that their experience must be twenty-fold or fifty-fold more in that case, because my experience in bankruptcy is not large.

4673. (Mr. Smith.) May I ask a question; do not answer it if you do not wish to. In your experience as a banker, would you say that assignments of book debts are frequent to bankers ?—No, we do not take them.

4674. It is not usual ?—It is not usual.

4675. Would you regard it as evidence that a man was in extremis ?—Quite so.

4676. With regard to the question that Mr. Peat asked you about mortgages and ship-building debts. Of course you are aware that mortgages are very frequently taken on ships themselves and they are registered ?—Yes.

4677. Do you think that that does any serious harm to the person who mortgages them ?—No, I should say not.

4678. (Mr. Addison.) They are not advertised in the daily papers or in Stubb's Gazette.

4679. (Mr. Smith.) That is matter of public interest.

4679A. (Mr. Addison.) Pardon me, it is like the land registry.

4680. (Mr. Smith.) Then I would ask you this general question. Apart from the question of registering ships, do you think that the registration of an assignment or mortgage of book debts would do any harm to any person who was thoroughly solvent. I do not know that I can perhaps put that question to you because you have already stated that an assignment implies that the man is in extremis ?—I think that an assignment of book debts does imply that.

4681. Do I understand you to say that you would approve of the assignment of future book debts. I think Mr. Peat used the expression "present and future." Would you approve of the assignment of future book debts in any case ?—Provided they were registered.

4682. If they were registered you would ?—Yes, as long as the man is not sailing under false colours he can do what he lives. Where I think he is wrong is——

4683. In concealing the fact ?—In deceiving the world in general and getting credit which he ought not to have.

4684. With regard to the question of the debtor's discharge you would not do away with the system of suspending discharges, would you, for a period ?—You know I must candidly say that I am not very well up in bankruptcy law and I do not know what the effect of it is. It is not a thing that comes within my knowledge so that anything I said would be misleading.

4685. Do you think it would be a proper qualification of a discharge to discharge the debtor and subject him to a liability for a portion of or the balance of his unpaid debts, I mean in a case where misconduct had been proved ? There is power to do so at present, but it is very seldom exercised by the courts. They have generally suspended for a period. Could you form any opinion upon that question as to which is preferable ?—I should be in favour of making the punishment more severe.

4686. More drastic ?—More drastic, certainly.

4687. We have had a good deal of evidence tending to show that at present the suspension of discharge—— ?—Is only a brutum fulmen. I suppose it is not a deterrent.

4688. And that the bankrupt carries on business perhaps in his wife's name, and so on ?—Quite so.

4689. But in the case of large traders—importing merchants, for instance, and big firms—I suppose you would not doubt that the suspension of a discharge was a very serious punishment ?—In that case I should think it would be, very.

4690. And it has no doubt operated to a very large extent under the bankruptcy law in checking speculation and gambling in business ?—Quite so.

4691. With regard to deeds I think you gave an answer to Mr. Chamberlin, but I am not quite sure that you realised the meaning of it. You said that in a case where a mere fraction of creditors stood out that you would be inclined to give the majority power to bind the minority. I think I may assume that you have not had a very large experience as bank chairman under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 ?—No.

4692. The present system came into force, as you are aware, in the year 1883 ?—Yes.

4693. The system under the 1869 Act was then abolished, but you have had no experience under the 1869 Act ?—Not that I am aware of.

4694. It was alleged that under that Act very serious abuses arose by a majority of creditors carrying deeds of arrangement in face of a protesting minority ?—Yes.

4695. In this way that there was no machinery for testing who were and who were not creditors and very often the debtor put in his own chairman and the chairman admitted certain proofs, so that the thing was carried by a certain majority ?—Yes.

4696. If that were to become prevalent under deeds of arrangement would you sanction the making of them binding at the instance of any majority whatever ?—No ; I think that would be a matter that would have to be very carefully thought out—both the amount and the majority which would he requisite.

4697. You have not given the matter any serious consideration ?—I have given it no real thought.

4699. Assume it and take it from me that under the Bankruptcy Act, when a receiving order is made against a debtor, he has full power with the consent of his creditors to enter into any arrangement for the settlement of his affairs ?—Yes.

4700. But it is a condition prior to that arrangement being carried out that he must be examined publicly and the court must approve of the arrangement, that is to say, the court must be satisfied that it is a proper arrangement ?—Yes, that it is all "on the square," in other words.

4701. Would you consider that a proper provision in the interests of those who desire to wind up under deeds of arrangement ?—I should think if the court be satisfied that everything is in order that it ought to suffice. Mr. Spencer Phillips. 30 Jan. 1907.

4702. Would you approve of a system which withdrew from the examination of the court a case which might or might not require investigation ?—No, I think the investigation of the court is a very wholesome thing.

4703-5. You would require that in all cases ?—I think it ought to take place.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, February 6th, 1907.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
JOHN BARKER, Esq., M.P.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. THOMAS JAMES PHILIPS, called; and Examined.

4706. I think you are a member of the firm of Dent, Allcroft & Co. ?—That is so. Mr. Thomas J. Philips. 6 Feb. 1907.

4707. And that you are very well acquainted with, I think it is called, the Manchester trade, is it not ?—The textile trade.

4708. And I think on this occasion you represent the wholesale drapers and warehousemen ?—Yes.

4709. They held their meeting on the 30th November 1906, and the Minutes of that meeting have been forwarded to us ?—Yes.

4710. I presume you were present ?—Yes, I was present. I may say that a committee was formed out of that meeting, of which I was a member, that committee having full powers, and they in a measure delegated me to attend this meeting, subject to your permission.

4711. I think, as you have seen from the communication which I took upon myself to send you, we have had a great many opinions from people in the professions, but we want very much to know what your practical experience is in these things.—Yes.

4712. And perhaps as you have had before you the Terms of Reference you could tell us what in your opinion is the defect in the law and any suggestions for its amendment in regard to the question, first, of the conduct of the bankrupt ?—I have had your memorandum and I noted that the first point was the question of the discharge of debtors. Perhaps I might begin with what I have to say with reference to the administration of the debtor's affairs in court ?

4713. Yes, if you please.—On that point, I do not think that the trade have very strong opinions, What might be the remedy in dealing with the debtor after a petition is filed and a receiver appointed is a question that the meeting did not consider, but so far as I am personally concerned, it has always struck me as being a singular thing that the debtor's affairs are put into the hands of the Bankruptcy Court, that then there is a certain delay after the receiver is appointed and then the debtor's own statement of his affairs is placed before the court without confirmation and his stock is not taken. The ordinary investigation which we have when a man fails and comes in under a deed of assignment or deed of arrangement is more thorough. The court does not take hold of it in the same way as an accountant takes hold of an estate that is administered outside the court. It occurred to me whether any procedure might be suggested by which, instead of having the debtor's own statement, which is sometimes, I think, afterwards verified and his own filing of the cash account, machinery might not be brought into existence by means of which the court could enquire into the estate and have a faithful and true account made of it verified by an independent accountant.

4714. Then as regards the fact that there are so many undischarged bankrupts, do you consider that it would be advisable to make the provisions with respect to the discharge of a debtor more stringent ?—Yes; I fully agree with the suggestions that have been made that a debtor should not apply for his discharge, but that his discharge should come up as part of the procedure of his bankruptcy and that he should be made either to take his discharge or that it should be refused at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is approaching the end, and that the creditors should be, if necessary, consulted as to whether that man had done anything which, in their opinion, should forfeit his discharge or subject him to penalties and that there should be machinery by which, if possible, the creditors should in a measure advise the court.

4715. You mean that the court should have regard to the wishes and opinions of creditors in dealing with the matter ?—Yes. I may say that our experience of undischarged debtors is not a serious matter at all. We very rarely have an undischarged debtor coming to us for further credit. I do not know what happens to the man but we have this: that his wife will apply for credit and will continue the account under the debtor's management and if everything is in order and satisfactory, we grant credit to the wife under the debtor's management, and we have many successful accounts running now of that character. But a debtor who comes to us in a feigned name, although that has happened, I think it is quite an infrequent and almost an isolated occurrence. I thought there were provisions made under the Bankrutcy Act or the penal clauses of the Bankruptcy Act, or the Debtors Act by which a man trading in a feigned name can be punished.

4716. Of course, it has been brought to our notice that the clauses as they exist are rather ineffectual to check the evil ?—Yes. I am bound to say that as far as experience in the City in our trade is concerned, the undischarged bankrupt does not go into business again in our way nor apply for fresh credit. It is quite a rare occurrence.

4717. You do not find the evil of the debtor trading as a limited company or as a one-man company, I suppose ?—Oh, yes. I think I may say we have found that.

4718. (Mr. Smith.) After bankruptcy ?—No, I do not think after bankruptcy. No, I beg your pardon. I find that it is an evil where a man on the verge of bankruptcy, or in difficulties, converts his business into a one-man company; in fact we have had cases where he has actually issued debentures, and where the debentures represented the surplus he had in his business. But then we use our discretion in such a matter, and we refuse credit; we never give credit to a company, because it is a company, without the fullest information.

4719. Would you also kindly tell us what your views are as to the administration of the bankruptcy laws themselves with regard to the punishment of misconduct by a debtor—particularly would you advise an amendment of the law in regard to the failure to keep books of account and trading with knowledge of insolvency and so forth?—Well, that was a point that caused a considerable discussion at the meeting which I have in my mind, and I take it you would like me to refer more generally to what I know of the character of the trade rather than to my own individual opinion.

4720. Quite so.—I mean to say that my position is somewhat representative to-day, and there was a division of opinion; there would, naturally, be in the minds of people who have been badly treated by a debtor a desire to go for him. That put to a meeting creates immediately the feeling, "Oh, yes, he ought to be punished, and he must be punished." But when we went into the matter a little further, especially in respect to the keeping of books, we came to the conclusion, and it was unanimously carried, that not keeping books, or proper books of account should be looked upon as an act of neglect or as incapacity, and should not be punished under such a drastic power as it was proposed to give to the registrar, of imprisonment, unless it were shown that there was a clear intention to defraud. We based our opinion chiefly upon a concurrence of testimony that was produced at the meeting in this respect, that there were hundreds of good, respectable men who had been customers of the house and different houses, for years, who had not kept proper books of accounts. You can go north, into Wales, or into many parts and you will find men who do not do that, and they cannot do that. They have not the knowledge; they are not capable of doing it. Many men say that they have their statements and their invoices. They have all their invoices "filed" as they term it, upon a file. They place on a file all the invoices that the houses send to them during the current month. Then the houses send monthly statements to them, and those men will take the statements and they will take the invoices off the file, and check the statements by the invoices, and that is all they do beyond keeping a takings account weekly or daily, and, probably, paying their cash into the bank. I have heard of men who have never taken stock and who have never kept books and who have been so old-fashioned as to argue that "When they started they commenced with a fixture that was about that height; now look at what I have got. I owe nothing or next to nothing, and I am all that to the good." There are a lot of cases like that. Supposing a man fails from causes probably not of a culpable character, and he comes before a registrar who has the power without appeal apparently—I do not know whether that is so or not, in fact—to say to the man because of the provision in the Bankruptcy Act with reference to his not having kept any proper books of account: "We condemn you to imprisonment," I think that that would be extremely unfair and much too drastic. That would have the effect of classing a man who is negligent and ignorant with a man who is a criminal, and you would give him no redress. Therefore, we came to the conclusion unanimously that the penalty of imprisonment at any rate for the non-keeping of books was too drastic, but the question as to the falsification of books or the non-keeping of books in order obviously to deceive the creditors is another matter, and where that is proved, you would have an intention to deceive and to defraud, and there I think we are perfectly satisfied that there should be some machinery brought into play by which such a man should be punished with imprisonment. Now, then, passing on to the question of trading with the knowledge of insolvency, that also would cut very deeply into the condition of trade, and although I have less repugnance to that than to the question of the non-keeping of books, yet I can tell you that at the present time there is a firm in Wood Street not unknown to my friend Mr. Barker, who have traded—and they are supposed to be honourable men occupying a good position, well-known, and respected—for fifteen years up to the present time with knowledge of insolvency, but they have been buoyed up by the fact that the wife was a cash creditor to a large amount, and that there were other friendly cash creditors who would never claim, as they never do, until the crisis comes. Then, of course, any lawyer will say that they ought to claim. So it is that they go on from year to year in the hope that every month or every year may see them in a different position. There is no immediate pressure for money because the best part of the capital is borrowed money, or family money. Under such circumstances it would be sometimes hard—very hard on the face of it—that such people should be punished by imprisonment Then with regard to gambling and speculation that was a matter which, as far as the meeting was concerned, it was considered that machinery should be introduced by which such practices should be checked and punished, and I am of that opinion also.

4722. Then with regard to the married woman, which is the next matter which I ask you to deal with, do you find by experience that the law is defective as regards the sort of protection that it gives to married women carrying on a trade?—Yes. I think we do; we are distinctly of opinion that inasmuch as under the Married Women's Property Act a married woman has the right to trade, and is protected in the ordinary way of trade, that she should take upon herself all the responsibility of trading the same as a man. I think there can hardly be two opinions about that.

4723. Do you find that the evil is one that exists?—I do not remember a single case where a married woman has failed and where it was sought to make her bankrupt. I do not remember such a case, but then you must bear in mind that the proportion of bankruptcy cases to the number of failures that we have is a very small proportion indeed.

4724. That is because you wind up under deeds?—That is so.

4725. Have you any opinion to offer us upon the question of the property acquired by an undischarged bankrupt on credit, or does not that come within your experience?—No. I have considered that, and although it was not part of the question discussed by the meeting, because we took a more general view of it than a detail of that nature, yet I have an opinion if it is worth while giving it to you.

4726. If you please?—It is said, I think, that in the case of a man who has property, for instance, a man trading as an undischarged bankrupt, and creating a fresh set of creditors, that the new creditors should have priority over the old ones. I do not know how the law may be now, I think it is, perhaps, that the receiver or trustee under the bankruptcy, can take possession of an estate for the old creditors before considering the new ones.

4727. Yes, that is so?—Well, somehow that does not seem to me just. A man, of course, ought to be punished, as I think I said in discussing the previous part, if he is trading as an undischarged bankrupt. But having done that, and his estate being at the disposal of his creditors, old and new, they should either rank side by side or else I think the new creditors should have priority. Certainly I do not think that the estate of the new creditors should be seized to satisfy the old debts.

4728. Have you found in practice any inconvenience from the possibility, say, of an undischarged bankrupt acquiring land and then borrowing money on mortgage upon it?—No, that is absolutely out of my line, and I can give you no information on that.

4729. Just to pass to the question that you have incidentally touched upon, of assignments for the benefit of creditors; I understand it to be from the opinion of the meeting, and of those whom you represent, that it is not desirable to place those under any more special control than they are under at present?—Practically you know the whole difficulty arose out of that proposition. What we now discussed have been things that were touched upon very slightly but the whole reason for the objection that we made was with reference to this very proposition that official control should extend to deeds of arrangements and assignments, and that estates should be brought in under the control of the Court. That was the point that stuck in our throats more than any other, and it is to that point that I want to address myself more particularly 4730. If you would please give us your views upon it ?—Because we are, as a trade, I always think (although it may weaken my argument a little bit, seeing that you like to deal with this matter imperially) in a unique position, in respect of our treatment of our debtors. For many years there has been a sort of unwritten law which has prevailed in this way. The debtor who is in difficulties comes to his largest creditor and the largest creditor introduces him to his accountant or particular nominee of his, and an investigation is made into the man's estate; his stock is taken and a report is made with wonderful despatch. In the case of a man in difficulties, if he comes to the Bankruptcy Court there is a certain amount of natural and perhaps unavoidable delay, but if a man is in difficulties and he comes to his largest creditor, the accountant or man in possession is there at once often on the very day, and the estate practically passes into the custody of the nominee of the largest creditor. An investigation is made, a report is very quickly brought up, and the man comes to us and is examined perhaps. He makes an offer which is accepted, or if not, we wind up the estate under an assignment. The least possible delay is occasioned, and I think the best results are obtained. I will tell you why I think so. It seems to me, and it was absolutely agreed by the meeting, that we are in a splendid position as a trade in that respect. A man comes to us when his estate is a good one. He knows how comparatively easy it is for him to come to the creditors. He may only want time and if he is allowed it he will pay 20s. in the £. It may be that he wants twelve months or so, or his estate is a very good one and he pays 15s. in the £. He gets some security and goes on again and gets fresh credit, because we never leave a man so impoverished that when he pays a composition there is not a margin left. So that I am advised to say that in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred where men have made composition arrangements with their creditors, they are in a better position after they have done that than probably they were ever in before. I have seen most extraordinary things in my time take place in respect of that. I daresay Mr. Barker remembers the time when there was a very large colonial trade—very much larger than there is now—a very large Australian and Canadian trade. I have known of big men—they were princes of commerce in those times—and many men in a large way, whose accounts with one house would perhaps amount to £10,000, £15,000, or £20,000. I have seen cases where a cable has arrived from Australia about the 20th, when bills are due. A man has cabled to say that he cannot meet his bills, and he has cabled the amount of his assets and liabilities. There has been no verification and no actual figures beyond the cabled figures. I have seen these men stand up there and propose that as this debtor was so near the margin of solvency that they should take 15s. in the £ and put him on his legs again. Wholesale houses in Australia have done that over and over again to my knowledge and in that position have been restarted. That, of course, is an extreme view to take of it. But my view now is this. We deal with all sorts of wholesale drapers and hosiers much on these lines now, except that we have a proper verification of figures—a trading account and a profit and loss account —so that if that man continues under a composition arrangement we see that his expenses and everything of that sort are perfectly in accordance with the proposal which he is making and that what he proposes he has every chance of carrying out. All that is done easily and so long as they come to us when assets are what I call plump and fat we set the man on his legs again. Where the man is dishonourable or where the accountant shows that there is something against him we do not deal with the case in the same way. We wind him up under a deed of assignment in the most expeditious way. His lawyer recommends him probably to make assignment in preference to bankruptcy. A deed of assignment is made; a committee is appointed; and we wind the man up under that assignment deed. If he is straightforward, and if it is seen that he has a chance of going on again we accept a dividend and we do not lose a channel for further business. Such a man goes on again, but immediately you bring a case of that sort under the control of the Court of Bankruptcy, undoubtedly, whether rightly or wrongly, that carries with it a stigma, so that the man avoids bankruptcy where he would not avoid coming to his creditors. When you say that you would make deeds of assignment and arrangement subject to the control of the court, I would observe that then a debtor would not come to us until the last moment—he certainly would not come at the first moment, and he probably comes only at the last moment and then his estate will be denuded and poor. Now our strong argument for opposing anything like a change in the law is in respect of this suggestion on the lines that I have indicated.

4731. (Chairman.) There are two particular matters which have been pressed upon this Committee in relation to that, which perhaps are scarcely touched upon by what you have just said. One is that it has been suggested, especially from provincial quarters, that a trustee under a deed should be made to give security ?—Yes, I do not think we would object to that.

4732. You do not think you would object ?—No I should not object, but why it touches bankruptcy at all I do not see because it is a matter for the creditors. If we say that we are content to trust a good firm of accountants without security we can do so, but if we say that we will have security from a trustee we can have it also, but how does that apply to bankruptcy control.

4733. No. I meant as applied to the question whether the law as to voluntary arrangements should be altered so as to require the trustee to give security under a deed ?—If you brought private arrangements into the court, of course I take it that you would insist upon security, but I am arguing now, with much deference, that the matter is not one for the court and ought not to be.

4734. You would not add to the law ?—I think you should still give us the liberty, where we are dealing with private estates, of saying whether we shall take security or not.

4735. Then the other suggestion that was made was that the trustee's accounts should be subject to being audited by the Board of Trade ?—No, Sir, we do not want that because that is bringing them under the control of bankruptcy and we do not want that. I will tell you a point I have not touched upon and one which at present you have not suggested and that is the difficulty there is in getting all sorts of creditors to come in under a deed of arrangement. I understand that the court is willing to offer us that the majority as in a bankruptcy should have the power of compelling the minority to come in under deeds of arrangement so long as we brought the matter before the court—is not that so ?

4736. That has been suggested to us but no one on this Committee has expressed any opinion on that subject ——Then perhaps I am a little out of order in alluding to it ?

4737. No, not at all ?—Then, if not, perhaps I may say this, that we should be paying too dearly for that privilege When I was speaking some time ago about the custom which prevails so strongly in the trade I had forgotten that point, but on that we were unanimous. The creditors feel in London and in the provinces—in cities like Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and Glasgow—that wherever the majority agrees to come in under a certain proposition which the debtor makes, the accountant has no difficulty in getting the minority to assent. We follow like sheep in that respect. Directly one, two or three, say, of the largest of the creditors are agreed upon a certain course and there has been a meeting, all the rest of the trade agree with what has been done, and if the accountant is a well known man he has no difficulty in getting 100 or 200 of the creditors to come under a deed of assignment rather than take the matter into bankruptcy.

4738. And you do not find that sometimes a creditor not in the trade but who is a creditor for money lent sometimes stands out ?—Yes, we do. The great curse during years past has been the debtor who borrows money. You know probably better than I do that it is the rule of the money lenders never to come in under any arrangement whatever. They hold out in order to get paid in full or they force the estate into bankruptcy. But I am bound to admit that although we are often threatened under those conditions, the debtor is able sometimes to find private friends who will pay off the money lender if he is very obdurate in order not to send the matter into bankruptcy. But in that case I think the money lender only gets the 5 per cent. to which he is entitled under the Act.

4739. Then practically the view of those whom you represent is that you would leave deeds of assignment very much as they are ?—Yes.

4740. There is one other matter that I do not know whether you have given attention to, that is as to whether assignments of book debts ought to be registered ?—Yes, but that was not a point considered by the meeting. I have my own opinion upon it and I think I may say that it is the opinion of a good many people similarly situated to myself. Speaking broadly a preference made out of an estate should be registered because it must be a preference made to the disadvantage of somebody and therefore every one should have a chance of knowing by means of registration what has been done. But I assume you know, Sir, that there are cases where it would somewhat tend to prevent rather than extend business, I mean in respect of book debts that are sometimes, I believe, assigned temporarily or for a short period to bankers.

4741. Quite so ?—If those were to be registered, of course they could not be assigned to bankers and the facility with which you might raise money for a short time by the deposit of a few book debts for a month or two with your bankers would be lost to you. Then as regards shipping matters, bills of lading, for instance, I think it would operate prejudicially; but, speaking generally, I think it is hard that anyone should part with a portion of his estate unless other creditors are given the means of knowing what is being done.

4742. Then there is a particular form of assignment by which a man assigns all his future book debts. I should rather think you would be in favour of adopting some system of registration for an instrument of that kind ?—Yes, we think, as you know—probably better than I do—the law in respect of the assignment of debts is a very difficult one—at any rate it is not easy, because a man has to give notice to his respective debtors within a certain time from the time that he wishes to recover, and that is a very awkward thing to do, is it not ?

4743. Yes, of course.

4744. (Mr. Barker.) Do I understand, Mr. Philips, that you are not in favour when all book debts are assigned of their being registered ?—I qualified what I said by showing the difficulty sometimes that would arise if you did it, but I spoke generally to this effect, that I thought that all preferences, that is to say, book debts assigned to somebody else, ought to be registered.

4745. But as a rule people do not get money on their book debts until they are in extremis, do they ?—No.

4746. Then do not you think they should be registered ?—I do not know that, I cannot say as to that. I think you stated that you had had the President of the Institute of Bankers here. He would have been better able to answer that question. The bankers would know whether they often give advances on book debts, but I am not in a position to know.

4747. You expressed your opinion just now with regard to people not keeping books, but I suppose you would deal more tenderly with a man and give him greater credit if he appeared before you with his balance sheets for three or four years ?—Certainly.

4748. Now, why should you shield a man who does his business in a careless manner ?—Because the penalty that you propose is too great.

4749. We have not proposed any ?—No, but I assume that you mean that a man should suffer imprisonment for not keeping books. That is in my opinion too drastic.

4750. Do you not think that a great number of failures occur through the not keeping of proper books ?—I think that a great many more failures occur among people who do keep books, but who over speculate and over stock themselves. It is a curious fact that accountants in our trade generally, I think, prosper more in flourishing times than they do in bad times. If times are very bad a man does not speculate. For instance, he does not take the next shop. He does not alter his premises and spend the creditors' money on the concern, but he lives closely and carefully. When, however, times are blooming he does those things. He takes the next shop and perhaps the next after that, and he makes alterations. Then it may be that what he has done does not pay him, and he comes to grief. Therefore any accountant will tell you that he as an accountant is more prosperous in good times than he is in bad times.

4751. Yes, but the trader in good times ought to keep an account ?—Certainly.

4753. But that is sympathy, is not it ?—Yes, but I think it is also good policy under the circumstances.

4754. You said that the system in the dry goods trade is a very good one in this respect, that the debtor comes to you, and you get a report ?—Yes.

4755. The modus operandi, I believe, is this :—You send the accountant in at once. He takes stock, and he gets you out a cash account in about a fortnight ?—He gets it out in about ten days or a fortnight from the very beginning.

4756. And you can see very well then how the estate is going to "pan" out, and you either make him a bankrupt or you accept a composition from him ?—Yes.

4757. Do not you think in small estates that the expenses in connection with the accountant are very heavy ?—Well, I am afraid they are.

4758. I think the system is a vey good one which obtains generally in the dry goods trade ?—But, Mr. Barker, the creditor pays those expenses, not the debtor.

4759. I know sometimes he does ?—We may take 10s. in the £ from a man, and we must leave him a margin, because we have to remember his debts and the expenses of investigation.

4760. Supposing a friend comes to the aid of the debtor, the friend has to pay them ?—When you say that an estate is going to pay 10s. or 15s. in the £ we reckon that the debtor has to pay so much for his debts and so much for the expenses of investigation.

4761. Do not you think it possible to have a scale ?—They do work on a scale. Many years ago that was settled by the late Mr. Samuel Morley at a meeting which was held of the heads of houses. That, I think, was forty years ago, and they say that they work on that scale now.

4762. Yes, but that does not obtain in other trades ?—No, I am afraid it does not.

4763. I am speaking generally now. I think you would agree with us in this matter, that every trader should keep a cash book ?—Yes, if possible; certainly I do agree that he should, but what I do not agree with and what we as a trade do not agree with most unanimously is that you should punish him and put him in the same category as a criminal, unless he had some fraudulent intention.

4764. Now, you spoke just now about the majority of the traders in favour of a certain scheme. You have known, I suppose, in your time of cases where a lot of small people have stood out in order to get paid in full, thereby delaying the thing altogether and causing considerable trouble, in the hope of getting the full amount of their debts ?—Yes, I think I may admit that.

4765. Do not you think it would be more satisfactory to say that two-thirds of the creditors or two-thirds of the amount of the debts should rule ?—Yes, if you do not bring us in under the court, and could give us that without the necessity of coming to the court.

4766. Yes; I do not mean that you should have to come to the court ?—Yes, but how are you going to do it ? To leave us to make voluntary arrangements means that we take all the responsibility and carry out the business ourselves. But you cannot give us power unless you have control, unless the Chairman can point out a way by which it can be done.

4767 But speaking as man to man, do not you think that it would be a very fair thing if two-thirds were in favour of it ?—Certainly, in theory.

4768. Because I have known so many cases where the small creditors have stood out, and where they have been paid, either in a surreptitious manner or otherwise ?—I am not aware of that, although I can quite imagine that something of that sort has more than once been done. I have spoken already of the wonderful unanimity that prevails among the trade where creditors do come in, but I said then, and I repeat now that that sort of thing is peculiar to our trade.

4769. With regard to the position of women, do you have many women who fail in business ?—No, not in the same proportion as men.

4770. I suppose you have known cases of women, improving the business after their husband's death, and increasing the returns of a business ?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

4771. (Mr. Richardson.) You seem to be in favour of assisting a wife in starting a business when her husband has failed. I suppose you are careful to see that the husband has not fraudulently passed over his money to his wife. That is one of the difficulties of the Bankruptcy Act, the difficulty of getting at these men who have failed, and who have kept back their money, or transferred it to another person, and then started a trade in another person's name ?—I do not think that we are particularly affected by that. Those are rare cases, and you must not take them as common. I think we have had women continuing their husbands' business after their husbands' failure, and who have carried on successfully. We certainly have had such accounts, that is true; but of course a woman coming to us to open a new account must give us proper references.

4772. That is from the reference house ?—Yes, and we go to that house and we hear what they have to say. That reference house, if it was the original reference house and did its duty, would have had from that woman a statement as to what her capital was, what her expenditure had been on the place and what her rent was, and that capital would be confirmed, but the source from whence she got it, I do not think we could go into. If it is her's, and the bank says that it is her's, or a lawyer says that he sold property and that property yielded £400 with which this woman commenced business, we should consider that sufficient to show that the woman had that money. I think Mr. Barker will agree that that is about all one can do.

4774. But that has to be proved, has not it?—Supposing a man becomes bankrupt, his wife comes in, taking his position in the business without a full explanation of the capital she has acquired. In bankruptcy she has to buy that business from the trustee, and therefore she must have money to do it with. She buys it from the trustee and therefore it becomes her property.

4775. With regard to the keeping of books, you seem to be in favour of punishing for fraudulently not keeping books with the object of mystifying the accountants ?—Yes.

4776. But you also say that you would not punish for neglect or incapacity ?—Yes.

4777. If you put in the word "incapacity" you open the door to persons who are fraudulent as an excuse for not keeping books. Do not you find it frequently the case in your business that a man who has kept books may during the last six, eight or ten months before he fails cease to keep them ?—Yes.

4778. That is with the determined purpose of preventing their transactions being traced ?—Exactly so; that is what I call fraudulent intent.

4779. But you introduced the word "neglect" ?—That is only a word of my own.

Mr. Thomas J. Philips.
6 Feb. 1907.

4781. (Chairman.) Not neglect ?—Not neglect.

4782. (Mr. Richardson.) In that case you would make him absolutely amenable to some punishment ?—Certainly.

4783. Without any doubt he should be punished ?—Without almost any doubt, although it is a large power to give to the registrar to make him both judge and jury.

4784. Mr. Barker has referred to the question of keeping accounts and I would ask you whether you do not think that every man could keep a cash account. In speaking of these small traders you said that they kept a takings account ?—Yes.

4785. If they are able to keep a takings account cannot they keep a bought and sold account ?—But you see a man keeps his daily takings and a sort of cash account through his bank. Supposing he pays everything into a bank. That is what many of them do and they do nothing more. You can extract a cash account from a bank book, I think, to some extent.

4786. (Chairman.) Certainly, it is often done.

4787. (Mr. Richardson.) There is just one further question with regard to deeds of arrangement; you know now that three months have to elapse before a deed becomes absolute. Do not you think that that is too long, and that a month would be sufficient for the creditor to say whether he will accept it or not ?—That is a good question and an excellent question. We have suffered a good deal by the fact that three months must elapse under a deed of assignment before the money can be distributed. I do think that that is too long a period. I am speaking now without consideration and very offhand.

4788. Would you be disposed to make the period only a month ?—I have not considered the question and I think I would rather put the answer off altogether. There may be points in it that I am not conversant with, but I do know this that we do suffer delay and that the accountants are only too willing to hold the money in their possession for three months, although I must give some of them the credit of saying that they will distribute it before the three months if you give them an indemnity.

4789. I take it that you personally are rather in favour of the time being curtailed ?—Yes, I am.

4790. With regard to hiring agreements are you in favour of their being registered ?—There again you touch upon a point that I am not conversant with. I know it would make a tremendous difference to some of the large furnishing-houses and to their detriment, yet I do not see why a lodging-house keeper at the seaside whose furniture does not belong to her should incur debts from shopkeepers who have no means of recovering their debts because the furniture is on the hire system. There again when I speak of the desire of registering preferential payments that comes under that category. It is a preference, though at the same time I believe it is the means of assisting hundreds of people to get a livelihood.

4791. But thirty or forty years ago there was just as much trade in proportion to the size of the country as there is now and there were no such things as hiring agreements ?—Were there not ?

4792. No, scarcely any thirty or forty years ago ?—It is not in my province to give an opinion about that, and I know nothing much about it.

4793. (Chairman.) I rather assumed as I communicated with Mr. Philips about the different subjects that that would not be a subject of discussion ?—It is not customary in our trade.

4794. (Mr. Richardson.) And you have no serious trouble through hiring agreements ?—No. I think it is done more with the lodging-house keepers and people who furnish to get a living.

Mr. Thomas J Philips.

4795. (Mr. Addison.) In regard to deeds of arrangements, I understand that you never accept a nominee of the debtor as trustee. You always insist on having your own trustee?—Oh, yes. Of course there are cases where we have had to accept the nominee of the debtor. If a man is in a difficulty, say in a distant town, he will go to a solicitor instead of going to his largest creditor. That solicitor will undoubtedly recommend him to an accountant. I had a case in Hull where I went down some time ago. The solicitor was upstairs and the accountant downstairs, and they worked very amiably together. Then the first thing they do is to take an assignment from that man more as a plea for protecting him against some suing creditor than anything else. Then it comes to us prejudiced, and his creditors are largely in London—all in London perhaps. Our point is this, you must give up that assignment. If you do not we will put it into bankruptcy and then we get that done.

4796. You substitute your own trustee?—We substitute our own trustee. There are cases, of course, every case differs from another, where we join the trustees, and it is a joint-trusteeship.

4797. Still you control the appointment?—We do.

4798. The accounts are audited always by a committee of creditors?—Yes, by what we call a committee of inspection. I may say that under an assignment we follow bankruptcy lines.

4799. And that audit is a satisfactory one to you?—It is a perfect audit, I do it myself very frequently, and the remuneration of the trustee is fixed by the committee.

4800. Only one other question. Your experience of trade is very wide. Is it a frequent thing to come across an assignment of book debts?—Oh no, quite infrequent.

4801. Very rare?—Very rare. I believe it is due to the difficulty of getting possession of your book debts when you have got an assignment.

4802. However, you find it very rare?—Very rare.

4803. (Mr. Smith.) Your trade I suppose is exceptionally well organised for dealing with these matters?—It is.

4804. You have yourself accountants who are recognised in the trade?—Well known.

4805. Can you tell me what is the usual procedure under the deed of arrangement, how is the chairman elected?—He is generally the largest of the creditors, and the form is gone through of the largest creditor being proposed and put into the chair. If he is a very inexperienced man, as sometimes happens, then some one more experienced takes it for him, but the rule is that the largest creditor takes the chair.

4806. Are proofs of debts lodged at the meeting?—No.

4807. You take it for granted?—The accountant has had a statement from the houses that he has checked from the debtor's books. Therefore he presents an account to us which is an official account in this sense

4808. Therefore the creditors are satisfied at the meeting that they have both a fair account of the debtor's position and a fair report of his conduct and of the causes leading to his bankruptcy, probably?—Yes.

4809. Of both?—Yes.

4810. They are fully informed on the subject?—Yes.

4811. So that they have nothing to gain by going to the Bankruptcy Court from that point of view?—No. And it is only when the disclosures are unsatisfactory and the debtor's explanation insufficient and unsatisfactory that we prefer bankruptcy as a punishment to the debtor.

4812. If there was any misconduct; suppose the debtor had not kept books and you thought that that had been done on purpose, or that he had traded while knowing he was insolvent, suppose any of the offences which are proved in bankruptcy were reported by the accountant, I suppose you would use your discretion upon them?—If you would allow it to remain there we could use our own discretion. I am bound to say that we do not put it into bankruptcy as often as we ought to, but that is only my own opinion, unless he has misconducted himself under the heads you have mentioned.

4813. But in gross cases I suppose you do?—In very gross cases. But it is a very difficult thing to get a meeting to say "This man has done this or that, and therefore we will not compound with him—let it go into bankruptcy." There are sure to be some who object to it on the score of their pockets.

4814. Yes. I quite understand?—They think bankruptcy means delay and expense.

4815. I suppose you have had a good deal of experience and remember the working of the 1869 Act probably?—I suppose I do.

4816. I want to ask you whether under the 1869 Act abuses arose in practice from the fact that the majority of creditors could bind a minority?—Abuses arose because of that? I do not quite see how, sir.

4817. Under the old Act creditors could enter into an arrangement even as they can now, and I suppose that was done outside the Bankruptcy Act, was it not?—Yes, I should think long before 1869.

4818. And were there no difficulties in dealing with it then?—I think not, but I would rather not give any opinion as authoritative, as I cannot remember.

4819. I suppose you have no difficulty arising out of disputed claims, have you?—No.

4820. Or with regard to the question of who is entitled to be paid?—No.

4821. But you would not apply your experience in connection with the drapery trade to other trades which are not so highly organised?—I think you are right. I think they are not so highly organised, and that it would be a mistake to apply our system as a general one, but I am told that there are kindred trades—in fact, I was asked to represent the grocery trade here. Someone came to one of the accountants, and said that they had heard that we had had this meeting, and would I undertake to represent them too, but I have not heard of it since. However, the grocery trade and many trades are very much alike, but not so highly organised as we are.

4822. But you recognise, I suppose, that there may be very great abuses where there is no organisation looking after them in allowing the majority of creditors to bind the minority?—Yes. I think there would be abuses.

4823. On the whole, your opinion is that the law at present is satisfactory and ought not to be changed either way?—Well, yes.

4824. Either by giving larger power to carry deeds of arrangement or by bringing them under the supervision of the court and the Board of Trade?—Certainly, I do not think that can be done. I do not think you can carry it. I think our opposition to you would be too immense. I think we should agitate every commercial centre in the kingdom if an amendment were proposed of such a character.

4825. You are satisfied with the law as it is?—Certainly, subject to the answers I have already given and to what I am about to say. I do not know whether I would be taking up the time of the meeting by adding something.

4826-8. (Chairman.) Certainly not.—There are one or two points I should like to place before the Committee which have come under my individual notice more particularly. It too often happens that debtors sell their estates and that the proceeds are then paid in the court, or they sell them and there are no means of getting at them. That is a little illustration that my clerk gave me, showing the difficulty that we have, and the only difficulty. None of those points that you have touched upon are of much concern to us. I am speaking only of my own firm but here is a little list in which is put down cases where people have sold their businesses and absconded and where the court does not seem to have been able to get at them. We have a case now at Fulham where a man—distinctly a blackguard and a rogue—sold his business and transferred it to Acton. There was a receiving order made against him on July 13th. He has never been found. There was no dividend and that case will pass into obscurity like many others and we shall get nothing. There are a dozen cases there on that list extending over a period of time the length of which I do not know, but here is a case that came up only a short time ago and one of the worst cases that I know of. Two young Jews, of Walthamstow, came to the trade and opened an account referred to their father and in that way got credit. I may say that as far as my firm was concerned I would not trust these two people, but I got the father to give a guarantee. The father came and he appeared a highly respectable man. It was a Jew family and he gave the guarantee. A little while afterwards we could not get paid and we heard of other houses who were suing. We sued ourselves, as no money was forthcoming and a writ was issued. The sheriff was put in and found nothing. Bankruptcy proceedings were commenced and served upon these two youths. The defence was that they were minors, and it was proved that they were under age. I congratulated myself that I had got the father's guarantee. The father was living at Clapton, in private life, so I naturally went for the father. We found that the sheriff had been in before us and that the father was an undischarged bankrupt, twice undischarged, and we could do nothing. Now can you suggest any remedy for that state of things?

Mr. Thomas J. Philips.

JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. WILLIAM HUBERT SMITH, called; and Examined.

Mr. William H. Smith.
13 Feb. 1907.

4829. (Chairman.) I think you are a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, having been admitted at its inception in 1880?—Yes.

4830. And you were in practice as a public accountant, I think, before that time?—I was.

4831. And I think you have been trustee in bankruptcies under both the Acts and under deeds of assignment, and have acted as liquidator in the liquidation of companies?—I have.

4832. I think that your practice has lasted as long as thirty years?—Yes; I have been in practice thirty years.

4833. The point on which the Committee would be glad of your assistance is as regards the assignment of book debts in which, I think, you have had a very considerable experience?—Yes; I have come across a great many cases of assignments of book debts with power of redemption.

4834. You think in your experience they are tolerably frequent?—Yes; very fairly frequent.

4835. Perhaps you would be so good as to favour the Committee with your views as to whether your experience leads you to the conclusion that it would be advisable that they should be registered and should be void unless registered?—I think in the interests of creditors that where a person mortgages his book debts by way of assignment the same should be registered, because a trader gives credit to a person, whether it be a wholesale man or a shopkeeper, on the strength of his man having some book debts, and when a man fails who has mortgaged his book debts a considerable portion of the estate has vanished. The hardship being that the creditor supplying the goods has no means at the present time of ascertaining if those debts have been mortgaged. But if there was registration of those assignments of mortgages of debts he could search the file, or the information would be given in all Trade Protection Society Gazettes which come out weekly and at least it would be put into his power to find the cases of assignment of debts.

4836. It has been suggested to us by some witnesses that this practice is not common; perhaps you could give the Committee some instances that you have come across in your experience?—Yes. I will take a somewhat recent case of a debtor who executed a deed of assignment in which I was appointed trustee. On applying to the debtors in the books for the debts owing to the estate I was then met with a notice of an assignment of the book debts. Now in this case the mortgagee was the wife of a clerk in the business. No notice was given to the debtors of this assignment of book debts until two days prior to the deed of assignment to me. The clerk in his capacity of clerk gave notice to the wife just in time.

4837. (Mr. Chamberlin.) No notice to the debtors, do you say?—Yes; no notice was given to the debtors until within two days of the deed of assignment, and the interval between the date of the mortgage and the deed of assignment was upwards of three years. In that case the mortgagee relied on her husband being able to give her timely warning so as to enable her to give proper notice to the debtors and thus make the assignment secure. Now in another case I was trustee under a will, and in January of last year I sold the whole of the stock in trade and book debts to the son, taking an assignment of his book debts as part security. Further by a separate agreement I took care that my firm should audit his accounts and that we should have the inspection of his books at any time for the reason that in the event of his going wrong we could then give notice to all the debtors for the time being. This assignment covered not only the debts at the date of the mortgage but also all future debts which should arise from time to time.

4838. (Chairman.) I suppose they would not be much good if they did not?—No; but they cover all future debts that may arise hereafter.

4839. I see that you have spoken, in the statement that you have furnished to us, of people who execute schedules for six months?—Yes. I have another case under a deed of assignment in which I was trustee, where the debtor as mortgagor made an assignment of certain book debts at that time, payable in six months. At the end of each six months a new assignment was executed of other debts then owing, and this method went on for a period of over three years; consequently there would be something like twelve deeds and expenses in order to secure the loan. This, I consider, was unnecessary.

4840. Would you go so far as to prohibit assignments of future book debts, or do you think that a registration would be sufficient?—If the deed only provided for the book debts set out in the schedule to the deed within a period of six months a number of those debts in the ordinary course would be paid unless notice were given; but my experience is that notice is not given until the insolvency is about to happen.

4841. And then the notice is given, I suppose, by the debtor?—By the mortgagee.

4842. And he finds out that the debtor is insolvent?—He hears remarks or something that leads him to come to the conclusion that it is time to put in force his security.

4843. Do you find in practice that people sometimes make an advance to a debtor at a time when he is getting into difficulties, to pay wages and so forth, and take an assignment of the book debts?—Yes, I know of many cases, but they are not quite as frequent as they used to be under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. It then used to be a very common practice for a man in business to borrow money from his bankers, giving them an assignment of his book debts, to help him along for a few weeks, with a view to ascertaining whether he could stave off the evil day.

4844. And in those cases did the bankers then give notice or did the mortgage go on for a long time?—No; in those cases it was always short, and the bankers, as mortgagees, would give notice.

4845. Do you see any practical difficulty in the way of registering these things; I mean they would have to be registered at the bills of sale office and then copies sent to the county courts. Do you see any difficulty in that?—I see no difficulty personally. I should assume that they might be registered in the Royal Courts of Justice in the same office where deeds of assignment or bills of sale are registered. I should think that that would be the best course. They would send the deed up with a copy of it, and the assignment would be registered and come back again.

4846. I understand that you would confine your recommendations to assignments of book debts by way of mortgage?—Yes. The assignment of a book debt for sale is quite another matter—there the debt is sold absolutely and notice must be given. Book debts are often sold with a business and such a transaction as that, I think, should not be registered.

4847. Would you register the schedule of book debts that have been assigned, which would give the names, consequently, of the persons who owe money, or would you only register the assignment itself?—I think it would be sufficient if the assignment were registered stating the amount of the loan which had been borrowed upon book debts.

4848. I do not know if I am right in thinking that sometimes not only does the borrower or debtor object to the deed of assignment being registered, but sometimes the lender objects, too, because it involves being put into Stubbs' Gazette and so forth?—Then, in that case, the mortgagee, as the lender, would run the risk of his security. I further think that there should be a time limit within which the deed should be registered to make it absolute.

4849. In short, you would apply very much the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts?—Yes.

4851. By small people and big people, or mostly by big people?—Mostly by small people. I have known of cases where book debts have been assigned for upwards of £5,000, but the generality of cases are small—£500, we will say.

4852. (Mr. Smith.) You said it used to be a common practice under the 1869 Act to borrow from bankers upon security of those book debts?—That would be just for a temporary use, for wages for a week or two.

4853. Do you not find it to be the same now?—No, I think not.

4854. Can you give any explanation of the causes of it?—Yes, I think the bankers are not so ready to lend money unless they have got absolute security at the present time.

4855. It is not owing to any change in the law?—No.

4856. It is due to the fact that bankers are more careful?—Yes, bankers are more careful.

4857. What is usually the class of people who lend money on book debts in that way—professional money lenders?—No, they are generally friends of the mortgagor as a rule.

4858. Then they are loans made presumably for the purpose of assisting the bankrupt?—Yes.

4859. And preserving the mortgagee from risk?—Yes, getting security for his advance.

4860. And of course it would be part of the understanding on which these people would do business that no notice should be given to the debtors?—Yes, it would be.

4861. Until an event happened?—Yes.

4862. And that, on the other hand, would imply a sort of honourable obligation to inform the mortgagee when a bankruptcy is about to occur?—Yes, you are perfectly correct.

4863. (Mr. Addison.) Do you find that the assignments are mostly for cash advances or loans?—In one case that I have had it was to secure the goodwill of the business which was being sold.

4864. To secure the purchase money?—Yes.

4865. What I meant was are they frequently for debts owing or mostly for money lent?—Mostly for present advances.

4866. Therefore the debtor's estate gets the benefit of that cash?—It does.

4867. And if the creditors of that estate get the benefit of the cash advance, and get the book debts as well, they would benefit by the transaction?—It would be another set of creditors. The present advance would go to the creditors at that time.

4868. It might, or might not, be according to the length that it ran?—Yes.

4869. But the debtor's estate would be the bigger?—Yes.

4870. You say they are mostly small transactions?—Yes.

4871. We have had evidence before us of cases in which a contractor or shipbuilder, or it may be another person engaged in a large business, finds it necessary when instalments are coming due and perhaps not paid, to get a temporary advance?—Yes.

4872. Have you had any such transactions before you?—We have no such trade in the city of Sheffield as that.

4873. Your experience, may I take it, is mostly with small traders or debtors in Sheffield and the neighbourhood?—I have taken all classes of estates in Sheffield and district, but as a rule they are small estates in which book debts have been assigned.

4874. At our last meeting we had a representative of one of the large Manchester houses, Dent, Allcroft & Co.?—Yes.

4875. I asked him a question: "Is it a frequent thing to come across assignments of book debts." His reply was: "Oh, no, quite infrequent," and in answer to another question, he said: "It is very rare," so that, you see, in the large Manchester trade they find these transactions very rare. What I rather want to get at is whether the occurrence of such a transaction is sufficiently frequent to justify or necessitate the cost of a register and a possible interference with other genuine and useful transactions?—In my experience the number of cases in which book debts have been assigned by way of mortgage in proportion to the number of estates that are either under deeds or in bankruptcy would be very small.

4876. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You speak about having to do with small amounts, but the smallest amount you mention is £500. I take it that in your experience there have been a great many smaller assignments than £500?—Yes, I have come across assignments for £100. But I intended to convey that £500 would be, say, an average.

4877. And I take it from what you say that in your district the assignment of book debts is rather prevalent than otherwise.

4878. (Mr. Addison.) I do not think that that is what he said.

4879. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I am asking the question.

4880. (Witness.) No, I should not like to say that. I should say that it would be a small percentage.

4881. Then I rather misunderstood what you said first of all. Do you find that there is an assignment of book debts to creditors when they are asked to give further credit ?—I do not quite follow that question.

4882. A shopkeeper is indebted to a wholesale firm for a certain amount, and he wants further credit. The wholesale trader asks for an assignment of book debts as a security for further credit—have you come across that case ?—No, I have come across no cases of that description. The cases I have come across are those in which friends or others have advanced cash, not traders who have taken assignments of book debts to cover themselves.

4883. (Mr. Barker.) In your opinion these assignments of book debts should be registered the same as bills of sale ?—I think it would add to the security of traders and persons selling goods on credit.

Mr. William H. Smith.

4884. So that people may know who they are trusting and what the stability of the people is whom they are trusting ?—Yes.

4885. They might as well assign their stock-in-trade as well as their book debts ?—Yes, but the stock, I presume, would have to be registered as a bill of sale.

4887. So that in your opinion a man, if he gets an advance on his book debts and assigns them, should register it as he would do a bill of sale ?—Yes.

Mr. William Walter Read, called; and Examined.

4888. I think you are a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants ?—Yes.

Mr. William W. Read.

13 Feb. 1907.

4889. And I think you have had a very considerable experience in insolvent estates ?—Yes.

4890. Could you tell us how many years' experience you have had ?—About twenty-five.

4891. Have you been trustee in many bankruptcies ?—Yes, a considerable number.

4892. And also trustee under deeds of assignment ?—Yes.

4893. I think you have had a copy of our Terms of Reference ?—Yes, I have.

4894. Are you particularly connected in matters of insolvency with particular trades—I mean we have had accountants who are mostly accustomed to the drapery trade and so on—or are you miscellaneous ?—I am miscellaneous, but I think chiefly in the drapery trade, the tailoring trade and the woollen trade.

4895. Some trades are more highly organised than others we have been told ?—Yes.

4896. I daresay you have observed that two of the particular questions that we have had a great deal of evidence upon are, first of all, as to the existing procedure for investigating a debtor's conduct, and then the infliction of punishment. Firstly, as regards investigating his conduct, would you give the Committee your views—you have been kind enough to put them in writing, but we have to have them on the shorthand notes ?—I think that in every case the conduct of the bankrupt should be investigated, and his style of trading and so on should be brought before the court.

4897. I observe that in your statement you suggest that as soon as the petition is filed the creditors should immediately have notice of a meeting. Would not that be a little premature, because one does not know what is going to be the result of the petition ?—I think considerable delay takes place between the filing of the petition and the time when the first meeting is held. I think it should be made incumbent on a debtor who files a petition that he should at the same time file a list of creditors and the creditors should be called together within a day or two.

4898. That would apply to the debtor filing his petition, but if the creditor did that you could not do that very well ?—No, but an order could be made, or it should be the rule, that within three or four days the debtor should file a list.

4899. Do you find that the provisions for the public examination as now conducted are insufficient at all, or do you think that as far as actually investigating the debtor's conduct is concerned the existing procedure is sufficient ?—No, I cannot say I do. I think that in many cases the examination is a farce. Many times the only persons in Court are the official receiver and the bankrupt, little or no interest is taken in it, and no action is taken upon the examination.

4900. That brings me to the second branch of the inquiry. The only action that is now taken is if the debtor applies for a discharge—I mean unless there is a report made on which he is to be prosecuted—that it may be that his discharge is suspended or refused. What is your view of punishing a debtor who has been guilty of misconduct ?—I am sorry to say that I do not think any punishment short of imprisonment would have much effect. It might be a very mild imprisonment, but some imprisonment I think there should be. I do not think that the withholding of a discharge is much of a punishment to a debtor.

4901. For what particular classes of offences would you suggest such a punishment as that ?—I think failure to keep books is a very important point now. A man ought to be able to show for at least twelve months, or probably two years, prior to his failure what he has done with the money that has passed through his hands.

4902. Would you limit that in some way to the class or rank that the debtor is in—I mean a small illiterate man cannot be expected to keep the books that a big man would keep ?—No, that is true, and that might mitigate the punishment.

4903. Do you find in your practice that the failure to keep proper books is a serious matter ?—Yes. I think so very, indeed. I have known instances where I am sure if a man had kept his books properly he would never have failed at all—he never knew his position, and therefore could not alter what he was doing that was wrong. It may be that he was either making too little profit or his expenses were too great.

4904. Do you find at all that people have kept books right up to within a year of their insolvency and then have given it up ?—Yes, in many instances that is so.

4905. Besides failure to keep proper books do you find that gambling and reckless speculation are common ?—Not so common I think.

4906. And would you make them punishable in the same way ?—Yes, I would.

4907. I daresay you are aware that there are a very large number of undischarged bankrupts. It has been suggested to us that it might be a useful thing if undischarged bankrupts were forced to file accounts. Have you any views upon that ?—I am afraid that would not be practicable in working, and it might become, of course, a great source of inquisition.

4908. And would you be in favour of every debtor coming up for his discharge, whether he applied for it or not, so as to be dealt with ?—I think within six or twelve months every debtor's conduct should be reviewed by the Court.

4909. You mean on the question whether he is to be discharged or not ?—Yes.

4910. I think you have some views on the question which is No. 4 of our Terms of Reference, as to the realization of estates. Your written statement refers to that. Would you tell us what your views about that are ?—Of course suggestions have been made that accountants get hold of these estates for the purpose of making as much out of them as possible and prolonging the winding up. I think that is a very unfair allegation. There may be isolated instances of it, but I do not think there are very many of them. I think, as I say, the creditors have as a rule a strong desire to keep estates out of bankruptcy, unless there is something which requires very strict investigation, and they therefore resort to deeds of assignment. No doubt realization under deeds of assignment is the simplest and shortest way of winding up an estate.

4911. But as regards estates that do go into bankruptcy, have you any suggestion that you can make as to whether realisation might be more rapid, or not than it is now ?—That is a very difficult question indeed. I cannot say that I see much chance of getting them realized more quickly. Many things tend to delay it, and while one thing is not completed, and until it is finally completed, no doubt estates do hang up until that particular matter or asset is settled and dealt with.

4912. But as I understand, you have not any particular recommendations to make ?—As to realization. No, I think not.

4913. I see that you have considered the question of claims under settlements ; that is to say, claims by a wife or by trustees of a settlement to prove ?—Yes.

4914. Would you be in favour of postponing them, as the claim of a partner is now postponed ?—Yes, I would, I think they should not rank with trade or cash creditors.

4915. Should not rank with creditors for money or money's worth ?—Yes.

4916. At present the exclusion of a wife's claim is rather limited ?—Yes, it only applies if the money is lent for the purposes of his business.

4917. As I understand, you would postpone a wife's claim altogether ?—Yes.

4918. Now, on the subject of deeds of arrangement. I see you would suggest that trustees' accounts should be audited by the Board of Trade, and that trustees should give security ?—I say that because of these statements that they are not properly controlled. I think audit by the Board of Trade would be a very simple matter as they do in bankruptcy—it is not a great matter—and it would probably be satisfactory to creditors.

4919. Do you not think that the audit by the Committee of Inspection is sufficient ?—Yes, personally I must say I think it is sufficient, but at the same time as so much has been made of the point that there is little control, I say trustees would rather their accounts be audited by the Board of Trade than allow this statement to go uncontradicted.

4920. Then I see you suggest that each trustee might give security—who would you make the security to be given to ?—I take it to the Board of Trade.

4921. As it is in bankruptcy ?—As it is in bankruptcy.

4922. Of course there is a little difficulty—supposing the security is not given in bankruptcy some other appointment has to be made. Have you at all reflected how you would deal with that in a deed of assignment ?—Nearly every deed, I think, provides for the appointment of a new trustee.

4923. You would make it operate in that way ?—Yes.

4924. Then I see you suggest that the Board of Trade should have power to enquire why a dividend has not been paid within four months ?—There again I only wish that the Board of Trade should have such powers of control as may be thought right. My point is, of course, as a trustee under a deed I do not like it to be said we are not properly controlled, we are not looked after, and we do not do what is right. Therefore I say that any control that is likely to be given I would welcome.

4925. Of course there is a certain control in the power to proceed in Chancery. I mean if a creditor is dissatisfied under a deed he can take out an originating summons ?—Yes, but that is rarely, if ever, done.

4926. It is not very frequent, no doubt. Then do you think it a matter of importance that a small minority of creditors should not have power to question a deed ?—I do think that that is important. There are so many people who stand out for the express purpose of trying to get paid in full—they may be a very small minority—one-sixth or some such minority, and they generally consist of creditors for £20 or £10 who press to get paid in full.

4927. Do you find that prevalent in London ?—Yes, I am sorry to say that it is.

4928. And what would be your idea of a remedy for that—to shorten the time within which the creditor could dispute a debt ?—That would be one way—make it two months instead of three months and if a majority of creditors—three-fourths or five-sixths in value—agree upon a deed then they should bind the others.

4929. Your view is that upon the hearing of a petition it should be in the power of the debtor to show that he has executed a deed which has been assented to in that way ?—Yes.

4930. Then lastly, upon our last question have you had much experience of assignments of book debts ?—Not very great I should say.

4931. I mean would you say that they were numerous in the trades in which you have wound up estates ?—No, I do not think they are numerous.

4932. Not numerous ?—No.

4933. By small people or big people do you find them ?—It is difficult to say.

4934. You have no special experience ?—No, I do not think from my experience they are very numerous, but I certainly think they ought to be registered if an assignment is made.

4935. (Mr. Smith.) I suppose you personally have had a large experience in the administration of deeds of arrangement ?—Yes.

4936. Have you had experience of any cases where there were disputed claims by creditors at meetings ?—Yes.

4937. How are those dealt with where there are disputed claims of creditors ?—At a meeting they are dealt with by the official receiver now.

4938. I am speaking of deeds of arrangement—private assignments. Have you had any experience of cases where there were disputed claims, where the debtor called his creditors together to make a private assignment ?—I do not remember one at the moment, not at the meeting.

4939. It is not common ?—No.

4940. I suppose as a rule the proceedings are very simple—there are no complicated questions and there has been a previous investigation ?—Yes, as a rule. As a rule the largest creditors have a meeting and they nominate some one to make an investigation and report, and that report is made at a meeting within a fortnight.

4941. That is the practice of the trade ?—Yes.

4942. But of course you must be aware that there will be a large number of bankruptcies outside of that particular trade and outside of any well organised trade where the practice would be somewhat different ?—Yes.

4943. Would you advocate that in those cases the majority should still have power to bind the minority ?—Yes, because I think that with those cases if the creditors did not pass any resolution the official receiver would act or the matter would go into bankruptcy.

4944. But supposing that the debtor wanted to escape examination in Court and persuaded his creditors to agree to a deed of assignment without any previous investigation whatever, do you think it would be right to prevent a dissenting creditor from going to the court ?—That is putting an extreme case, I think.

4945. That is the kind of case I have in view—how would you deal with such a case. Supposing a creditor says "I want this man's affairs investigated in Court." Then a large claim is brought forward, it may be by a friend of the debtor, who says "I do not want any investigation, I am quite satisfied." Would you give any number of creditors of that kind power to coerce a minority, even a small minority, if there had been no previous investigation of the debtor's affairs ?—No, but if the minority was very small I do not think it would be very hard upon it.

4946. Perhaps you have not considered that point have you ?—I have not considered such an extreme case as that.

4947. Have you had any practice under the 1869 Act ?—Yes, a little.

4948. Do you know that such cases were extremely common ?—Under liquidations you mean.

4949. Yes, I mean liquidations by arrangement under the Act where there was no previous investigation ?—No. I did not know that they were common.

4950. (Mr. Richardson.) You say in Clause 2 that it has been suggested that undischarged bankrupts should be compelled to file accounts and that that would be impracticable because it would be a continuing inquisition. Do you not think that there are a great number of bankrupts who deserve to be subjected to a continuing inquisition and who should have their subsequent transactions at least for a number of years—say four or five years—enquired into and that they should be compelled to swear by affidavit as to their income ?—I do not think that they should have to account for many years. I think you should punish a man and have done with it.

4951. How are you to punish him ?—By imprisonment.

4952. But is that sufficient as far as the creditors are concerned in some instances ?—I think if you gave a man a short term of imprisonment everyone would know it.

4953. Do you not think that the court should have the power to order the bankrupt—I am speaking of an extremely fraudulent bankrupt—to swear an affidavit for five years as to his income ?—I do not think you would ever get the man to do it and you would have to punish that.

4954. With regard to Clause 8 you say three-fourths in value of the creditors should be bound, but should not it be three-fourths in number and value because three-fourths in value may be represented by one or two creditors out of twenty ?—Yes, I think it would be better.

4955. There should be a safeguard as to number, as well as to value ?—All I desire is that the majority should be undoubted both as to number and value.

4956. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You said you thought that in every case the conduct of the debtor should be gone into. I understand that that applies only to cases of bankruptcy ?—I think, meeting the case which Mr. Smith has mentioned, if when a petition is filed or a debtor comes before the court a meeting were called within two or three days the creditors could then resolve whether it should be wound up in bankruptcy or under one of these deeds of arrangement, and in that case I think the conduct of the debtor could be brought before the court.

4957. Under a deed of assignment ?—Yes. I am inclined to think a written report upon which a creditor or a trustee could act and could bring the matter before the court should be made drawing attention to certain facts and asking for a certain arrangement.

4958. Are you quite clear in your judgment that nothing short of imprisonment will do any good in cases where punishment is necessary ?—I do not see what else you can do. I do not think that the withholding of the discharge has any effect on a debtor. I do not think they fear it at all. A debtor says, "I shall only get two or three years suspension of discharge and then in two or three years it will be all over." If the discharge is suspended they probably trade in another name or in their wife's name.

4959. You are very emphatic about the non-keeping of books ?—I am indeed.

4960. And you would punish by imprisonment people who do not keep any books ?—I do not know that I have gone quite as far as that.

4961. You have made use of the term that you would mitigate the punishment under certain conditions ?—Yes, of course as the Chairman has pointed out, as regards illiterate men it would be difficult to say that they must, but if they have businesses of any size they ought to employ people who can keep their accounts for them.

4962. But I take it that, although it does not come under your purview, personally you recognise that there are hundreds of thousands of shopkeepers throughout the country who have very little knowledge of book-keeping ?—That is true.

4963. And you would not put them on the same level as the man who would destroy his books purposely for the sake of defeating his creditors ?—No, but I think everyone should keep a cash account of the money he has received and paid, and upon that you could obtain pretty well a knowledge of the position of the man and what he has done with his money.

4964. You admit that it is rather a big order do not you ?—Yes, perhaps it is in those cases where they are illiterate, but I still think that a man could keep a cash account. I believe in France everybody has to keep books.

4965. Then as regards the word gambling what do you define by that word. You say that gambling and reckless speculation should also be punished ?—Yes, but I think I also go on to say that they should be more strictly defined.

4966. Assuming that I am largely in the sugar trade and I think that the market is going to rise and I speculate and the market goes against me and I fail—should that be punished ?—If you are in the sugar trade I think that is a different matter. I think it should be where a man gambles in something outside his business.

4967. I think I understood you to say that you would like to see assignments brought under the control of some official of the Board of Trade ?—I would, to meet the point that has been made that there is no control at the present time.

4968. Do not you think that such a step as that would cause a good deal of dissatisfaction in the country generally ?—Of course it depends on the amount of control—if it is limited to auditing accounts and the one or two points I have touched on, I do not think it would.

4969. You limit your answer to these one or two points ?—Yes.

4970. (Mr. Barker.) There are not many large failures, I suppose, compared with the number of small ones ?—No, I do not think there are.

4971. The bulk of the failures are small failures ?—Yes.

4972. What books do you consider a man should keep ?—The most important is the cash book. I generally find that a trader keeps the accounts with his customers, for instance, very well, but what he does fail in is keeping the accounts of the monies he receives and pays.

4973. When a man fails, what particulars do you consider it necessary to obtain from these books—say from his cash book ?—I think you should be able to see what trade a debtor has done, what profit he has made, what his expenses have been, and, particularly, what his own personal drawings have been.

4974. That is one of the principal things, I suppose ?—Yes.

4975. And that is where a great many failures come in ?—Undoubtedly.

4976. A man in the first, second, or third year is fairly successful and then after, he is not careful in the way he keeps his books, and he allows his expenses to increase ?—That is so.

4977. And then he cannot meet his accounts ultimately ?—Yes.

4978. In your experience the suspension of a debtor's discharge is no great deterrent ?—No, I think it is not at all.

4979. None ?—Well, very little.

4980. Should undischarged bankrupts be compelled to file accounts ?—No, I do not think that that would be practicable.

4981. What control is there over trustees in bankruptcy ?—They have to give security—they have their accounts audited every six months, and the Board of Trade ask questions on every point which occurs to them in relation to the receipts and payments.

4982. Can you suggest anything by which a more immediate realisation could be obtained ?—It is a most difficult matter unless you sacrifice the assets. Of course you could sell the whole of the stock and so on by auction or you could put up the book debts to auction, but then you would realise a very poor price.

4983. Have there been any cases coming under your immediate notice where book debts have been assigned ?—Yes, I have a case at the present moment.

4984. Is that for a large or a small amount ?—No, not a large amount, for £200.

Mr. William W. Read.
13 Feb. 1907.

4985. Would you tell the Committee how that affects the other creditors?—I am seeking to upset the assignment, and I think that probably I shall be able to.

4986. I suppose there is no doubt in your mind that where book debts are assigned, they should be registered the same as bills of sale?—I have no doubt they should; it is very important, I think, that they should be.

4987. You say that you have no doubt in your mind?—It is very important, I think, that they should be.

4988. Do you think the Board of Trade should have more control over the trustee in the way of auditing?—I think it would be a very good thing.

4989. In deeds of arrangement, is it your opinion that the majority should bind the minority?—Yes.

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Mr. OSCAR BERRY, F.C.A., called; and Examined.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.
20 Feb. 1907.

4990. I think you are a chartered accountant practising in London, Brighton and Portsmouth, and have been a member of the London Chamber of Commerce for about twenty years?—Yes; and of the Chamber's commercial law reform committee in particular.

4991. And I think you attend here to give the Committee the views of the London Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

4992. Perhaps you could just tell us what is the constitution of the body on behalf of whom you have come before us?—The London Chamber of Commerce consists of between 3,000 and 4,000 members, including the whole of the bankers, large corporations, shipowners, shipping companies, large manufactures, the large merchants and wholesale tea-dealers. We have had various chairmen: Lord Brassey, Mr. Tritton, and our present chairman is Mr. Blackwell. In addition we have various trade sections and we work in connection with about 150 chambers of commerce throughout the country, many of whom have communicated with us upon this subject and their views are generally accepted and reduced into this report. In addition to that the trade sections such as timber, cement, leather, the Tea Buyers Association, and the Provision Exchange have given us their views. Their views have been reduced into this report.

4993. Then the chamber has a commercial law reform committee?—Yes, the chamber has what we call a Standing Committee of Commercial Law Reform. That is a very large committee indeed, and they have a special standing committee in reference to bankruptcy. I have been a member of each committee, I think, for twenty odd years. Then, in reference to this particular matter in addition to our sub-committee there was added the chairman of each section such as timber, shoes, printers, and such like. In addition to that we had various people who were nominated as having a particular knowledge of bankruptcy, and so it is a very large committee. The chairman is Sir John Hollams.

4994. You have been good enough to forward to this committee the report to which you have referred and we propose to make that an annexe to your evidence so as to save the trouble of reading it?—Thank you.

4995. And you may take it that every member of the committee has had a copy and carefully studied it. As I understand the original draft of this report was prepared by the law committee of the chamber?—It was prepared by the bankruptcy sub-committee. It was then sent to the commercial law committee and then it was passed by the council, and then the council nominated a representative to come to-day.

4996. I see with reference to the first two paragraphs of our terms of reference that the report has rather grouped them together, but I think the summary rather of what you report is that certain matters should be made punishable by imprisonment?—Yes.

4997. And that in every case a bankrupt ought to come up for his discharge?—Yes; within a given time.

4998. And I observe as regards the failure to keep proper books your committee are of opinion that it should be a matter punishable by imprisonment if it is shewn a debtor has not kept a cash book, or books shewing records of purchases and sales?—Yes.

4999. And I observe that you would further recommend that a bankrupt until he has obtained his discharge should be bound to report himself to the trustee?—Yes.

5000. I apprehend that one of the matters which lead to those recommendations is the great evil of undischarged bankrupts, there being so many?—Yes.

5001. Now passing on further to No. 4, which is on page 5 of the typewritten copy of your report, I see you have a good many suggestions to make with reference to the realisation and administration of property. Does your committee or your chamber consider that there is any undue delay in the present system of realisation or that it is defective?—No, not in the realisation—in the meetings often.

5002. Do you think that they should be summoned earlier?—Yes, conditionally, that that would not debar the creditor from getting a proxy and proof in, and that the present arrangement does not hold good with regard to the proxy. The chamber think that it would be sufficient if the creditor brought a proxy and the proof to the meeting and lodged it with the chairman then. You will remember that that was so in the 1869 Act.

5003. Then I observe that you would rather restrict the powers of official receivers in relation to realising assets before the first meeting has been held?—Yes.

5004. And further, that you would make the limit of assets for a small bankruptcy, on summary case of bankruptcy, £100?—Yes; that was recommended at the Grand Committee of the House of Commons some years ago, but it was not carried.

5005. Do you find any mischief from its being now £300. Do you think that that interfered with creditors being able to get efficient administration of property?—You see some official receivers are apt to be rather elastic as to the £300.

5006. You mean that they report that the case is under £300 rather hastily ?—Yes, but it is not as bad now as it was.

5007. And then the creditors can always appoint a trustee themselves if they take steps under the Act of 1890 ?—Yes, but the majority is very difficult.

5008. Difficult to get?—Yes. In a summary case if you remember, the majority is a majority in number and three quarters in amount, and two creditors of 15s. would count one way more than £100, and this particular majority is only required three times under the Act, and we think it might well be done away with, at all events here.

5009. And that the powers to elect a trustee should be the same as in a bankruptcy for the summary limit ?—Yes.

5010. Now passing on to No. 5 of our terms of reference I see that you would provide that where an undischarged bankrupt obtains goods on credit the new creditor should practically be paid first out of the new assets ?—Certainly.

5012. One question which has been raised before us is —it is not mentioned in your report, but attention has been called to the fact—that there is a difference between transactions in land and transactions in personalty ?—Yes.

5013. Would you assimilate the law so as to protect a transaction in land against the claim of the trustee in bankruptcy in the same way as it is with chattels ?—Yes.

5014. Would your chamber, do you think, be in favour of retaining the law which protects the transaction although the person dealing with a bankrupt knows that he is a bankrupt ?—I think so—I may say yes.

5015. Then I see on No. 6 that you would agree with a great many witnesses who have been before us and be in favour of removing the immunity which married women have ?—Yes.

5016. And making a married woman who trades subject to the bankruptcy laws the same as a man ?—Yes.

5017. (Mr. Addison.) Was it intended that your Paragraph 6 should be limited to women who trade ?—No. We voted upon that—all women.

5018. (Chairman.) I observe you have made some rather complete recommendations with respect to Paragraph 7 ?—Yes.

5019. I will just ask you a little in detail as to that, if I may, because very few of our witnesses have touched that term. I see that you recommend that all antenuptial settlements should be registered ?—Yes.

5020. Is that the full opinion of your Commission ?—Yes, that was unanimous—we spent an afternoon on that, I think.

5021. I confess at first sight, unless it was confined to people in trade, it seems rather a large matter that the ordinary marriage settlement between two independent people should be registered ?—We are the London Chamber of Commerce. We only touch upon commerce. Excepting that question you put to me, that is the only time, I think, we went away from commerce, and the reason why we went away from it was that a certain section of our chamber represent the drapers and they feel the hardship.

5022. Then you recommend that settlements should be subject to the debts of the settlor existing at the date of the settlement. I suppose that means that the property settled should be liable to be taken in legal process if necessary for the satisfaction of those debts ?—Yes. We sometimes have a case where the man makes a good settlement, and then two or three months afterwards becomes a bankrupt, or something of that kind. We are quite willing for a limit to be put of one year or two or something of that kind.

5023. Then I see that you would further provide as regards a settlor who covenants to pay a sum of money at a future time that his claim in the bankruptcy should be postponed to that of the trade creditors ?—Yes.

5024. And that the court should have power to declare void and inoperative any forfeiture of a life interest where proved to be collusive or effected with the view of preventing creditors from obtaining the benefit of such interest, the onus of proving the bona fides of the forfeiture resting upon the life tenant. Cases have occurred in which debtors have deliberately created mortgages or given charges upon life interests, or done other acts operating as forfeitures with the sole object of defeating their creditors ?—Yes. Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A. 20 Feb. 1907.

5025. You have had instances of that kind ?—Yes, we actually discussed cases in the knowledge of certain members of the committee.

5027. I see, taking it in a summary form, that your recommendations rather suggest a sort of code almost which is to govern arrangements outside bankruptcy; I mean that there should be a very considerable change in the law, so that the law should regulate these things ?—No, not quite that, if you please. Look at page 11, the bottom paragraph: We have adopted there the exact wording of the wholesale drapers who held a meeting at which Mr. Samuel Hope Morley was chairman, in December, the firms represented at which, I believe, represented more than £12,000,000 of capital. We say that we do not, as far as the present private arrangement is concerned, want that altered at all; but if a majority bind a minority, and it is not then a voluntary arrangement, then we are willing for certain restrictions to be put. But nothing in our report or nothing I say to-day is in any way to show that we want voluntary arrangements interfered with at all. They have proved satisfactory, and, as a rule, we do not want the minority bound by the majority; we can get on without it.

5028. But if there was to be an alteration what you have set out here would be the line on which you would go ?—Yes, but at the same time that is in no way to interfere with the voluntary arrangement.

5029. Then on the exactly specific matters to which our attention is directed in our terms of reference you would not favour an audit of trustees accounts ?—No.

5030. Or official control over the assets in the trustee's hands ?—No.

5031. Then as regards the last matter I see that you recommend registration of assignments of book debts ?—Very strongly.

5032. Perhaps you can tell us this in your own individual experience, are they numerous ?—They are increasing. I remember the first one would be about three or four years ago in Hull and that was immediately followed by three others, and we made up our minds so far as the tea and grocery trades are concerned, with which I am rather closely connected, that we would make every man a bankrupt, and we made three so as to test it in Hull, and now we find that it is increasing all over the country and even in London, and London is generally last in a matter of this kind. I came across one yesterday.

5033. An assignment of book debts ?—Yes.

5034. And were they assignments of all the book debts ?—Yes.

5035. By way of security, or out and out ?—As a rule by way of security, and it is very often put in, and the debtor does not know it, with leases and other things; really the debtor very often does not know at the time that the book debts are included.

5036. Would you confine the registration to general assignments ?—If you will allow me, we say: "We strongly recommend that a system of registration is urgently needed in all cases of assignments of book debts" and then you see we alter it a little and say "and we are also of opinion that registration would be advantageous in the case of hiring arrangements whether entered into by traders or non-traders." We were not unanimous upon being "strongly" in favour of the latter, and therefore we modified that, because take the case of pianos or machinery being registered.

5037. Hiring agreements for machinery ?—Yes, a great deal of injustice often follows—you go into a printer's and see a large printing machine and a lot of plant and you give that man credit, but you find that the whole of that is under the hiring system.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.

20 Feb. 1907.

5038. Of course it has been suggested by witnesses here with respect to that that people may almost be taken to know that the practice of hiring has become so universal that registration ought not to be necessary ?—Take railway waggons—you can always tell them because there is a plate put on, but you cannot tell it in the case of any machinery. There is the name of makers of the Otto gas engine—Crossley's—put on, but you cannot tell, and a hardship very often falls on a trustee. I have sold machines and afterwards it has appeared that they were on the hire system, and I have had to refund the money personally.

5039. Just reverting for a moment to the book debts, would you be in favour of making the registration of an assignment of only some of the book debts compulsory ? —Yes.

5040. Because a distinction has been taken before us between assignments of all the book debts and assignments of some ?—No, that would lead to this : A man has £500 worth of book debts, and £100 of them bad. He assigns the £400 worth and keeps the £100 worth that are bad, and in that case he would not register.

5041. But the suggestion about it has been rather to protect bankers. I mean, for instance, when they make an advance on particular debts ?—That can be done by way of a bill of exchange. A banker can protect himself by getting the customer to draw upon his customer, and by then discounting the Bill.

5042. Then it has been suggested to us that it would not do to have registration of absolute assignments of book debts not by way of mortgage, because when a man sells his business he naturally sells his book debts ?—Yes, I should say that ought to be registered. That is the opinion of my Chamber and my own as well.

5043. As regards hiring agreements, would you be in favour of making all hire-purchase agreements, or hiring agreements, registerable, or would you confine them to machinery and certain classes of things?—Personally—I am afraid I am speaking personally now—I should be in favour of all plant used in business being registered, but not furniture or pianos.

5044. In fact you would confine it to things in a man's trade or business ?—Yes.

5045. You understand that the whole of what you have reported here is before us, and has been considered. I do not think I need ask you any questions on the supplemental recommendations you have been good enough to make, because they are before us, excepting with regard to one of them, and that is with reference to the fee. I see that you are in favour of some reduction of the fees. that is on page 13 of your report ?—Yes.

5046. Do you think that the fee on presentation of Petition—the £10 fee— ever operates hardly as being too much ?—No.

5047. But I see you think that the fees for attendances at meetings might be reduced ?—It is the small things, and especially on the small estates, because experience shows us now that a small man has an enormous number of creditors compared with say, five or six years ago. Where a man had formerly forty creditors he will now have 120.

5048. What would be your view, would you impose a sort of sliding scale fee for such things as meetings of creditors, or what would be your practical suggestion for a remedy ?—I think the large cases could bear more. It is the small cases where the hardship is, say those under £1,000 of assets.

5049. Then I see that you think that the stamp duty on proofs works hardly ?—Yes, it is very irritating. Firms are not accustomed to it even now, especially poor people.

5050. And then you have put before us these suggestions which you make with respect to deceased debtors estates ? —Yes.

5051. (Mr. Smith.) Does this statement represent your personal views ?—To a great extent, not altogether.

5052. Could you tell us the main points on which you disagree with it ?—I see what you mean. I do not disagree with anything here.

5053. Then you adopt it ?—Yes.

5054. Has it been discussed by the London Chamber of Commerce ?—Very, very fully.

5055. At meetings ?—Yes.

5056. And have any resolutions been passed upon the specific questions here ?—Yes, and I think every meeting has been presided over by Sir John Hollams, except one or possibly two.

5057. Those were meetings of the Committee ?—Yes.

5058. But has it been discussed in the Chamber itself ? —No, but it has in the General Purposes Committee and in the Grand Committee.

5059. Have the details of it been discussed by the Law Committee ?—Yes.

5060. And have any Resolutions been passed on the subject ?—Yes.

5061. Of what nature ?—Adopting them.

5062. Were they all unanimous ?—Yes, at the end.

5063. But there were differences of opinion I suppose ?— It was principally upon the book-keeping Some of us wanted and I was in the minority—I wanted to make the book-keeping much stricter because there are a great many foreigners in London who are obtaining credit for enormous amounts. They make absolutely no entry, especially in the fruit trade. Then they fail with liabilities of anything between £2,000 and £8,000 and assets practically nil, and they say that they cannot keep books and it is not the custom of their trade, and it is not necessary.

5064. But on other points were they unanimous ?— Yes, I think on every point except that hiring agreement.

5065. I asked the question because we have had some witnesses who are, I think, members of the London Chamber of Commerce who gave somewhat different views—Mr. Phillips, for instance ?—I have read his resolutions through very carefully. He takes the ground that they do not want any interference at all I think.

5066. Did he assent to the statement which has been put before us on behalf of the Chamber as a member of the Chamber ?—He is not a member of this particular Committee.

5067. But he is a member of the London Chamber ? —His firm is Dent, Allcroft & Co.

5068. Then this represents the views of the bankruptcy Committee ?—No, of the Bankruptcy Committee, the Commercial Law Reform Committee, and the General Purposes Committee—that is the Grand Committee.

5069. But it does not represent the views of the London Chamber of Commerce as a whole ?—Oh, yes.

5070. In what way ?—Because it represents the views of those important committees.

5071. I thought you told me that the details had not been discussed by a meeting of the chamber ?—No, but they have been discussed in full meeting including the chairman of every section.

5072. I understand that they were approved by the committee but not at any meeting of the London Chamber of Commerce itself ?—No, we did not have a general meeting, it was not thought nesessary.

5074. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Do I understand that the London Chamber of Commerce deputed you—not you, but your committee—to take up this matter and to thoroughly consider it ?—Yes.

5075. (Mr. Smith.) It is a standing committee, is it not ?—Yes, it is a standing committee, but for the purposes of this particular committee other people were added, the chairman of each section and other people such as the chairman of the Tea Buyers' Association, and the chairman of the Cement Manufacturers, and so on.

5076. With regard to the offences committed by a bankrupt, the chamber are not satisfied with the present law, I suppose ?—No.

5077. It is not sufficiently severe ?—No.

5078. They wish to make it stronger ?—Yes.

5079. And they recommend, as I understand, imprisonment for a period of not less than six months for any offence under the Act?—Not for any offence, but for a great many offences.

5080. Your proof says:—"Proof of any of the statutory offences or of any of the proposed additional offences should involve summary committal by the court for not less than six months"?—That is any of the offences mentioned.

5081. Any statutory offence?—Yes.

5082. Then I am right, am I not?—No, because you did not say statutory offences at first.

5083. By statutory offences you do not include an offence under the Bankruptcy Act?—A statutory offence I should consider any specially mentioned.

5084. I am referring to offences specially set out in the Bankruptcy Act?—Yes, now you put it in that way.

5085. Do you mean that any offence under the Bankrupty Act should be punished by six months' imprisonment?—Yes.

5086. You do?—Yes, it says so here.

5087. You recommend that?—Yes, it is the result of experience.

5088. Do you consider the not keeping of sufficient books a crime?—If it is done with intent to defraud. What page is that on, please.

5089. I am quoting the paragraph on the top of page 4, "Proof of any of the statutory offences."—I think we say here: "If it be shown that the bankrupt has omitted with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs." We thus qualify that.

5090. I am not referring to that. I am referring to your general statement on the top of page 4, the third paragraph: "Proof of any of the statutory offences"—that is any of the offences mentioned in the Bankruptcy Act—"should involve summary committal by the court for not less than six months"?—Yes.

5091. One of the offences is the not keeping of proper books?—If it is done with intent to conceal.

5092. The Bankruptcy Act does not say so?—No, but we do, our recommendation is that.

5093. I do not follow that at all?—If you look at the bottom of page 3 it says: "Such offence should be deemed proved if it be shown that the bankrupt has omitted with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs"——

5094. That is quite right, but I am challenging the statement on page 4?—Yes, well we want it "if it appears to be with intent to conceal the true state of affairs."

5095. Yes, but you do not express it so?—I think we do—I am reading from my own notes, upon which I am to give evidence.

5096. Will you explain to me the meaning of the third paragraph on page 4, which I have quoted?—Is that (d)?

5097. (Chairman.) I think you will find if you look at the bottom of page 3 that what Mr. Berry means is that he would alter No. (b), I think it is, of Section 8, because he says with regard to the existing offences, it should be deemed proved if done with intent to defraud, and then he alters the expression "statutory offence," and says "proof of any of the statutory offences."

5098. (Mr. Smith.) Then with regard to trading with knowledge of insolvency, if a man did that, would you send him to prison for six months?

5099. (Mr. Addison.) The non-keeping of books is not a statutory offence. It is a ground for withholding discharge?—Yes.

5100. (Chairman.) You mean the expression "offence," to include that?—Yes.

5101. (Mr. Smith.) I want to know what it does mean?—If a man omits to keep books with intent to deceive or defraud his creditors, we recommend that the law be altered so that he can be sent to prison for six months? At the present moment he cannot be punished unless he comes to apply for his discharge, but if he does not apply for it there is nothing further said upon the matter and therefore no punishment follows.

5102. What other statutory offences do you refer to?—Obtaining goods and so on.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.

20 Feb. 1907.

5103. You mean those that are already mentioned in the Debtor's Act should be made punishable?—Yes.

5104. Would you reduce the present penalty which is much more than six months?—We thought that six months practically was enough for anything.

5105. I want to show that this is an ill-considered statement?—I am very sorry if you consider it so. We considered it very, very carefully.

5106. Because you say, "Any of the statutory offences." Do you mean the offences under the Debtor's Act, or the offences committed by a debtor.

5107. (Chairman.) I think you will see that at the bottom of page 3 if you look.

5108. (Mr. Smith.) Then is it limited to the statement set forth on pages 2 and 3.

5109. (Chairman.) No, I think the scheme of the report is that the chamber would enlarge the facts, as we always have called them, stated in Section 8, and then that they would make those punishable by imprisonment.

5110. (Mr. Smith.) Including the present facts.

5111. (Chairman.) Including the present facts a altered by this statement.

5112. (Mr. Smith.) Quite so. Then that merely means that in addition to the facts which at present qualify a debtor's discharge they would add other facts and make them all punishable by imprisonment for six months.—Quite so.

5113. And the non-keeping of proper books would be an offence which you would punish with six months' imprisonment?—If with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs.

5115. Is it with intent to conceal?—No, you see that is a difficult question, because what is insolvency? A man has 19s. in the £.

5116. Yes, but I want to know the meaning of this paragraph?—Well, my chamber came to that conclusion and I must give the answer; yes.

5117. Very well, then I must take your answer. I understand that you recommend that meetings should be held earlier?—Yes.

5118. How would you enforce the holding of the meeting earlier—would you fix a time?—No.

5119. What then?—That is a detail, of course, the department will have to get over.

5120. Well, it is an important detail?—Yes, it is a very important detail, but we simply say that the meeting ought to be held at an earlier date.

5121. Can you suggest what time should be fixed?—I should think that the meeting ought to be held within seven days if the proxies are so arranged that they can be brought to the meeting with the proofs as it was in the 1869 Act.

5122. The Act at present says: "As soon as may be after the making of the Receiving Order the general meeting of his creditors should be held." Do you propose to do it sooner than that?—When is "may be"? Very often that will run into a fortnight or three weeks.

5123. That is the law at present?—Yes.

5124. Do you propose to hold it sooner?—Yes.

5125. Sooner than "may be"?—As I say "may be"—when is "may be"?

5126. But do you propose to alter the law?—Yes.

5127. In what respect can you hold it sooner than as "may be"?—Well, when is "may be"—"may be" with one Official Receiver might be a week, and "may be" with another might be two weeks.

5128. But how are you to alter the law?—That is a detail which you will have to arrange, it is an important detail, but you see I am not here to give the details as to that.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.

20 Feb. 1907.

5129. And you are not prepared to fix a time ?—I think within seven to fourteen days.

5130. Seven days ?—I think so.

5131. Do you think that that would be sufficient in all cases ?—No, and even that will not do unless you alter the proxy system.

5132. Well, how do you propose to do it ?—That is a detail.

5133. Do you propose to enact seven days or not ?—If the proxy system is altered, yes, so that a creditor can bring to the meeting his proxy and proof—then seven days is ample.

5134. I am afraid I do not follow you. Do you propose to hold the meeting in every case in seven days or not ?—Yes.

5135. Very well, I will take it so ?—I must qualify it if the proxy system is altered.

5136. But apart altogether from the question of proxies ?—Then I cannot say yes, because what would happen would be this, there would be no notices issued to the creditors if you said seven days.

5137. Then you do not propose seven days in all cases ?—Not unless the proxy system is altered.

5138. But if sufficient proxies are sent in you would hold the meeting in seven days in every case ?—No, only if the proxy system is altered so that the creditor can bring with him the proof and proxy.

5139. And you would hold the meeting whether there had been any investigation into the debtor's affairs or not ?—I think so.

5140. In all cases ?—If the proxy system is altered.

5141. Assuming that ?—Yes, because the meeting can be easily adjourned.

5142. You do not think it desirable that at the first meeting of creditors the Official Receiver should be in a position to make a statement with regard to the position of the estate ?—Not of necessity.

5143. And that at that meeting they should appoint a trustee ?—Yes, or adjourn.

5144. Would you consider an offer of the debtor then ?—Yes.

5145. In every case within seven days ?—Yes, if the proxy system is altered.

5146. Very well, I will take that. You say that difficulties are raised by Official Receivers to the appointment of trustees—what is referred to there ?—It is easy to explain, but one perhaps does not altogether like explaining, but this very often happens that at a meeting the Official Receiver is of necessity in the chair and has a certain amount of power, and he very often will suggest to the meeting that if no trustee is appointed he himself remains as the trustee.

5147. He often suggests that he should be appointed ?—No, he suggests that if no trustee is appointed he remains as trustee.

5148. You mean he states that if they do not appoint a trustee he will be the trustee ?—Yes.

5149. Is that the only ground for your statement ?—No. Then difficulties have been put in the way of creditors appointing their special managers.

5150. I am speaking of trustees ?—Well, of trustees.

5151. What difficulties are put by official receivers in the way of the appointment of a trustee ?—I will give you one case, and only one. A proxy was sent in to an official receiver nominating a certain gentleman as trustee and that proxy practically carried the appointment, but the heading of the proxy was somewhat informal and the official receiver returned the proxy to the country to have the heading completed, knowing full well that under no circumstances could that proxy be received back again in time to enable the person nominated to be appointed the trustee.

5152. You mean that the proxy was not complete—it was somewhat informal ?—That is, a portion of the heading was not right.

5153. It could not be admitted ?—No, but very, very few official receivers would have returned it.

5154. Was it rejected by the Official Receiver on the ground of irregularity ?—Yes, to have a portion of the heading filled in.

5155. Did the creditor object to the Official Receiver's decision ?—One moment——

5156. At any rate, that is the only case you know of ?—No, I know of a great many. What this creditor did was he wrote to the papers about it and so he did object.

5157. Can you tell me whether at any of the meetings of the London Chamber of Commerce or of the committee instances of obstruction by official receivers were stated and brought to your knowledge by creditors—you do not remember ?—No, I do not remember.

5158. Then on page 13 you refer to the fees charged by the Board of Trade. You object to the fee of 1s. for each creditor. I suppose you know that those fees go towards the cost of administering the Bankruptcy Act ?—I expect so.

5159. That with the exception of those fees, and the ad valorem fee on realisation and one or two trifling matters, there is no other source of revenue from the bankrupt's estate ?—I fancy there is interest on unclaimed dividends.

5160. Yes, but you know the fees are not charged upon the different acts of administration ; for instance, on the examination of the bankrupt, which involves a very large amount of time and trouble, there is no special fee for that charged by the Board of Trade ?—No, you are not quite right in reference to your previous remark, because there is a fee charged for the Official Receiver supervising a special manager.

5161. I am not speaking of the case of a special manager, I am taking an ordinary case. You are aware that there is no specific charge for the various acts of administration ?—No, that is so.

5162. And that the fee charged in respect of meetings of creditors of 1s. is really charged in respect of the general administration of the estate ?—That would be so.

5163. And do you consider it excessive from that point of view ?—My chamber do.

5164. The committee do ?—Yes

5165. But they have looked at it simply as the cost of calling the meetings of creditors and nothing more—not with reference to the general work done by the Official Receiver ?—No, they look upon it as a cost to the estate.

5166. But it is a cost incurred by the discharge of duties falling on the Official Receiver which is levied partly by an ad valorem fee, and partly by a fee on the number of creditors ?—Yes, and my Chamber think it too heavy.

5167. Does your committee desire that the several acts of administration should be specially charged for, and fees levied in respect of each of them ?—I think they would prefer that.

5168. On page 10 there is a statement as to the cost of administration by the Board of Trade being very expensive—upon what is that based, may I ask ?—Well, experience.

5169. Not upon figures ?—The figures give us the experience.

5170. The figures support that statement ?—Yes.

5171. Do you refer to the figures in the Board of Trade reports ?—No, we refer to the committee having in mind the different bad debts they have made and the different charges made in each particular case.

5172. On particular estates ?—Yes.

5173. They are not based upon any general figures relating to the administration of bankruptcy estates throughout the country ?—No, they are not.

5174. Have you studied yourself the Board of Trade figures as to the cost of administration by Official Receivers and otherwise ?—Not lately. I have not thought it worth while to study them very much of late.

5175. Do not you think that that would be a valuable mode of obtaining information as to the relative cost of official administration and otherwise ?—No, I think not.

5176. Why ?—I think it better to take one's own experience.

5177. Of particular estates ?—Well, I get four or five through my hands every day, and some of our tea and grocery firms will get two or three a week.

5178. And in your experience the cost of administration by Official Receivers is larger than by non-official trustees ?—Yes.

5179. That is so, is it ?—Yes.

5180. You would be quite surprised to hear then, that it is quite the reverse for the country at large according to the Board of Trade statistics ?—That may be for the country at large, but not in particular estates.

5181. And in London perhaps, but you never thought it necessary to look into the question generally ?—I do not altogether believe in those statistics.

5182. Then I take that answer that you do not believe the statistics are correct ?—I qualified it. I said I did not altogether believe in them.

5183. You do not believe that they are correct ?—No, I did not say that. I do not believe in them altogether.

5184. What do you mean by "believing" in them ?—Well, I believe to a certain extent they do not help us in arriving at a conclusion—nothing is as good as your own experience.

5185. Do you believe that they are correct ?—They must be correct, but they do not help us in arriving at any conclusions. We go by the cases that come before us day by day, and that is what my chamber look at.

5186. You think it better to form a general conclusion upon particular cases than upon a universal basis ?—Conditionally on your hearing or seeing sufficient particular cases.

5187. Particular cases ?—Well, I have about four or five a day brought to my notice.

5188. Now with regard to deeds of arrangement, you say that a meeting of creditors should be called in every case within seven days ?—Yes.

5189. (Chairman.) Mr. Berry said at the end that what his chamber would like best would be no interference at all, no change in the law at all.

5190. (Mr. Smith.) Is that so ?—Yes, we are very strong upon that point.

5191. Is that mentioned here ?—Yes, on page 11, I think, it is in the bottom paragraph.

5192. (Chairman.) Mr. Berry's chamber substantially adopt what was said at Mr. Hope Morley's meeting.

5193. (Witness.) At which more than £12,000,000 of capital was represented

5194. (Mr. Smith.) But what they deprecate is any alteration in the law which would result in the intervention of the Board of Trade in private arrangements and which would put deeds of assignment or composition under official control. They do not say that they would like no alteration in the law, but is that the meaning of it ?—That is so.

5195. What follows—the specific recommendations as to the majorities, and so on may be omitted from consideration ?—No, for this reason, we say that rather than be brought under official control we would prefer the law to remain as it is. Then we say if any alteration is to take place we make our recommendations, but those recommendations are in no way to interfere with voluntary arrangements as between debtors and creditors, or to make any alterations where a majority is not called in to bind a minority.

5196. I think I must ask a few questions notwithstanding that, because although the committee may agree that there may be no alterations we have not settled that point. If we had I should forego any further examination, but the paper contains a large number of suggestions, and I should like to put one or two questions on them.

5197. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Did you notice page 10, the last paragraph ?

5198. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, I am quoting from that. The intervention of the Board of Trade is deprecated I suppose that is the sum and substance of the whole thing ?—To a certain extent yes.

5199. That the intervention of the Board of Trade is deprecated ?—It is not the sum and substance, but it is the conclusion we have arrived at, or rather the Chamber. Yes.

5200. But that is the most important point ?—I think so.

5201. You do not object, I see, to an appeal to the Court ?—No, when the majority is to bind the minority.

5202. You do not object to an appeal to the court from decisions of the trustee under a voluntary deed ?—No.

5203. But you would not allow the court to be called in to approve of the deed itself ?—No.

5204. You would not consult it in that case ?—No.

5205. Why do you submit matters of administration by the trustee to the control of the court, and not submit the primary question whether a minority should be bound by a majority to the court also ?—First of all we do not want to go to the court at all, but if a majority is called in to bind a minority, then we have no objection to the minority being protected by the permission to go to the court, or to the court's decision being binding.

5206. But they are not protected in the case of the execution of the deed itself ?—Then they can go to the court and point that out to the court. That is only when a majority binds a minority mind you.

5207. I am speaking of that.—Yes.

5208. Supposing the law were altered so that the majority could bind the minority, would you allow that to be binding by the court, would you give to the court an opportunity to say whether it should or should not be binding ?—The registrar would check the majorities and the figures.

5209. But supposing he ascertained the majority was there, would you give the dissenting creditor the right to go to the court to upset the deed ?—Yes, to ask the court for protection on certain grounds; or to upset the deed, certainly.

5210. Would you go a step further and require the consent of the court before the dissenting creditor is bound ?—Yes, I think so, conditionally on this, that no interference takes place, when we do not apply that particular clause of the majority binding the minority.

5211. (Sir Edward Fithian.) With regard to the question of registering hiring agreements would it be sufficient in the view of the chamber, and according to your own view, if hiring agreements were registered when they exceeded £30 in amount ?—Yes.

5212. Adopting the same amount as that which now applies to a bill of sale ?—Yes, or even £50, which would be a better figure than £30, because we do not want to hamper trade, or people who just hire sewing machines, or a treadle machine, or such like, or a piano, or anything of that sort.

5213. Then with a modification like that I presume that the chamber would probably recommend the registration of hiring agreements as well as the registration of assignments of book debts ?—Yes.

5214. Have you considered the question as to whether power should be given to the Bankruptcy Court to exercise summary jurisdiction with regard to offences ?—Yes.

5215. Are you in favour of that ?—Yes, strongly.

5216. (Mr. Addison.) I see that the committee see no reason why women in regard to the bankruptcy laws should not be treated in every respect as men ?—No.

5217. May I ask is that your own view ?—Not quite.

5218. May I take it that the London Chamber of Commerce only looked at this subject from the creditor's or trader's point of view ?—Entirely.

5219. They did not study or discuss the social effect which such a change in the law would produce ?—Yes, and then we were obliged to come to the conclusion that we are a chamber of commerce and we may only look at it from the trader's or commercial man's point of view.

5220. Therefore the social effect of such a change has not been considered ?—We put it on one side.

5221. You say that all ante-nuptial settlements should be registered ?—Yes.

5222. Is it seriously suggested that every settlement, of whatever character, made on marriage should be open to the inspection of everybody ?—Well I might say that there we were divided. Personally I was against that, because I think that if a settlement is made prior to marriage the law is quite strong enough as it is at present.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.

5223. The law is that if the settlement is clearly made in fraud to the knowledge of the parties it will not stand ?—Yes.

5224. That is sufficient for my purpose. You do not assent to that ?—No, and I do not think our chairman was in favour of that. It was carried. We were unanimous on nearly every point, and the two points on which we were not, I think you have brought out.

5225. There was one point on which you a little differ from accountants and gentlemen we have called in London, and that is as to the frequency and importance of the assignment of book debts. Nearly all the gentlemen who represent London say they are very rare ; for instance, Mr. Phillips, of Dent, Allcroft and Company, said they were very rare ; other accountants have said they are very rare. May I ask in what trades you meet them ?—Principally in the tea, provision and grocery.

5226. Are they made for moneys advanced or to prefer a creditor ?—Very often to prefer a creditor, but it is done partly for money advanced and partly for an old debt.

5227. The suggestion made to us is that such transactions are inconsiderable owing to the necessity of giving notice to the debtors to prevent reputed ownership ?—In my experience notice has never been given until the very last moment.

5228. But it is frequent in the grocery trade ?—It is, in the grocery trade.

5229. In the Manchester trade we are told that it is very infrequent ?—No ; I think it is very likely not to be frequent there because it is so well known that if it did occur the Manchester trade would make that man a bankrupt without hesitation. We do it in our trade.

5230. You have had a large experience in London, you have not found in large businesses or classes of business the assignment of book debts frequent, have you ?—It is principally in the retail.

5231. By the retailer ?—Yes.

5232. And in small businesses ?—In small businesses where the book debts might be anything between £250 and £900 ; and the total liabilities would be, say, from £2,000 to £4,000.

5233. And you think the practice is increasing ?—It is increasing. I only had one brought before me yesterday where a firm told me deliberately they were going to take an assignment of book debts. I said :—"I am very glad you told me that ; it will make me a little stronger to-morrow," and I am sure it will increase.

5234. Have you considered that the registering of assignments might seriously hamper contractors, ship builders, or engineers in occasionally getting advances to meet payments they had to make ?—No ; because take the case of an engineer, he can assign a particular debt for a particular thing.

5235. That you would exclude ?—Oh, certainly, because you see he could not carry on his business otherwise ; and the same way with the banker. The banker can protect himself by telling the customer to draw upon his customer and discount the bill, so that it would not interfere with bankers, neither would it with contractors.

5236. I understand you to say that the pledging of one or two debts under circumstances such as I have mentioned should not come within it ?—No ; we do not mean a thing like that.

5237. Is it your deliberate opinion, from what you have seen, that the extent and amount of this practice is such as to necessitate registering ?—Yes.

5238. (Mr. Richardson.) You say that undischarged bankrupts should report themselves to the trustee ?—Yes.

5239. I have not had time to go through this report of yours. Do you give the reason why they should come before him ?—Yes. Take the case of that man at Barnet, called Redgrave. He came from Cheltenham to Barnet. I live in Barnet, so I happen to know he was enabled to commit enormous frauds in that way.

5240. (Chairman.) He went to Southgate before he went to Barnet.

5241. (Witness.) Take another case : there is a man in Grimsby who had a private arrangement and failed again, and we put him into bankruptcy. Then to our surprise we found that he had failed in Essex. I was appointed trustee in the new failure and Mr. Cecil Mercer rightly came and took away the whole of the assets for the old creditors who are getting 20s. in the £, not through having supplied the goods, but simply because other unfortunate people supplied this man who was trading under a different name. His name was Stephen David, and he was trading as David only, and that is one of the reasons.

5242. (Mr. Richardson.) Would you limit it to a number of years ?—Yes. If you altered the Act so that he should be compelled to apply for his discharge.

5243. And you would limit the time during which he should be compelled to report himself to the trustee during a number of years ?—Yes.

5244. Would you also be in favour of his being compelled to swear an affidavit as to his earnings ?—We say so here.

5245. With regard to the imprisonment for the non-keeping of books, I presume that all the way through you mean that this six months should be at the discretion of the court, because, in some cases, as you readily understand, it would be unfair to give six months' imprisonment to poor people unable to keep books ?—Certainly, to a certain extent, but you have very great difficulty when you prosecute a man in obtaining a conviction, no matter how bad the case may be. I have a case now of a man who owed £5,000 or £6,000 for fruit, and within three weeks it was all gone, and his only assets were £500. Over and over again we try and prosecute these men, and the reason we cannot obtain a conviction is because there are no books, and the registrar has said, "He has explained his deficiency by saying he has lost it in betting."

5246. Where books have been kept and then discontinued you would make that, I suppose, a certain imprisonment, because there are a great many cases, I suppose, in which you have found books have been kept and properly kept, and then have ceased to be kept. In such cases you would make the imprisonment certain ?—Yes, certain, conditionally that it was with intent to defraud and deceive.

5247. Would you not take it as evidence of intent to defraud if a man has kept his books well for five years and then five months before his bankruptcy he has ceased to keep them altogether ? Would you not take that as evidence of intention to defraud creditors ?—Yes, and you would be surprised to know how often that occurs.

5248. I know it does all over the country. With regard to deeds of arrangement I do not know whether you desire the present arrangements to go on without any alterations or whether you have suggestions to make in case it is thought desirable to have an amended system. I do not know whether you say that you would be in favour of reducing the time within which dissenting creditors can object to a deed of arrangement. Now it is three months, but do not you think that three months is too long, and that a month is sufficient ?—I think a month is ample.

5249. You think that a creditor should be able in a month's time to say whether he will fall in with the arrangement or throw the estate into bankuptcy ?—Yes.

5250. Then with regard to the assignment of book debts you find that assignments are increasing ?—Yes.

5251. It is a system you feel, as far as your business is concerned, that is commencing to be understood ?—Yes.

5252. By the trading community where persons want to take advantage and want to get a preference ?—Yes, it is so—it is spreading.

5253. You think that it is a system which is beginning to grow ?—Yes.

5254. In the registration of hiring agreements I understand that you are not in favour of the registration of furniture under hiring agreements ?—No, personally I am not.

5255. But is your chamber ?—My chamber is in favour of it.

5256. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I want just to be quite clear as to your evidence in connection with this assignment of special book debts. You made a remark that a banker could draw upon his customer for that special amount—is that done ?—I am afraid I did not explain it properly. Supposing a man has a customer who owes, say, £200. The banker wants an assignment of that £200, but instead of having an assignment he can tell his customer to draw upon him and then discount the bill. A banker can protect himself in that way.

5257. I think the questions that you have been asked go beyond £200 ?—Well, take up to £1,000.

5258. We are trying to see whether it is possible to hit a general assignment of book debts which may be for a fraudulent purpose without putting a hindrance in the way of a large manufacturer properly getting an advance against a specific book debt in furtherance of his business and I understand you to say that a banker can draw a bill ?—No, the banker can tell his customer to draw upon his customer, and then discount the bill—that is what I meant, but the chamber is very strongly of opinion that the general assignment of book debts should be registered.

5259. What we, as a Committee, are trying to elucidate, and what we want our witnesses to see, is that in trying to help one class of the community we must not damage another, because you must know that in the very large way of business that there are millions of pounds a year dealt with in this way ?—But that would not be a general assignment of book debts—that would be an assignment of one or two or a dozen book debts, out of, say, 500, but what we object to is a general assignment. And again that would be for value. The banker would make advances against that at the time. That we should not object to, but it is the general assignment of book debts for an old debt and a little extra money at the time which we do object to strongly.

5260. There is just one question I should like to ask you as regards your statement on page 13, where you say, "The chamber are of opinion that all Official Receivers should be paid by salary" ?—Yes.

5261. And that the Official Receiver should devote the whole of his time to his office ?—Yes.

5262. Is that the general opinion of your chamber ?—Yes.

5263. May I ask whether your chamber considers that the Official Receivers are not doing as much as they might do, and are not carrying on their duties to the satisfaction of the public generally ?—The Chamber consider that the Official Receiver should not be a partner in a firm of solicitors, accountants, or auctioneers—they are very strong upon that point.

5264. And they go further and they say, I suppose, that they would bring up the remuneration of Official Receivers in the provinces, without it being a further drain on Imperial resources, by making the district larger ?—Yes, you will see in the Act prior to 1869 there were seven centres, I think it was, outside London and the whole of the work was done from seven centres excluding London.

5265. (Chairman.) But there were no Official Receivers then ?—No, it was really before my time. I am not sure that I was born then, but I was looking it up the other day.

5266. (Mr. Barker.) The meeting that Mr. Hope Morley presided over in the City had nothing whatever to do with the chamber of commerce ?—No.

5267. I think you told one of the Committee that Mr. Phillips was not a member of the chamber of commerce ?—No, I must just qualify that answer. Mr. Phillips personally is not a member, but his firm are members.

5268. They have a private association, have not they ?—Yes.

5269. Would the keeping of books prevent a number of failures in your opinion ?—I must answer that in another way. It is much easier for an estate to be realised and for a deficiency to be traced where books are kept.

Mr. Oscar Berry, F.C.A.

20 Feb. 1907.

5270. Yes, but do not you think that in many cases, or do you think in many cases that where a trader keeps a set of books he would know his position far better than those who keep no books ?—Yes, certainly.

5271. And that would prevent him from getting deeper into debt ?—Certainly.

5272. And in your opinion the failure to keep books should be punished ?—Yes, certainly if it is done with intent to deceive or hide assets.

5273. Should gambling or reckless expenditure be punished by imprisonment in your opinion ?—Yes, and also intemperance when it leads to failure.

5274. And you are in no doubt in your own mind at all—I think you said that the chamber of commerce are unanimous that when debts are assigned they should be registered ?—Yes.

5275. Could you suggest to the Committee any better or cheaper way of winding up an estate than at present ?—No, I do not think that that came within my province.

5276. As to deeds of arrangement are you of opinion that the majority should bind the minority ?—That is a very big question.

5277. You know I daresay from your great experience—I mean yours is a varied experience—that frequently small creditors stand out hoping to get paid in full and often are paid in full in a surreptitious manner ?—May I reply to that, that that is a supposition which is altogether incorrect so far as my experience is concerned. Do you happen to know, Mr. Smith, from your statistics how many cases a year I have ?

5278. (Mr. Smith.) No, I know there are a large number.

5279. (Witness.) We always have from 300 to 500 estates working in the office, and I assure you that it is not once in five years to my knowledge that anyone gets a preference, and they have never had one from me up to now.

5280. (Mr. Barker.) That is not the general opinion, but it is that small creditors as a rule do make the difficulty ?—No, in my opinion it is not. When a dividend is payable they come and collect the dividend and sign the deed. I very often hear it stated that the small creditors are the troublesome ones and get paid, but it is not so in practice.

5281. And in your opinion should the Board of Trade have more control over the trustee by way of audit ?—No, that is a strong opinion of the chamber.

5282. And should a trustee give security as in bankruptcy ?—Yes.

5283. And should the Board of Trade have power to enquire if no dividend is paid and why the estate is not closed ?—No.

5284. You would not give them that power ?—No.

5285. (Mr. Smith.) There is just one question I wish to supplement. I want to ask you the meaning of Paragraph 2: "The Board of Trade should institute criminal proceedings against the bankrupt if they are of opinion there is a reasonable probability of a conviction"—Does that mean that the Board of Trade should conduct the prosecution ?—I think so.

5286. And not the Public Prosecutor ?—No, the Board of Trade.

5287. Was that the deliberate opinion of the Chamber—did they discuss the question, I mean ?—Oh, yes, I think it was discussed—there is no doubt about it.

5288. They thought that the conduct of the prosecution should be transferred from the Public Prosecutor to the Board of Trade ?—Yes.

MR. ALFRED ROBERT ORTON GERY, called; and Examined.

Mr. Alfred R. O. Gery.
20 Feb., 1907.

5289. (Chairman.) I think you are a member of the firm of Gery & Brooks of 10, Old Cavendish Street, Cavendish Square, London?—I am.

5290. And the subject on which we are going to be favoured with your opinion relates to the present position of married women in relation to debts contracted by them?—Yes.

5291. And I think that you have been engaged in active practice as a solicitor in the West of London for about twenty years?—Yes, I have.

5292. And that you represent a large number of drapers, dressmakers and milliners, including such firms as Messrs. Marshall & Snelgrove, Ltd., Paquin, Ltd., D. H. Evans & Co., Ltd., Louise & Co., Ltd., and many other similar businesses?—I do.

5293. I think that your practice has brought you into contact with the question of the recovery of debts contracted by married women?—It has.

5294. I think your experience has been a very large one?—Yes.

5295. Now I daresay you have had a copy of our terms of reference, have you?—I think I have.

5296. What we are particularly asked to deal with is: "Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can, in certain circumstances, be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all or some, and what, classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husbands or not) subject to the bankruptcy laws." That, of course, raises a double question of the limited character of the judgment that can be obtained against a married woman, and the fact that her estate may be put in such a position that creditors cannot get at it, and that she can only be made bankrupt in a very limited class of cases. Perhaps you would favour the Committee with your experience upon this point, addressing yourself to the evil which exists and what you think would be the best method of remedying it?—What we find in almost every case that comes to us is the initial question who is to be sued, the husband or the wife, and in regard to that of course we are very much governed by the existing state of the law, which, as you know, Mr. Chairman, provides that prima facie the wife is supposed to be the agent of the husband. There are a list of cases, viz., Manby and Scott, Seaton and Benedict, Montagu and Benedict, Jolly and Rees, Debenham and Mellor, Morel and Westmoreland, dealing with the agency of the wife, which I need not refer to further because I expect you know all about them, some of which provide that the husband has power to privately withdraw from the wife the authority to pledge his credit, and that being so if he secretly says to her: "You are not to pledge my credit," and she does so, then the husband is not liable. If, therefore, you sue the husband for goods supplied to the lady as being the principal, you fail against him because he has withdrawn his authority from the wife. On the other hand if you sue the wife she says: "I am only the agent of my husband, and I myself am not liable," so that it is practically almost impossible to give anything like definite advice to a client who comes to you, as to which party is to be sued. If you sue both then you are bound to fail as against one, and unless the subject matter of the debt is a very large one the amount of costs which you have to pay in an unsuccessful case would be very likely more than the amount for which you are suing.

5297. When you sue a married woman in respect of her separate estate and are successful, then, I think, that the difficulty begins again, does it not?—Yes; of course one of the troubles is with the restraint on anticipation. In that case if you get a judgment against a married woman it is extremely difficult in the first place to find out where the fund is that she gets her income from. The trustees or bankers who pay it over will never give you any information and even if they did, unless you happen to collect it at the very moment that it becomes due, you do not get it at all, because you cannot in the first place attach income which is about to become due, and immediately after the lady has received it she has paid it away somewhere else. We have had several cases of that description.

5298. And then when you get the judgment, the judgment is only in a form which binds her separate estate, which is not restrained from anticipation?—That is so. The judgment is not a general judgment against her, but merely a judgment binding her separate estate, which is not restrained from anticipation.

5299. And the result of that is that you find that you cannot, in the first place, make her a bankrupt on a bankruptcy notice, and that you cannot get a committal order against her?—That is so.

5300. Do you often have experience in cases in which a married woman can be made bankrupt. I mean when you find one trading separately and apart from her husband, so that she can be made a bankrupt?—Occasionally, but not very frequently.

5301. Now then, that being the evil, what would be your view as to the possibility of a remedy? Would you give a power to the court to give an ordinary judgment against a married woman?—I certainly think so myself. I do not know whether I shall be outside the terms of reference before the Committee or not, but I should like to say it does seem to me very strongly that the position of the husband and wife ought to be placed on the ordinary lines of principal and agent, that a married woman ought to be looked upon merely as the agent of the husband in the common sense that A is the agent of B in the ordinary course of business and if a married woman went into a shop and did not clearly state that she intended to bind somebody else, that is to say, her husband, she would be deemed the contracting party like any other person, and would be primarily liable for the debt.

5302. And then you would have an ordinary common law judgment against her?—Yes; of course if she wished to bind her husband I think that the onus ought to be put upon her of saying, "You must please charge these goods to my husband."

5303. Assuming that you got judgment against her, and a bankruptcy notice against her, would you be in favour of subjecting her to the bankruptcy law in the same way as a man is subjected to it?—I should think so.
